PREFACE

The publishers of this book have long felt that there is a widespread need for a work devoted to synonymy that emphasizes discrimination among synonyms and that provides accessory material in the form of word lists of various kinds. For many years there has been great interest in the articles devoted to discussion of synonyms that are included in various general dictionaries of the English language. Those prepared by Dr. John Livingston Lowes for the Merriam-Webster dictionaries from the publication of Webster's New International Dictionary in 1909 have proved especially stimulating and have led to numerous requests on the part of consultants of the dictionary that they be issued separately, extended in number and scope, and supplemented with word-finding lists. In recent years these suggestions have been so frequent as to convince the publishers that a book of this sort should be undertaken.

Before the editorial work was begun, a survey was made of all the principal works devoted to treatment of synonyms, both independent publications and dictionaries containing this type of material. As a part of this survey, an intensive study was made of the technique employed by all the leading synonymists and all their differing points of view.

The information thus obtained has been summarized in the form of an essay (pp. vii-xxv). The publishers believe that this, the first definite attempt to survey the problems and issues in the field of English synonymy, will prove not only of interest to readers of this book but of very great value to them by giving them a background against which to set the articles in the present work. The survey provided the present editors with a firm grasp of their complex task, and the making of it is more than justified in the resultant sharpening of the editorial point of view and the consequent enrichment of the work in the discriminating articles in this book.

The core of the present work is the discriminating articles. It is not its purpose to assemble mere word-finding lists for consultants with but a vague notion of the sort of word they seek, but rather to provide consultants with the means of making clear comparisons between words of a common denotation and to enable them to distinguish the differences in implications, connotations, and applications among such words, and to choose for their purposes the precisely suitable word. (Compare the discussion of Roget's aims on pp. xvi-xvii, below.)

In addition to the central core of articles discriminating groups of words, this book provides auxiliary information of three types, in the form of liberal lists of analogous words, antonyms, and contrasted words. These three types are explained on pp. xxxii-xxxiii.

As far as possible, the editors have tried to make this book self-contained. To do this completely, it would of course be necessary to discuss in at least one article of synonymy every word listed as an antonym or in a word-finding list. It is not practicable, perhaps not even desirable, to carry the ideal of a self-contained book to this extreme. In the case of antonyms, those appropriate to an entry have been chosen and exhibited at that entry regardless of whether they are themselves discriminated in the book. This is, however, the only absolute exception. A merely apparent exception, but one readily explained, consists in the use (in the word-finding lists of analogous words and contrasted words) of derivative words or of words related to other words as their negatives or affirmatives. The editors have felt free to use such derivative, negative, and affirmative words when the primitive words or the correlative words are themselves discriminated in some article in the book.

Otherwise, the book is self-contained. Every word discussed in an article of synonymy is entered in its own alphabetical place and is followed by a list of its synonyms, with a reference (by means of an asterisk or a direction introduced by "see") to the entry where the discussion of these listed words is to be found. The words listed as analogous, and those listed as contrasted, are always displayed in groups, each group having a clear reference (asterisk or "see") to the term under which an article of synonymy is to be found.

As the value of illustrative citations (whether made up by the editor and representing common current use, or whether quoted from some author) has long been recognized, the present work provides a wealth of such illustrative material. Besides illustrations already found in the articles of synonymy in Webster's New International Dictionary, Second Edition, and numerous additional citations available in our editorial files and in various repositories of citations (such as concordances and books of familiar quotations), a large accumulation of quotations was newly collected for this work. The editorial staff of G. & C. Merriam Company spent many months reading for this special purpose, particularly first-class contemporary writers and well-known books published within the last twenty to thirty years, as well as current periodical literature both American and British. The file of citations resulting from this reading has been of inestimable value, serving not merely as a source for illustrative quotations but as a means of establishing current usage and reflecting recent changes in the implications, connotations, and applications of words.

As the Historical Survey makes clear (pp. xxiii-xxv, below), it is the feeling of the present editors that the work on synonymy done by Dr. Lowes in consultation with the late George Lyman Kittredge marked the highest development of English synonymy up to the present time. They have endeavored to preserve as much of this work as the enlarged scope and aim of the present book would permit. It must be obvious, however, that the increase of the number of words to be subjected to discrimination as synonyms inevitably brings about a regrouping of much of the material treated by Professor Lowes. The present work, then, is by no means a reprint of material from any other Merriam-Webster dictionary.

In its preparation, broad questions of form and policy were determined by the permanent editorial board of G. & C. Merriam Company, consisting of William Allan Neilson (chairman), Editor in Chief of Merriam-Webster Dictionaries, formerly President of Smith College, Robert C. Munroe, President of G. & C. Merriam Company, John P. Bethel, General Editor of Merriam-Webster Dictionaries, and Lucius H. Holt, Managing Editor of Merriam-Webster Dictionaries.

Every article included in this book was read by Dr. Neilson and Dr. Bethel. All points of disagreement, no matter how minor, were thoroughly canvassed, and each article was subjected to revision before achieving its final form.

The writing of the articles was done chiefly by Miss Rose F. Egan, Assistant Editor on the permanent editorial staff, who also prepared the essays that form the larger part of the introductory matter. To her clear analysis and understanding of the purposes of the book and to her skill in dealing with the difficult material of synonymy this work owes much of its quality. By far the largest number of articles were written originally by her. Some were written by the following Assistant Editors, Mr. Edward Artin, Miss Elsie Mag (who also gathered the material from which Miss Egan prepared the word-finding lists) and Mr. Hubert P. Kelsey (who wrote many of the articles on scientific terms), and by Dr. Holt and Dr. Bethel; and much valuable information and criticism was supplied by Dr. Everett E. Thompson and Mr. Edward F. Oakes, Assistant Editors, and Miss Ervina Foss, Editorial Assistant. Certain articles of a technical nature were submitted to the scrutiny of outside consultants, notably articles dealing with terms in law, chemistry, and medicine, which were reviewed by Dr. Roscoe Pound of Harvard University, Dr. Austin M. Patterson, Vice-President of Antioch College, and Dr. Esmond R. Long, Professor of Pathology at the University of Pennsylvania and Director of the Henry Phipps Institute, respectively.

Throughout the editorial work, Miss Egan was assisted by Miss Anne M. Driscoll, Editorial Assistant, who had charge of all typing and filing and provided invaluable assistance in many ways. Proofreading of typed copy, including the verification of quotations, was done by Mr. Hubert Roe; proofreading of printers' proofs by Mr. Roe and Miss Driscoll; checking of cross references by Miss Eliane Yelle, Miss Driscoll, and Mr. Roe. The list of authors and sources quoted (see pp. 899 ff.) was compiled by Mr. Roe and Dr. Bethel.

The typesetting and electrotyping were done by The George Banta Publishing Company, of Menasha, Wisconsin, whose staff gave unstinted co-operation and assisted with excellent proofreading.

INTRODUCTORY MATTER

SURVEY OF THE HISTORY OF ENGLISH SYNONYMY

Consultation of a work on synonyms is made easier if the consultant has a reasonable background of the theory and of the technique that have developed since the first English synonymy was published. The following essay is, so far as we know, the first attempt to survey broadly the course of that development from its beginnings to the present. It is not intended to be exhaustive. Some good books have been published which have not been specifically discussed because they have played no essential part in this development or have advanced no new ideas which, by challenging attention or debate, have led to further clarification of the problems involved. The purpose of this article has not been primarily to praise or to denounce, but to lead up to the exposition of principles which have dominated the writing of this book. These principles, we believe, are founded upon the practice of those who have seen and known clearly what could be accomplished by a book of synonyms: there are others who disagree, but we have tried to present their case fairly.

It was not until the second half of the eighteenth century that the first book on synonyms appeared in English. The Rev. John Trusler (1735–1820) was its author, The Difference between Words Esteemed Synonymous its title, and 1766 its date. Its source is definitely established. In 1718, the Abbé Gabriel Girard (1677–1748) had published in France La Justesse de la langue françoise ou les Différentes significations des mots qui passent pour être synonymes, a work which had great vogue not only in France but also abroad, especially in England. That Trusler's book was based upon it is evidenced not only by the likeness of the titles but also (in the first edition) by an English version of Girard's preface and by the admission in the author's preface that he had translated as much of the articles as was in keeping with the peculiar genius of the English language. The second edition of 1783, however, increases the divergence between the two books: the prefaces are consolidated and the result is given as the work of the author, although many passages from Girard are included without being quoted. There are, too, many new articles dealing with peculiarly British terms, such as those which concern the church and daily life in England; but these, although they represent an enrichment of vocabulary, add little to the originality of the work, which still remains an imitation. A clear-cut distinction which sharply reveals the meanings of synonymous French terms often becomes a forced distinction when applied to English. In fact, Trusler never knew whether it was his aim to point out the "delicate differences between words reputed synonymous" or to give the particular idea of each word "which constitutes its proper and particular character." He claims both aims as one, not realizing that often they are divergent.

The next significant work was the British Synonymy of Hester Lynch Piozzi (1741–1821), better known as Mrs. Thrale, the close friend of Dr. Johnson. It first appeared in 1794 and was succeeded by at least two editions, the best known of which was published in Paris in 1804. That it was immediately popular is evident from the testimony of its 1804 editors, who asserted its merits on the ground "of the successive editions it has passed through being the best proof of the estimation in which it is held." That it was not written without a knowledge of Girard's work we know on the authority of these same editors. "So great indeed was the estimation" in which the French work was held, "that in a few years after its publication, an imitation of it appeared in England": presumably the "imitation" was Trusler's.

The editors imply, however, that Mrs. Piozzi's work is something better than had yet been given to the public. "But it was only in the year 1794," they continue, in a tone that implies contempt for the "imitation," "that Mrs. Piozzi (formerly Mrs. Thrale) so well known in the literary world for her different publications, and her intimacy with the learned Dr. Johnson, brought out the work we have now the pleasure of presenting to our Readers, and which is totally grounded on the structure of the English language." Whoever had been the compiler of the "imitation," he had not been subjected in the same measure to the influence of Dr. Johnson, for there are, say the editors in a footnote, "some who are of opinion that divers articles in it [Mrs. Piozzi's book] were drawn up by that great Lexicographer himself."

Despite this intimation of helpfulness from a great source, Mrs. Piozzi's book more often reveals an independence of spirit and a feminine disregard of advice than it does subservience. It is, in fact, never profound: it is full of errors or dubious assertions, and it is often absurdly naïve. More than this, it frequently takes issue with Dr. Johnson or, in a sprightly manner, casts doubt on his judgments. There is the story of the milliner's apprentice who saved her chicken bones to feed a horse. Johnson contended that such an action showed that she was ignorant, but Mrs. Piozzi maintained that it proved her senseless. "I thought her an idiot [sic]" was, for her, the last word on the matter.

Great as was her respect for Dr. Johnson in his own field, she believed that she also had her field, and that it was incumbent on her to remain within the limits she had set for herself. Her object is very clear. Like Girard and Trusler, she was distinguishing not synonyms (that is, words identical in meaning) but words so similar in meaning as to be "apparently synonymous." The subtitle of her book announces her aim and reveals a further limitation of purpose: "An attempt at regulating the choice of words in familiar conversation." Her preface to the 1794 edition develops these ideas:

If then to the selection of words in conversation and elegant colloquial language a book may give assistance, the Author . . . modestly offers her's; persuaded that, while men teach to write with propriety, a woman may at worst be qualified—through long practice—to direct the choice of phrases in familiar talk.

Her book, she modestly claimed, "is intended chiefly for a parlour window" and is "unworthy of a place upon a library shelf," but it may be of help to others "till a more complicated and valuable piece of workmanship be found to further their research." She wished in particular to help those who desired to converse elegantly and to save foreigners from ridiculous mistakes in speech. "If I can in the course of this little work dispel a doubt, or clear up a difficulty to foreigners . . . I shall have an honour to boast."

For this reason, she could not see that her method of discrimination had much in common with that of the lexicographer and the logician. Theirs was to define: hers was to indicate propriety in the use of words. It was not her intent to establish differences in meaning, but to indicate the fitness of words for use, often depending on "the place in which they should stand" but sometimes depending on their relative fitness, strength, force, or the like. She makes a distinction between the methods of the definer and the methods of the synonymist by giving, first, two examples of definition of the word fondness, one from "an eminent logician" and one from Dr. Johnson, and, secondly, by an ideal synonymy in which she reveals the same word's meaning by showing it in use along with similar words. This was not invariably her method, but it illustrates what in the main she was trying to achieve.

. . . I have before me the definition of fondness, given into my hands many years ago by a most eminent logician.

'Fondness,' says the Definer, 'is the hasty and injudicious determination of the will towards promoting the present gratification of some particular object.'

'Fondness,' in the opinion of Dr. Johnson, 'is rather the hasty and injudicious attribution of excellence, somewhat beyond the power of attainment, to the object of our affection.'

Both these definitions may possibly be included in fondness; my own idea of the whole may be found in the following example:

Amintor and Aspasia are models of true love: 'tis now seven years since their mutual passion was sanctified by marriage; and so little is the lady's affection diminished, that she sat up nine nights successively last winter by her husband's bed-side, when he had a malignant fever that frightened relations, friends, servants, all away. Nor can any one allege that her tenderness is ill repaid, while we see him gaze upon her features with that fondness which is capable of creating charms for itself to admire, and listen to her talk with a fervour of admiration scarce due to the most brilliant genius.

For the rest, 'tis my opinion that men love for the most part with warmer passion than women do—at least than English women, and with more transitory fondness mingled with that passion . . .

It was in her simpler versions of this method that she developed a formula that has been followed by many of her successors in the discriminated synonymy—not always felicitously. We shall have opportunity to return to this method later when it becomes an object of attack, and shall call it for the sake of convenience the Piozzi method. At present let examples of her usage suffice:

TO ABANDON, FORSAKE, RELINQUISH, GIVE UP, DESERT, QUIT, LEAVE . . . though at first sight apparently synonymous, conversing does certainly better shew the peculiar appropriation than books, however learned; for . . . familiar talk tells us in half an hour—that a man fornakes his mistress, abandons all hope of regaining her lost esteem, relinquishes his pretensions in favour of another . . .

We say a lad of an active and diligent spirit, or else of an assiduous temper, or sedulous disposition.

We say that reports are confirmed, treaties ratified, and affairs settled.

A hard question puzzles a man, and a variety of choice perplexes him: one is confounded by a loud and sudden dissonance of sounds or voices in a still night; embarrassed by a weight of clothes or valuables, if making escape from fire, thieves, or pursuit . . .

The gentleman who discharges a gumming debt in preference to that of a tradesman, apparently prefers honour to another virtue, justice.

It seems a fair statement of her aim to say that she was attempting to indicate and establish idiomatic English. However, in determining such English, she had only two tests to apply: the drawing-room usage of her time, and her own instinct. To literary use, in general, she was indifferent. Therefore her judgments are nearly always subjective and sometimes arbitrary. Moreover, she discounted the great help that discrimination of meanings is to the synonymist. "We must not meantime retard our own progress," she wrote in her preface, "with studied definitions of every quality coming under consideration. . . . Although the final cause of definition is to fix the true and adequate meaning of words or terms, without knowledge of which we stir not a step in logic; yet here we must not suffer ourselves to be so detained, as synonymy has more to do with elegance than truth."

Her judgments are often limited or partial, for they represent her personal feelings or the predilections of her age. Yet, within those limits, she frequently hit upon an exact meaning of a word in a particular sense and gave it life and color. What she seldom saw was that a word might have more meanings than the one which was illustrated (as honor in her example of the tradesman) or that a good but narrow instance of use might be taken as idiomatic by her readers (as when by implication puzzle suggests a question or problem needing determination, and perplex a variety of choices). The danger of her work is not in the falsity of the example, for it is usually true or just, but in its inadequacy in suggesting other instances of good use.

Yet in her refusal to accept her age's theory of definition and in her approach to a concept of good usage, we must recognize an independent spirit. The time was not ripe for a fully developed conception of the differences between logic and lexicography, yet she was somewhat nearer the present conception than some later and cleverer persons, and she had at least a feeling of rightness in the use of language that suggested, even if it did not consciously approach, the later theory of good usage as a test of such rightness. Besides, her book has an engaging quality, often lacking in books of this character, which is not necessarily a sign of the levity with which critics have charged this book, but rather of a spirited challenge to the ideals of a hidebound age.

Mrs. Piozzi's book was followed by William Perry's Synonymous, Etymological, and Pronouncing English Dictionary, published in 1805. On its title page and in its preface the editor explicitly offers his work as derived from The Dictionary of Samuel Johnson. Perry was the compiler of the better known Royal Standard English Dictionary brought out in England in 1775 and in America in 1788.

The Synonymous Dictionary, as we shall call the 1805 book, evidently did not achieve the fame or popularity of the Royal Standard. Chauncey Goodrich, Noah Webster's son-in-law, referred to it in 1847 in his preface to the royal octavo volume of Webster as "entirely out of print." There is no evidence to show that it passed beyond the first edition. On its title page it is described as "an attempt to synonymise his [Johnson's] Folio Dictionary of the English Language." In its preface Perry claims that it contains "the only synonymous vocabulary ever offered to the public," and that "To the philological, critical, and other interesting observations of the above learned author [Dr. Johnson], we have super-added two exclusive advantages to our publication; the one—as a synonymous, the other—as a pronouncing nomenclature. The former is new and unique. . . ."

The work, he informs us, was begun in 1797, three years, therefore, after the publication of the first edition of Mrs. Piozzi's British Synonymy. Yet there is no indication of knowledge of that work nor of the work of Girard; in fact, Perry recognized no predecessor save Johnson. From Johnson, by explicit credit, he extracted his vocabulary and his explanations of meanings. Not so openly, however, did he extract the synonyms themselves: for example, his entry good is followed by Johnson's definition of sense 1, but the synonyms are taken from all of Johnson's succeeding twenty-nine senses. Nor does he provide many citations, and these are chiefly in entries at the end of the book; elsewhere, in parentheses, he lists the authors Johnson quoted but not the passages cited.

In addition, he adopted an original method of presenting his material. There were two types of entries, one in lower case and one in capitals. The latter, which he called "radicals," were followed by an exhaustive list; the former were succeeded by a much shorter list, but one word was printed in small capitals to indicate it was the radical. Thus "marches," a lower-case entry, has "borders, limits, confines, BOUNDARIES" as its synonyms; "BOUNDARY," an entry in capitals, has a much longer list which includes "limit, bound, bourm, term, mere, but, abuttal, border, barrier, marches, confines, precinct, line of demarcation, utmost reach or verge of a territory; a landmark, a mere-stone." If, then, one wished all the synonyms of a lower-case entry such as marches or abbreviation, one must turn to BOUNDARY or ABRIDGMENT, the word entered as the radical.

There are two things to notice here that are important. Perry was not merely greatly extending the traditional definition of synonym (as one of two or more words of identical meaning, or of apparently identical meaning) and broadening it to include a group of words which have resemblances in meaning, but he was doing so in what seems to be a misunderstanding of Dr. Johnson's purposes in adding such words to his definitions and in ignorance of what he supplied as a corrective. The fact of the matter is that Johnson was aware of the difficulties of his task, that he was conscious that the part of his work on which "malignity" would "most frequently fasten is the Explanation [i.e., the definition]."

Introduction

I cannot hope to satisfy those, who are perhaps not inclined to be pleased, since I have not always been able to satisfy myself. To interpret a language by itself is very difficult; many words cannot be explained by synonymes, because the idea signified by them has not more than one appellation; nor by paraphrase, because simple ideas cannot be described.

That was the difficulty. Synonyms would not perfectly satisfy the need when either the word defined had many meanings or when the word defining had more significations than the one intended, for in either case one must be too broad and the other too narrow. Then, too, "simple ideas" (really those involved in simple words such as be, do, act) were beyond definition, as Johnson saw it.

The rigour of interpretative lexicography requires that the explanation, and the word explained, should be always reciprocal; this I have always endeavoured but could not always attain. Words are seldom exactly synonymous; a new term was not introduced, but because the former was thought inadequate: names, therefore, have often many ideas, but few ideas have many names. It was then necessary to use the proximate word, for the deficiency of single terms can very seldom be supplied by circumlocution...

So Johnson wrote and so Perry quotes in his preface. But instead of continuing Johnson's statement to its end, Perry broke off with "circumlocution," thereby giving the reader some reason to infer that Johnson thought the method of definition by synonym preferable to that of definition by paraphrase. He had failed to notice, or possibly had deliberately ignored, that this was not in any sense Johnson's meaning, that both methods were faulty, but that there was a remedy for the imperfections of each. Johnson's addition to this last sentence, "nor is the inconvenience great of such mutilated interpretations, because the sense may easily be collected entire from the examples," makes that point clear. Perry may have been obtuse rather than disingenuous when, for the most part, he omits the examples (citations) of Johnson and enters synonyms, which are not, in Johnson's language, "exactly synonymous" but only "proximate words." But he may have known what Dr. Johnson meant, though his explanation is by no means clear:

We by no means contend, that the whole of the explanations collected under such initial words as... we call Radicals, are all strictly synonymous; neither, on the other hand, can we agree with those who roundly assert, that there are not two words in the whole English language of precisely the same signification; but this we take upon us to say, that we have no less than Dr. Johnson's authority for their selection and disposition as explanatory of their meaning...

Dr. Johnson's example, great as was its authority and prestige at that time, was an unstable prop when his statements were misunderstood. Perry perhaps indirectly rendered a service by raising the issue as to whether the term "synonym" needed redefinition, since it was being broadened in its extension: he may also have done a service in showing to others the values implicit in word-finding lists. But he did not see that he had raised those issues, and what purports to be a dictionary succeeds chiefly in being a word finder.

Between 1805 and 1852 (the latter the date of publication of Roget's Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases), several works on synonyms appeared. Some were of the word-finding list type, and among these there was nothing of particular importance. On the other hand, there were as many as five works discriminating synonyms of which at least four stand out for one reason or another: English Synonymes Discriminated, by William Taylor (1813), English Synonymes Explained, by George Crabb (1816), English Synonyms Classified and Explained, by George F. Graham (1846), and A Selection of English Synonyms, by Miss Elizabeth Jane Whately (1851). Both Crabb's and Miss Whately's books are still influential and have been reprinted in recent years.

William Taylor (1765-1836), the author of the first of these books, is better known as the translator of Burger's Lenore, Lessing's Nathan the Wise, and Goethe's Iphigenia in Tauris, and as one of the leading promoters of knowledge of contemporary German literature during the romantic era. His English Synonymes Discriminated is the result of his studies in German, French, Italian, and other languages and of his conviction that no English work the equal of certain foreign treatises on synonyms had as yet been written. The work is, as a whole, uneven, but a few articles in it are not only better than any others written up to that time but the equal of any that were to be written for over ninety years. A favorite theory of his was that if one is thoroughly grounded in the original meaning of a term, one "can never be at a loss how to employ it in metaphor." Consequently, etymologies became for him an important means of showing this original meaning. They formed not an invariable part of his discrimination but a very useful part when they were needed. Usually, also, he knew when his etymology was grounded on fact and when it was merely hypothetical. His method at its best is exemplified in the article covering austere, severe, and rigid, which we give here in abridged form:

Austerity (says Blair¹) relates to the manner of living: severity, of thinking, rigour, of punishing. To austerity is opposed effeminacy; to severity, relaxation; to rigour, clemency. A hermit is austere in his life; a casuist, severe in his decision; a judge, rigorous in his sentence.

In this discrimination there is little exactness. Austerity is applied not only to habit, but to doctrine, and to infliction. Solitary confinement is a severe form of life, and a severe punishment. Rigid observances, rigid opinions, are oftener spoken of than rigid sentences.

A hermit is austere, who lives harshly; is severe who lives solitarily; is rigid who lives unswervingly. A casuist is austere who commands mortification, severe, who forbids conviviality, rigid, whose exactions are unqualified. A judge is austere, who punishes slight transgressions; severe, who punishes to the utmost; rigid, who punishes without respect of persons and circumstances.

Why this? Austerity is an idea of the palate; it means crabbedness. . . . These modes of life which are painful to the moral taste, are called austere. . . . Austerity is opposed to suavity.

Severity is not traced back to the sensible idea in which the word originates. Se and vereor, to bend down apart, are perhaps the component ideas. The lying prostrate apart is not only characteristic of the praying anchorite, and of public penance, but of cruel infliction: and to all these cases severity is accordingly applied. . . . To severity is opposed remissness.

Rigour is stiffness: rigid means frozen: stiff with cold. . . . To rigour is opposed pliancy.

Religious competition renders sects austere, priests severe, and establishments rigid.

With the exception of severe (the ultimate origin of which is still doubtful), the words, in the main, conform to their etymology. Austere does originally mean something like "crabbed," and rigid means "stiff," though not necessarily "stiff with cold"; also, something that is austere is not sweet or suave, and something that is rigid is not pliant or flexible. He has caught the essential difference here, and the proper application follows. If Taylor had been able to maintain this method and the penetration it involved, he might have changed the course of synonymizing. But three years later English Synonymes Explained, by George Crabb (1778-1851), appeared and caught the public favor. For thirty-seven years, Taylor's book remained unprinted: then between 1850 and 1876 there were three new editions. For a few years it attracted some attention and then disappeared from favor.

Crabb's book, while still highly regarded by some, meets much adverse criticism from others. In his own day it was thought of generally as the best work available, although Crabb complicated matters somewhat by frequent revisions which changed its character. In his introduction to the first edition, he complained of the lack of a work on English synonyms in which the subject is treated "in a scientific manner adequate to its importance." Englishmen though great in literature and philology had in this field fallen short of the French and Germans who "have had several considerable works on the subject." He did not wish "to depreciate the labors of those who have preceded" him; rather he claimed "to have profited by every thing which has been written in any language upon the subject; and although I always pursued my own train of thought, yet whenever I met with any thing deserving of notice I adopted it, and referred it to the author in a note."

Crabb's English Synonymes Explained is both the most laborious and the most ambitious work of its kind. In spirit and objective it is a far remove from Mrs. Piozzi's British Synonymy, few as are the years which intervened between their publication. For Mrs. Piozzi represented the old temper where sprightliness, elegance, and ease were paramount, and Crabb the new temper in which the world had grown solemn and serious under the influence of many currents, such as the pressure of momentous events, the influence of Continental, especially German, thinkers, and the spread of all the new ideas spoken of collectively as romanticism. When the best philosophers and philosophic poets of the age were seeking to answer the questions, what is beauty?, what is poetry?, what is art?, what is genius?, and were discriminating the beautiful and the sublime, the naïve and the sentimental, imagination and fancy, the ugly and the grotesque, what synonymist could in conscience say that "synonymy has more to do with elegance than truth"?

Crabb was undoubtedly concerned with truth rather than elegance. He was stimulated by the thinking of his age and, like many persons of his time, responded with joy to the new philosophy that deepened and enriched the concepts of beauty, poetry, and truth. Although he was in no sense a philosopher, he had a smattering of philosophical knowledge, a small philosophical vocabulary, and a deep love of philosophical distinctions. He was also interested in philology as it was understood in his time. In the study of synonyms he found satisfaction of all these interests, all the more so since he had come to regard synonyms not as words of the same meaning, but as "closely allied" words between which there are "nice shades of distinction." Discrimination not only gave him profound intellectual satisfaction: it also afforded him great opportunities. In his introduction he wrote:

My first object certainly has been to assist the philological inquirer in ascertaining the force and comprehension of the English language; yet I should have thought my work but half completed had I made it a mere register of verbal distinctions. While others seize every opportunity unblushingly to avow and zealously to propagate opinions destructive of good order, it would ill become any individual of contrary sentiments to shrink from stating his convictions, when called upon as he seems to be by an occasion like that which has now offered itself.

His justification for "the introduction of morality in a work of science" is very ingenious. In answer to anticipated objections he wrote, "a writer, whose business it was to mark the nice shades of distinction between words closely allied, could not do justice to his subject without entering into all the relations of society, and showing, from the acknowledged sense of many moral and religious terms, what has been the general sense of mankind on many of the most important questions which have agitated the world."

It is not easy to find in Crabb proofs that he was discriminating historical meanings (the interpretation that may be given to his "the acknowledged sense"), but one can readily discover evidence that often he was supporting an older conception he favored rather than a new conception he heartily disliked. A good example of this is found in his discrimination of SOUL and MIND.

There are minute philosophers, who . . . deny that we possess any thing more than what this poor composition of flesh and blood can give us; and yet, methinks, sound philosophy would teach us that we ought to prove the truth of one position, before we assert the falsehood of its opposite; and consequently that if we deny that we have any thing but what is material in us, we ought first to prove that the material is sufficient to produce the reasoning faculty of man . . . [He continued this line of argument through several sentences.]

But not to lose sight of the distinction drawn between the words soul and mind, I simply wish to show that the vulgar and the philosophical use of these terms altogether accord, and are both founded on the true nature of things.

Poets and philosophers speak of the soul in the same strain as the active and living principle.²

Arguments of this character were mostly occasional with Crabb, but the method of discriminating things which the words named or to which they were applied was characteristically infixed. He could not, for instance, mark the distinctions between finical and foppish, but between a finical gentleman and a foppish gentleman.

A finical gentleman clips his words and screws his body into as small a compass as possible to give himself the air of a delicate person . . . : a foppish gentleman seeks by extravagance in the cut of his clothes, and by the tawdriness in their ornaments, to render himself distinguished for finery.

He could not discriminate beautiful, fine, handsome, without determining what is the beautiful, the fine, the handsome.

The beautiful is determined by fixed rules; it admits of no excess or defect; it comprehends regularity, proportion, and a due distribution of colour, and every particular which can engage the attention: the fine must be coupled with grandeur, majesty, and strength of figure; it is incompatible with that which is small; a little woman can never be fine: the handsome is a general assemblage of what is agreeable; it is marked by no particular characteristic, but the absence of all deformity . . .

Even simple words were so discriminated; each one had an abstract reference which was the test of its right use no matter how little cultivated writers and speakers respected that test.

The gift is an act of generosity or condescension; it contributes to the benefit of the receiver: the present is an act of kindness, courtesy, or respect; it contributes to the pleasure of the receiver.

What we abhor is repugnant to our moral feelings; what we detest contradicts our moral principle; what we abominate does equal violence to our religious and moral sentiments . . . Inhumanity and cruelty are objects of abhorrence; crimes and injustice of detestation; impiety and profanity of abomination . . .

Crabb's habitual attitude to words as names of things, or for what he might have called "true concepts of things," vitiates his entire work. It has made it of negligible value in our time when lexicography has become an independent science with clearly defined objectives and functions, the chief of which is to respect the meanings men have agreed to give words, rather than the notions individuals have concerning the things named or described by those words. His concepts, however interesting, are still subjective and have not been tested to any extent by actual written or spoken language. There are many citations in his work, but the sensitive reader often finds little relevancy between the word as used there and the sense defined. For example, in illustrating the meaning of the "soul" as "the active and living principle" he cites Thomson:

"In bashful coyness or in maiden pride,
The soft return conceal'd, save when it stole
In side-long glances from her downcast eyes,
Or from her swelling soul in stifled sighs."

But here soul as cited means simply and narrowly the rising emotions and not "the active and living principle."

² This paragraph did not appear in the first edition.

His synonymies are, on the whole, hard reading because confused and inconsistent. As a rule, they attempt too much yet do not fully apprehend the greatness of the task and leave the reader without any clear or definite impression or without any remembered distinctions. Also, they excite rebellion in a reader who can give any number of citations to show that Crabb's dogmatic assertions are not justified by usage. Despite these fundamental defects which, with the passage of time and changes in the basic conceptions, have come to be more and more striking, Crabb deserves recognition for some additions to the art of synonymizing. Even these, however, may not be entirely his contributions: a bit here and a bit there may have been done by others. Taylor, for example, gave etymologies when they served his purpose. Moreover, after Crabb the work of perfecting often remained to be done and many others are responsible for deeper insight into the possibilities of the method or the extent to which each possibility is serviceable. The chief contributions are:

1. The addition of an etymology to the article. Much more, however, needed to be known before certain words could be correctly etymologized, and before they could be related to the sense to be defined. In some cases, Crabb's etymologies are "learned" additions to the article, in no way reflecting the words' semantic development.

2. The addition of a statement (usually introductory) as to how far the words are equivalent in meaning. There was an approach to this in the work of Mrs. Piozzi, but it was hardly of the same character. Crabb's method was not only clearer and firmer but was much less subject to idiosyncrasies. Since this was his most enduring contribution, a few examples may be given to illustrate his method.

Ingenuity, wit. . . . Both these terms imply acuteness of understanding, and differ mostly in the way of displaying themselves. . . .

Disparage, detract, traduce, depreciate, degrade, decry. . . . The idea of lowering the value of an object is common to all these words, which differ in the circumstances and object of the action. . . .

Discernment, penetration, discrimination, judgment. . . . The first three of these terms do not express different powers, but different modes of the same power; namely the power of seeing intellectually, or exerting the intellectual sight. . . .

In clearness of statement, in pointedness, in "hitting the nail on the head," nearly all of these introductions leave something to be desired. Nevertheless, they are historically important because they represent the first tentative formulation of what has proved to be an important and essential part of the discriminated synonymy at its best.

3. In the arrangement of his word lists Crabb claims to have moved from the most comprehensive to the less comprehensive. In such articles as those discussing form, ceremony, rite, observance; and short, brief, concise, succinct, summary, the principle is clear, but in others, such as those for apparel, attire, array; and belief, credit, trust, faith; and execute, fulfill, perform, the procedure is not perfectly clear. In general, however, he seems to have had a plan and to have stuck to it when he could.

There are other devices used by Crabb which in later and defter hands proved valuable, but these three are the ones on which he has exerted his powers and with which he had greatest success. That the success was not complete is not entirely his fault. The English language is not a symmetrical language: it was never intended to be prodded into shape by the pen of the lexicographer or of the synonymist. No method is uniformly successful: every method must achieve a degree of fluidity before it can be turned to use. What was eminently true in Crabb's case is still eminently true, but some writers of today have learned to bow to necessity, a lesson which many early synonymists could not learn easily or gracefully.

His book continued to be held in high regard for many decades. In fact, a centennial edition in honor of the first (1816) was published in 1917 in the United States. Its editors' names are not given, but it contains an eloquent introduction by John H. Finley, then Commissioner of Education in New York State, which ends with the sentence: "Long life to Crabb and to that for which his name is as a synonym!"

By this time—that is, particularly between the first edition of Crabb's work and the first edition of Miss Whately's book—keen interest was being displayed in the use of synonyms in education. Several texts suitable for use in the schools were prepared. Not necessarily the best of these, but the most thoughtful and suggestive was English Synonymes Classified and Explained with Practical Exercises Designed for School and Private Tuition by George F. Graham. The emphasis in the book is entirely upon discrimination. Since there is no attempt to supply as many synonyms as possible, and every effort to make differences clear, two words only are given in each article. Although this has the effect of making the book seem purely pedagogical, it admits employment of a method of classification which would break down if more words were to be added. It is, therefore, only by courtesy that it can be called a synonymy.

The study of synonyms ought, according to Graham, to begin in the elementary schools. In the hope of making this possible, he divides all pairs of synonyms into five classes marking the relationships of these words. He calls his classes General and Specific, Active and Passive, Intensity, Positive and Negative, and Miscellaneous. The classification is obviously not clean-cut and the classes not necessarily mutually exclusive. As illustrations of General and Specific relationships, he compares answer and reply, bravery and courage; as instances of Active and Passive relationships, he discriminates burden and load, and actual and real; and as examples of Intensity in relationships, he considers agony and anguish, and intention and purpose. It is needless to say that a rigid classification begets a rigid method of discrimination. Sometimes, it serves to bring out the true distinction between the words, but more often, it serves to confuse them by bending them to suit a set purpose. It is the best example we have had so far of the futility of applying a rigid method to the direct study of anything so nonrigid and living as a language.

Crabb's supremacy as a synonymist seems not to have been seriously threatened by a slight book which appeared in 1851, won general praise, and has been listed in practically every bibliography since that time. This book, usually called "Whately's book on synonyms," has never, so far as we know, been properly esteemed for its own values, nor has its true author ever been adequately recognized. Credit for its authorship is often given to the famous logician Richard Whately (1787-1863), Anglican Archbishop of Dublin; rightly, it belongs to his daughter, Elizabeth Jane Whately. A fairly recent but undated edition from the Boston house of Lathrop, Lee, and Shepard confuses both details of title and authorship by calling it on the title page "English Synonyms Discriminated, by Richard Whately, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin." It has two prefaces, one the editor's preface signed, in the characteristic fashion of Anglican bishops, "Richard Dublin"; the other the preface by the author, which is unsigned.

The editor's preface is very short and abstruse, but pregnant with meaning. The archbishop took occasion to say that "this little work has been carefully revised by me, throughout," and that though "far from presuming to call it perfect, it is, I am confident, very much the best that has appeared on the subject." Some of its readers will acknowledge its value in the "cultivation of correctness and precision in our expressions." There will be those, however [we are paraphrasing, amplifying, and interpreting his very cryptic statements], who are so blinded by their adoption of "the metaphysical theory of ideas" that they will regard words as of little importance in themselves, and the ideas named as of great significance. There are others, such as himself, who regard words as "an indispensable instrument of thought, in all cases, where a process of reasoning takes place." Words are the symbols which men use in discourse. For the most part they do not name real things, for abstractions, such as the one called "beauty," or the generalized notion, such as the one called "tree," exist nowhere except in the mind and have not reality. Only in particular things can beauty be found: only particular objects which are classed together under the name "tree" exist. Therefore, if words are to serve as convenient instruments of discourse, they must often be regarded as signs not of real things but of notions of things, and must have a fixed and generally accepted content. Otherwise human minds could never come together in discourse. Moreover, actual discourse is often futile because words are loosely or incorrectly used.

The preface by the author, though it avoids all references to philosophy, is in general based on the same premises. The author, as has been said, is the archbishop's daughter Miss E. J. Whately, and the proper title of the book is A Selection of Synonyms. To her, as well as to her father, words are, for the most part, the names for human ideas or concepts of things. There may be words which name approximately the same thing but which, because of differences in human points of view, are distinguishable by slight differences in meaning. Synonyms, or as she preferred to call them "pseudo-synonyms," have "sufficient resemblance of meaning to make them liable to be confounded together. And it is in the number and variety of these that . . . the richness of a language consists. To have two or more words with exactly the same sense, is no proof of copiousness, but simply an inconvenience." A language, in her estimation, should have no more words than it needs, just as a house should have no more chairs or tables than required for convenience.

Differences in meaning she found even in words which denote exactly the same object, act, process, quality, emotion, and the like. Such words often have different connotations. "Swine's flesh," she says, is prohibited by the Mosaic Law, for "it is plain that it presents to the mind a gross idea, which pork does not." Some words may denote the same thing but their different origins or their varying historical associations give them a distinct character which better fits one than the other for use in certain contexts. In polite phrases such as "May I take the liberty?" the Latin derivative liberty is more suitable than the Saxon freedom. A heathen or an atheist may be called just but not righteous because Biblical use of the latter word has narrowed its application. Much more acute is her observation that two words may name the same thing but differ because they regard that thing from opposite points of view. She instances inference and proof.

Whoever justly infers, proves; and whoever proves, infers: but the word 'inference' leads the mind from the premises which have been assumed, to the conclusion which follows from them: while the word 'proof' follows a reverse process, and leads the mind from the conclusion to the premises.

In a footnote she referred to Aristotle's admirable parallel between anger and hatred, but after summing up his distinctions, she added significantly:

His [Aristotle's] example. . . has not been followed in this work. . . because, though the two passions may often be confounded together, and mistaken one for the other, the two words are not liable to be mistaken; and it is with words that we have now to do.

There, one is forced to comment, is the lexicographer speaking, and not the would-be philosopher who would use definition or discrimination of words as an instrument for the expression of his own ideas.

Here and there in her preface and in her synonymies, without evident plan or intention, Miss Whately advanced ideas which when brought together indicate a conception of the synonymist's function and equipment far beyond any yet presented. Not only was she, in effect if not by design, distinguishing lexicography from philosophy but she was defining and enriching the concept of the ideal synonymy and the ideal synonymist. And she did so by flying in the face of all Crabb's admirers and imitators.

Although she realized the importance per se of the "history of the derivation of words," she omitted etymologies "which are generally appended to every group of synonyms as an almost essential part of it." She questioned the value of "this procedure" because it "tends. . . to confuse the subject it was intended to clear," for "in inquiring into the actual and present meaning of a word, the consideration of what it originally meant may frequently tend to lead us astray." Nevertheless, she made good use of her knowledge of etymology when it helped in the discrimination of words.

Contentment may be classed among those words in the English language which adhere strictly to their etymology. Its root was undoubtedly the verb "to contain," and the substantive and its adjective have not departed from this meaning. A contented person does not indulge in fruitless wishes for what is beyond his reach; his desires are limited by what he possesses.

Satisfaction implies more: this word has likewise retained the signification of its root, and means that we have obtained all we want; not that our desires are limited, but that they have been gratified. A poor and needy man may be contented, but he cannot feel satisfaction with his condition.

Her illustrations are many and reveal wide reading, a broad linguistic background, and a deep interest in developments of meaning, in differences in meaning between words of the same origin in different languages (e.g., between the English defend and the French défendre which means not only to defend but also to forbid), and in English words which have "corresponding origins" yet are "widely different in their significations," such as substance (printed as substantia in her book), understanding, and hypostasis. She was interested also in the notions which gave names to things, as "'Heaven' . . . conveyed with it the idea of something heaved or lifted up. . . . 'Coelum' . . . referred to something hollowed out or vaulted."

All these variations of meaning. . . are valuable and curious; but though they may occasionally help us, they must not be allowed to influence our decisions with respect to the significations of words. Our question is, not what ought to be, or formerly was, the meaning of a word, but what it now is; nor can we be completely guided by quotations from Shakespeare or Milton, or even from Addison or Johnson. Language has undergone such changes, even within the last sixty or seventy years, that many words at that time considered pure, are now obsolete; while others. . . formerly slang, are now used by our best writers. . . . The standard we shall refer to in the present work, is the sense in which a word is used by the purest writers and most correct speakers of our own days.

Although Miss Whately cannot be said to be the first to discriminate meanings of synonyms, she was, so far as we know, the first in England to make that the avowed aim of a book of synonyms and to realize clearly the distinction between the meaning of a word and the thing or idea for which it stood.

Unfortunately, Miss Whately was not so successful in finding a method of synonymizing as she was in expounding its principles. She had, in theory, thrown off the yoke of Crabb, but in practice, she occasionally submitted to it. Nor had she, any more than Crabb, been able to discard completely or to transform to her own use what has been called the Piozzi method of illustration. Some of the difficulty arises from her use of other writers and from the reviser (her father) who, though sympathetic in principle, did not always agree with the exposition in detail and made many heavy-handed changes. But these sources of difficulty are superficial: the real but unassignable reason probably has its roots in something that lies in temper and lack of experience. Yet, in spite of everything, she made several significant advances, not only in the theory, but in the art of synonymizing. Summed up, they are:

1. The principle that knowledge of meanings and all the background that such knowledge implies (derivations, historical development of senses, usage of purest writers and speakers, especially of one's own period, the associations that affect connotations, etc.) are indispensable elements of the synonymist's equipment, to be used or discarded as the occasion warrants.

2. The principle that the synonymist goes beyond the definer, in a difference of purpose. It is the function of the one who would define a word to estimate truly the meanings men have agreed should be given to it: it is the function of the synonymist to point out the differences between words with meanings so nearly alike that he gives help not only in their correct use but promotes precision of expression so necessary to the thinker and writer.

3. A clearer conception of the ways in which synonyms differ, such as:

(a) Because of differences in implications.

"Both obstinacy and stubbornness imply an excessive and vicious perseverance in pursuing our own judgment in opposition to that of others; but to be obstinate implies the doing what we ourselves chose. To be stubborn denotes rather, not to do what others advise or desire." (Quoted by Miss Whately from Sir James Mackintosh.)

A trifling matter is one merely of small importance: a trivial matter is a small matter made too much of. The word 'trivial' implies contempt, which 'trifling' does not. By saying, 'He never neglects a trifling matter,' we are rather supposed to praise; but in blaming a person for frivolity, we often say, 'He is always engrossed with trivial concerns.'

(b) Because of differences in applications.

"Obstinacy is generally applied to the superior; stubbornness to the inferior...Obstinacy refers more to outward acts, and stubbornness to disposition." (Quoted by Miss Whately from Sir James Mackintosh.)

Strictly speaking, expense should be applied to the purchaser, and cost to the thing purchased... Many persons are tempted to buy articles... because they are not costly, forgetting that... these purchases may still be too expensive.

Delightful is applied both to the pleasures of the mind and those of the senses: delicious only to those of the senses. An excursion, a social circle, a place of abode, may be delightful; a perfume, or a fruit, delicious.

(c) Because of differences in extension, or range of meaning.

Timid is applied both to the state of mind... in which a person may happen to be at the moment, and to the habitual disposition; timorous, only to the disposition. Timid is therefore the more extensive term, and comprehends the meanings of timorous...

To understand, to comprehend. The former of these verbs is used in a much more extended sense than the latter. Whatever we comprehend, we understand; but to understand is used on many occasions in which to comprehend would be inadmissible... It would be quite correct to say, 'I did not comprehend his exposition, or his arguments, although I understood the language, and the grammatical import of each sentence.'

(d) Because of differences in association or origin and, therefore, in connotations.

Fatherly, paternal; motherly, maternal... are formed from corresponding roots in Latin and Saxon... the Latin word being the more polite and cold, the Saxon the more hearty and cordial... We speak of 'a paternal government'—'a maternal duties'; but of 'a fatherly kindness of manner'—'a motherly tenderness.'

Righteous, just... a Saxon and a Latin term, whose roots exactly correspond in meaning; but they have even more curiously diverged than many other pairs of words. Righteous is now exclusively applied to rectitude of conduct drawn from religious principle, while just is simply used for moral uprightness. A heathen or atheist may be called just, but not righteous.

(e) Because of the difference in the point of view from which the same thing is regarded.

Anger is more correctly applied to the inward feeling; wrath to the outward manifestation... We should not speak of the 'anger,' but of the 'wrath' of the elements. We therefore speak of the wrath of God, more correctly than of his anger. We cannot attribute to Him passions like those of men: we can only describe the external effects which in man would be produced by those passions.

In 1852, the year after Miss Whately's Selection of Synonyms was published, appeared the first edition of the Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases, by Peter Mark Roget (1779–1869), a book that was to exert very great influence on the development of interest in synonyms and to provoke a new interest in opposite or contrasted terms. The modern consultant of the Thesaurus, accustomed to depend on the elaborate index (provided in 1879 by the compiler's son John L. Roget), has little knowledge of the original plan of the book, though it has in no way been disturbed by revisers of the Roget family. But this plan is obviously hard to use and few consultants of the Thesaurus, if any, now avail themselves of it. It depends upon a classification of all words into six main categories, those dealing with Abstract Relations, Space, Matter, Intellect, Volition, and Affections, each of which is divided into smaller and appropriate subdivisions until an appropriate heading, such as Interpretation or Lending gives the clue for the left-hand column of nouns, verbs, adjectives, and adverbs gathered under it and an appropriate heading, such as Misinterpretation or Borrowing, gives the clue for the right-hand column of nouns, verbs, adjectives, and adverbs that are theoretically opposed or in contrast. But Roget did not call these word lists Synonyms and Antonyms (the latter word indeed had not yet been coined): his usual name was "Analogous Words" for those in the left-hand column and "Correlative Words" for those in the right-hand column. Despite this, other revisers than those of the Roget family have consistently misinterpreted this volume as a book of synonyms and antonyms and have rearranged it or alphabetized it in the hope of making this clear.

It is, therefore, merely because of its historical connections with the treatment of synonyms and antonyms that this book is of immediate significance to us. Only when it is clear that the book purports to be a supplier of words—technically, a "word finder"—and nothing else, shall we be able to estimate correctly the heresy that has arisen out of its misunderstanding. To reach this end, it is necessary for us to know very clearly just what Roget tried to accomplish by this book and just what he ruled out as extraneous to his purpose.

As early as 1805, Roget realized that what he needed for his own writing was a classified list of words in which he might find not only the right words to express his ideas but words that would help him in clarifying or formulating confused or vague ideas. He found the lists he made so useful to himself that he came to believe that they would prove, if amplified, of great value to others. For nearly fifty years he had this project in mind but only at the age of seventy, after his retirement in 1849 from his position as secretary of the Royal Society of London for the Advancement of Science, was he able to realize it.

He held from the start that what was needed was not a dictionary of synonyms. Roget had in mind a consultant who not only did not know a near word, but who could not even recall a word somewhat similar in meaning to the word desired or who only vaguely apprehended an idea because of the want of the right word or words to help him in formulating it. For example, a geologist who has found a rock, probably hitherto undiscovered, because it fitted into no known classification might be at a loss for the exact terms to describe its peculiar texture. Such a person could hope to find in the section headed "Matter" the concrete adjective he needed (such as fissile, friable, splintery, etc.). No word, no phrase, was too narrow in its meaning to serve Roget's purpose, nor too archaic, nor too slangy, nor too erudite. Whether one was writing a technical treatise or a witty essay, a historical novel or a definition for a dictionary, one might hope to discover in this Thesaurus the expressions "which are best suited to his purpose and which might not have occurred to him without such assistance." For words, "like 'spirits from the vasty deep' . . . come not when we call"; "appropriate terms notwithstanding our utmost efforts cannot be conjured up at will."

More than this, Roget did not call the words he selected synonyms, when they were of the same part of speech and belonged in the same column. That he understood "synonyms" as denoting words of equivalent meaning is evident in his reference to the discrimination of "apparently synonymous" terms. There can be no question that he thought word-finding lists of synonyms and of "apparently synonymous" terms would be too meager to suit the purposes he had in mind.

As for the discrimination of synonyms, that was entirely foreign to the purpose of his book. He was very explicit about that:

The investigation of the distinctions to be drawn between words apparently synonymous, forms a separate branch of inquiry, which I have not presumed here to enter upon; for the subject has already occupied the attention of much abler critics than myself, and its complete exhaustion would require the devotion of a whole life. The purpose of this Work, it must be borne in mind, is not to explain the signification of words, but simply to classify and arrange them according to the sense in which they are now used, and which I presume to be already known to the reader. I enter into no inquiry into the changes of meaning they may have undergone in the course of time. I am content to accept them at the value of their present currency, and have no concern with their etymologies, or with the history of their transformations; far less do I venture to thrid [thread] the mazes of the vast labyrinth into which I should be led by any attempt at a general discrimination of synonyms.

It is also important to notice that Roget believed himself without a precursor "in any language." He may have known Perry and many others who worked in the word-finding field before 1852: like other cultivated men he probably knew Crabb and others working on the discrimination of synonyms; but he always thought of himself as doing something quite distinct from both. In fact, he gave his successors many reasons for refusing to believe that his two series of word-supplying lists were synonyms or antonyms, or were capable of discrimination as synonyms or of opposition as antonyms.

Despite that, his purpose was misunderstood and his book misinterpreted. In 1867 appeared a small book called A Complete Collection of Synonyms and Antonyms, by the Rev. Charles J. Smith, which gave evidence that here and there men were quietly substituting their judgment of Roget's work for his own. It is true that there is only one sentence in the preface of Smith's book to support this inference, and that concerns the reason why its author has chosen the dictionary method of presenting his material, "from finding that the abstract classifications of words, under certain broad ideas, according to the plan of Dr. Roget, seems invalidated by the necessity, in his well-known Thesaurus, of numberless cross-divisions, and is practically disregarded in favor of the Alphabetical Index." Yet, brief as is that statement, it reveals that he thought his work and Roget's had a common purpose—to give synonyms and their opposites or, to use the word which he now coined, their "antonyms"—and that the difference between the two books was merely a matter of method.

There is no evidence that Smith realized that he was changing the time-honored definition of synonym. His chief object in phrasing his definition of synonym was to set that term in opposition to antonym, which he regarded as its antithesis. Nevertheless, in so doing, he introduced a subtle and important change in the definition. His statement reads as follows:

Words which agree in expressing one or more characteristic ideas in common [with the entry word] he [i.e., Smith himself] has regarded as Synonyms, those which negative one or more such ideas he has called Antonyms.

The inference that he changed the traditional definition of synonym is supported not only by this statement, but also by his method of selecting synonyms. One example must suffice:

ACCELERATE, v.t. Ad and celer, quick. To quicken the speed or process of events, objects, or transactions.
 SYN. Quicken. Hasten. Urge. Speed. Expedite. Promote. Despatch. Facilitate.
 ANT. Delay. Obstruct. Impede. Retard. Clog. Hinder. Drag. Shackle.

The important thing to notice about these lists is not their parallelism, nor even how good or bad the synonyms or antonyms are, but that they have been selected according to a new principle. The synonyms are not all closely allied words differing only in minor ways, or words which are essentially alike in meaning, but some, such as urge and promote, are words which come together only in some part of their meaning, and that not necessarily their essential meaning. Nor are the antonyms necessarily opposed to the essential meaning of accelerate. It is quite possible that neither Smith nor anyone else at the time fully realized what a radical change in definition he had made. In his Synonyms Discriminated, the work with which four years later (1871) he followed his Synonyms and Antonyms, he adhered to the orthodox definition of synonym. The later work proved the more popular, and it is probable that the inconspicuousness of Synonyms and Antonyms helped to obscure its definition of synonym, buried as it was in the preface.

Moreover, in the same year as Synonyms Discriminated, appeared another book of indiscriminated synonyms, Richard Soule's A Dictionary of English Synonymes and Synonymous or Parallel Expressions (1871), which attracted far more attention than had Smith's Synonyms and Antonyms. New editions appeared in rapid succession, and it was revised in 1891 by Professor George H. Howison, and in 1937 by Professor Alfred D. Sheffield.

Although Soule acknowledged help from Roget's Thesaurus and a number of other works such as the dictionaries of Webster and Worcester and the books by Crabb, Miss Whately, and others discriminating synonyms, he claims in no particular instance to have followed them strictly or to have been influenced by them in any way. If we judge from the words of Professor Howison, who, nearly twenty years after the first edition, undertook revision at the request of Soule's family, he "found little more to do than to carry out to a greater completeness the lines of Mr. Soule's original design." That Soule's original design was clear and definite and that he saw himself as doing something quite different from Roget, on the one hand, and from Crabb and Miss Whately, on the other, is obvious from what Professor Howison has further to say:

A perfect manual of that sort is impossible within the compass of a single work of convenient size and arrangement. . . . A work on Synonymes may thus have for its purpose either an alphabetic list of all the more important words in the language, with their various meanings or shades of meaning set down under them, each followed by its appropriate synonymes; or a list of general notions, duly named and properly divided and subdivided, with the words and phrases that belong to the expression of each collected under them as fully as possible; or, again, the collocation of words allied in meaning with subjoined disquisitions on the shades of difference between them. The latter conception has been the prevailing one among English makers of synonymic dictionaries, and is represented by the well-known work of Crabb, as well as by any; the second is that of Roget's Thesaurus; while the first is that of Soule.

Consequently, we are not surprised to find that Soule's definition of synonym approaches the orthodox one. True, he gives us no detailed definition, but he does say enough to show that he does not mistake the relation between words of the same part of speech in the left-hand or the right-hand column of Roget (he is obviously not interested in their cross relation), and he does not show any knowledge—much less any interest—in Smith's definition of a synonym as a word which agrees in expressing one or more characteristic ideas in common with a given word. A synonym, he says, has "the same meaning as" the entry word under which it is listed "or a meaning very nearly the same." Within limits, his lists of synonyms are about as good as is possible when they are not submitted to the test of discrimination.

Even though Soule's Dictionary of Synonyms has been the model for a great many works issued in imitation of it, some claiming to have improved upon it, it still remains, in both its original and its revised forms, the best dictionary of synonyms that does not provide discriminations. Like Roget's work, within its own limits it has not yet been bettered.

But beyond those limits, both in the realm of books providing discriminating synonymies and in the realm of books providing synonyms and antonyms without discriminations, there has arisen a state of affairs which makes us believe that we are at a point where a stand must be taken if we are to avert chaos in the field. In the forefront of this battle are the American general dictionaries and certain manuals written by men who have been at one time or another members of their staffs.

The general dictionaries have so far been omitted from this survey. Not that they were inactive—for, almost from the start, they were not. A few ventures were merely tentative, such as that in James Barclay's Complete and Universal Dictionary issued in England in 1774. This work Chauncey Goodrich (in his preface to Webster's A Pronouncing and Defining Dictionary, 1856, an abridgment of the 1828 Webster) notices with the observation that discriminations of "synonymous words" were "first introduced into a general dictionary by Barclay, though in a very imperfect manner." Goodrich also calls attention to the fact that Noah Webster had often successfully used the method of discrimination as part of his definitions. But these attempts do not merit the honor of being the first discriminating synonymies in the general dictionary. No one in fact laid serious claim to their introduction before Joseph Worcester who, in 1855, issued his Pronouncing, Explanatory, and Synonymous Dictionary. The slight foundation for the claim is evident from the following typical examples:

DEFEND. . . . Syn.—Defend the innocent; protect the weak; vindicate those who are unjustly accused; repel aggression.

One year later (1856), William G. Webster and Chauncey A. Goodrich, the son and son-in-law of Noah Webster, brought out abridged editions of his American Dictionary for school, business, and family use. Short discriminating synonymies were introduced, all of them written by Chauncey Goodrich. A few typical illustrations will indicate how much better a title he had than had Worcester to the claim of having introduced such synonymies into a dictionary:

Things are adjacent when they lie near to each other without touching, as adjacent fields; adjoining when they meet or join at some point, as adjoining farms; contiguous when they are brought more continuously in contact, as contiguous buildings.

Liveliness is an habitual feeling of life and interest; gayety refers more to a temporary excitement of the animal spirits; animation implies a warmth of emotion and a corresponding vividness of expressing it; vivacity is a feeling between liveliness and animation, having the permanency of the one and the warmth of the other.

The first serious attempt in a general dictionary at discriminating synonymies on a par with those published by Mrs. Piozzi, Crabb, Miss Whately, and others, came in 1859 with the publication by G. & C. Merriam Co. of a "provisional edition"³ of Webster as a preparation for the first complete revision (issued in 1864) of the American Dictionary. These also were written by Chauncey A. Goodrich (1790–1860), whose articles in the smaller dictionaries of 1856 had been, according to the publishers' preface of 1859, "so highly appreciated by distinguished scholars" that they had prevailed upon him in his capacity as editor of the 1859 edition to add a treatment of synonyms to this book. For some years Goodrich had been engaged on "a distinct work on this subject" and it was the material gathered for this project that was developed and presented in the table of synonyms as part of the "front matter" of the 1859 edition.

These synonymies, with slight changes in phrasing and many additions, served for the two ensuing complete revisions of Merriam-Webster dictionaries, Webster's Unabridged Dictionary of 1864 and Webster's International Dictionary of 1890, both under the editorship of Noah Porter. In these books, the articles on synonymy, instead of being grouped in the front matter, were distributed through the main vocabulary.

In the publishers' statement in the 1859 edition of the American Dictionary, note was made of the great advance in Goodrich's synonymies over those of preceding writers:

³ As stated in the preface to Webster's Unabridged Dictionary (1864).

Introduction

This is only an application on a broad scale of one mode adopted by Dr. Webster, for giving clearness and precision to his definitions. It is also peculiarly appropriate in a work like this, which aims at great exactness as a defining dictionary; since it affords an opportunity of giving in connection with the leading terms of our language, those nicer discriminations and shades of thought which it is impossible to reach in the way of ordinary definitions. . . . Unless the distinctive meaning of the several words is previously given, little or no aid is afforded as to their proper use and application, by adducing such passages. This will be seen by turning to such a work as Platts' Dictionary of English Synonyms,⁴ which is framed chiefly upon this plan. On the first page, we find under the words abandon, desert, leave, etc., such examples as these: "Men are abandoned by their friends; we desert a post or station; leave the country," etc. But these words may be equally well interchanged. Men may be deserted by their friends; we may abandon a post or station, etc. Such examples, therefore, afford no light or guidance as to the proper use of these words. So, if the phrase be given "the officer abandoned his post," the question may arise whether he really abandoned, or deserted, or surrendered, or left it. He may have abandoned it on the approach of an enemy, or as no longer important to maintain; he may have deserted it unworthily or treacherously; he may have surrendered it to a superior force; he may have left it temporarily.

The criticism clearly shows that the chief defect of the current discriminating synonymy was a defect in method: it was not a defect in the definition of synonym or in the selection of synonyms. But in the thirty years following there were signs that Perry's vague conceptions of a synonym, and Smith's freer definition were beginning to enter the minds of synonymists. Neither Perry nor Smith was largely responsible for this change in definition. Roget, because of the enormous popularity of his work, or rather those who misinterpreted Roget's aim, must be considered as originating the trend, and be blamed for it. By 1889, the first evidence of its more general acceptance had made its appearance.

In that year was published the first edition of the Century Dictionary, and in 1894 followed Funk and Wagnalls' Standard Dictionary. Both were new ventures in dictionary making and had the advantage of being in the limelight. Both followed the initiative of the Merriam-Webster dictionaries and introduced discriminating synonymies as an essential part of their contribution. But neither followed Webster in its adhesion to the traditional definition of synonym.

Although the Century Dictionary attempted many new things in the way of dictionary making, such as an encyclopedic character and a format of several volumes, it placed little stress on its treatment of synonyms. The writer of these articles, Henry Mitchell Whitney, was the brother of the editor in chief, William Dwight Whitney: his work was given only a four-line notice in the editorial preface:

Discussions of synonyms treating of about 7000 words . . . will be found convenient as bringing together statements made in the definitions in various parts of the dictionary, and also as touching in a free way upon many literary aspects of words.

It was probably because of the division of the Century Dictionary into several volumes that its editors could entertain the idea that the function of a discriminating synonymy is to assemble definitions of comparable terms from various parts of the dictionary, but such a function, because of its accidental character, has no inherent value. As a matter of fact, Henry M. Whitney, the synonymist of the Century, often depended on cross reference to definitions for support or amplification of his statements and, therefore, invalidated the description (quoted above) by William Dwight Whitney in the editorial preface. Nor do his synonymies "touch in a free way upon many literary aspects of words." In the first place, it is not quite clear what is meant by that statement, and, in the second, there is no consistent proof of anything like it in the articles themselves. As a general rule, with the possible exception of Miss Whately, synonymists had not yet felt strongly any difference between the literary and colloquial use of words.

There is not only the lack of a clearly defined policy in the preface, but there is also the lack of one in the synonymies themselves. Yet Henry M. Whitney seems to have had in him the makings of a good synonymist, but to have been suffering from conditions over which he had no control. It may be that his job was too big for one man or for the time set for its completion, and that he had little leisure to think through its problems: it may be that what he considered a good synonymy was not in accord with the opinion of the editor in chief. At any rate, his synonymies vary greatly in method, aim, and accomplishment. The most that can be said is that he was experimenting with different methods and aims and that he never reached definite conclusions as to the superiority of one over the other.

The most vital problem which concerned him was the selection of synonyms. Sometimes he provides a very limited selection, as at adept, where he gives only expert, leaving out such words as master, proficient, and specialist, which might well have been treated as synonyms. In other places he gives a much longer and more heterogeneous list, as at ample: ample, copious, plenteous, spacious, roomy, extensive, extended, wide, capacious, abundant, sufficient, full, enough, unrestricted, plenary, unstinted.

⁴ A small work for use in schools, published 1825.

Only the italicized words are discriminated, it is true, but the others are given as synonyms. The average reader may doubt the justification of many of these words as synonyms, though he will readily find a relationship in meaning.

There was good reason for H. M. Whitney's uncertainty, in that around the eighteen-seventies and eighties synonymists were confronted with a problem that had not particularly concerned their predecessors. The demand then was not only for discriminating synonymies but for word-finding lists more or less in the manner of Roget and Soule. Crabb's work was still influential, but was not satisfying those who wanted more words synonymized and more synonyms for each word. Roget was immensely popular but extremely difficult to use, not only because of his classificatory method but because he supplied no definitions. In 1879 a "new and elaborate Index, much more complete than that which was appended to the previous editions" had been added by Roget's son, in the belief that "almost every one who uses the book finds it more convenient to have recourse to the Index first." In this way, the major difficulty, the classificatory system which the elder Roget had pertinaciously believed in, became no longer an obstacle. The other difficulty, the lack of discrimination, was not touched and, in view of Roget's primary purpose, was not likely to be.

As a result, there followed an attempt to provide synonymies which would combine the virtues and value of the discriminating synonymies and yet would deal with word lists that approached in number and variety those of Roget. Henry M. Whitney more or less played with the problem, but James C. Fernald (1838-1918), the editor of synonymies for Funk and Wagnalls' Standard Dictionary (1894) and author of a manual, English Synonyms and Antonyms (1896), attacked it with vigor and offered what seemed to him a solution.

Fernald and the editors of the Standard Dictionary set out to increase markedly the number of synonyms and antonyms at each entry. Hitherto, from two to eight words represented the norm in each of these lists: in the Standard Dictionary the average number lies between ten and twenty. First of all, they believed that they were justified in extending the definition of synonym to include both words of identical or closely allied meaning (the time-honored definition) and words which agree in some part of their meaning. The definition of synonym in the 1894 edition of the Standard Dictionary (slightly changed in the current edition) reads:

A word having the same or almost the same meaning as some other; oftener, one of a number of words that have one or more meanings in common, but that differ either in the range of application of those meanings or in having other senses not held in common; opposed to antonym. . . Words of this class may often be used interchangeably, but discrimination in their choice is one of the most important characteristics of a good writer.

The discriminating synonymy given at the entry of synonymous in the main vocabulary reads:

Syn. alike, correspondent, corresponding, equivalent, identical, interchangeable, like, same, similar, synonymic. In the strictest sense, synonymous words scarcely exist; rarely, if ever, are any two words in any language equivalent or identical in meaning; where a difference in meaning can not easily be shown, a difference in usage commonly exists, so that the words are not interchangeable. By synonymous words we usually understand words that coincide or nearly coincide in some part of their meaning, and may hence within certain limits be used interchangeably, while outside of those limits they may differ very greatly in meaning and use. It is the office of a work on synonyms to point out these correspondences and differences, that language may have the flexibility that comes from freedom of selection within the common limits, with the perspicuity and precision that result from exact choice of the fittest word to express each shade of meaning outside of the common limits. To consider synonymous words identical is fatal to accuracy; to forget that they are similar, to some extent equivalent, and sometimes interchangeable, is destructive of freedom and variety.

It is possible that definition and synonymy were designed to avoid provoking criticism from those who adhered to the commonly accepted definition of synonym yet at the same time to extend the sense to accord with what was believed to be Roget's practice and to satisfy the demands of those who urged more words. It may be granted that this is a legitimate practice, provided it does not force the issue but represents a genuine change in conception among a large, or even a small, class of those who use the term synonym. That the growing demand was for more synonyms cannot be questioned, but that a change in the conception of synonym had occurred, from the one that had been in vogue since Crabb's time, may justly be disputed. At any rate, let us see how it affected the Standard Dictionary's choice of synonyms. Two lists will illustrate its practice:

ADEQUATE able, adapted, capable, commensurate, competent, equal, fit, fitted, fitting, qualified, satisfactory, sufficient, suitable.

HARMONY accord, accordance, agreement, amity, concord, concurrence, conformity, congruity, consent, consistency, consonance, symmetry, unanimity, uniformity, union, unison, unity.

The Standard Dictionary's definition justifies the selection of such lists of "synonyms." Each is a word which has one or more meanings in common with the introductory word (adequate or harmony). But if adequate means exactly commensurate with the requirements, only sufficient and competent (in one of its senses) with the addition of enough approach it in content. A person may be adequate if he is able, capable, competent (in another sense), or qualified; a person or thing may be adequate if he or it is adapted, fitted, or suitable; a thing may be adequate if it is equal to the requirement by being fit or satisfactory: but in all these cases, he or it may also be more than adequate or less than adequate, in some way, or the question of adequacy may never arise. Harmony in its musical sense may be related to accord, concord, consonance, in its aesthetic sense to symmetry and other terms not in this list; but what relation there is between it and amity, uniformity, unanimity, agreement, concurrence, congruity, etc., except as a cause or result or concomitant, needs to be proved. A word-finding list may consist of terms which, by agreeing in some implications and connotations, overlap, for those lists serve their purpose in helping the user to locate his word. But when the object is discrimination, only those words serve the purpose whose basic likeness can be proved by showing that they have a common denotation as well as not readily discerned differences.

It is true that Fernald found no difficulty here. His clearest expression of the method of discrimination is found in the preface to his English Synonyms, Antonyms, and Prepositions:

The great source of vagueness, error, and perplexity in many discussions of synonyms is, that the writer merely associates stray ideas loosely connected with the different words, sliding from synonym to synonym with no definite point of departure or return, so that a smooth and at first sight pleasing statement really gives the mind no definite resting-place and no sure conclusion. A true discussion of synonyms is definition by comparison, and for this there must be something definite with which to compare. When the standard is settled, approximation or differentiation can be determined with clearness and certainty.

What type of synonymy Fernald was criticizing is not clear. It was probably what may be called "the chain-formula type." When a synonymist had made so poor a selection of synonyms that there could be no common ground, and his list presented an array of associated rather than synonymous terms, he often fell into the habit of giving a series of definitions with a factitious relation. A repetition of a previous word was usually enough to make a connection. This was the defect of certain synonymies into which all writers of articles, good as well as bad, fell at one time or another and is probably the type to which Fernald referred when he described the "easy sliding from synonym to synonym." Yet it is not always bad: when one word carries a general meaning, which serves as a substitute for the common denotation, it is possible to use it with good effect. A short example from The New Century Dictionary (1927) must suffice for the good use:

Banter is good humored jesting....Railery is often sharp, sarcastic banter; pleasantry, delicate and pleasant banter; badinage, diverting and purposeless banter; persiflage, light, frivolous, or flippant banter.

With lists such as Fernald's own it would be impossible to avoid this formula, unchanged. It was necessary for him to find some way of varying "the chain formula" so that he could secure the desired qualities, "unity of the group" and "some point of departure and return." Therefore, he devised the method whereby one word would be selected as the key word and all the other words should be compared or contrasted with it. A good example is afforded by his article at money:

money. Syn.: bills, bullion, capital, cash, coin, currency, funds, gold, notes, property, silver, specie. Money is the authorized medium of exchange; coined money is called coin or specie. What are termed in England bank-notes are in the United States commonly called bills; as, five-dollar bill. The notes of responsible men are readily transferable in commercial circles, but they are not money; as, the stock was sold for $500 in money and the balance in merchantable paper. Cash is specie or money in hand, or paid in hand; as, the cash account; the cash price. In the legal sense, property is not money, and money is not property; for property is that which has inherent value, while money, as such, has but representative value, and may or may not have intrinsic value. Bullion is either gold or silver uncoined, or the coined metal considered without reference to its coinage, but simply as merchandise, when its value as bullion may be very different from its value as money. The word capital is used chiefly of accumulated property or money invested in productive enterprises or available for such investment. Compare PROPERTY; WEALTH.

Nothing could be clearer than that these words are not synonyms in the generally accepted sense. They include names for kinds of money (coin, specie, bills), names of material used for money or, in figurative language, meaning money or wealth (gold, silver), and words denoting things that have some intimate association with money (bullion, property, capital). The article keeps more or less consistently before the reader the relation of these to the key word money. The reader is bound to see and understand the distinctions and carry away a unified impression. There can be no quarrel with such articles on the ground of their not giving useful information. It may even be argued that a discrimination of terms that coincide in some part of their meaning may be in itself a valuable thing. But neither justification touches the issue raised by the Fernald synonymies. The ground of valid objection to them is that they offer as synonyms many words which even by the loosest of definitions cannot be accepted as such. The point of absurdity is reached at spontaneous, where the key word is so important that voluntary and involuntary, free and instinctive, automatic and impulsive are included.

By 1909, the date of publication of the next complete revision of the Merriam-Webster dictionaries (the first edition of Webster's New International Dictionary), there had been time for consideration of these matters and for a more sober judgment. The Goodrich synonymies clearly needed revision on account of the growth of the language and, partly, because the synonym lists could be enriched. The work was entrusted to John Livingston Lowes (then a professor at Washington University, St. Louis, but later at Harvard University) under the advisory supervision of Professor George Lyman Kittredge of Harvard. They were to deal only with general senses, but a few technical articles written by specialists were to be submitted to them, so as to insure uniformity in manner and method. The articles thus prepared were included in Webster's New International Dictionary and reprinted, with minor changes, in Webster's New International Dictionary, Second Edition (1934).

Certain points of agreement were established by Lowes and Kittredge early in the course of their partnership. Very early in the writing of these articles Lowes called Kittredge's attention to the Fernald list at adequate (see p. xxi, above) and the Century list, adequate, sufficient, enough.

"Is not the Century's list adequate?" he wrote. "I did not notice the test my question affords, but none of the other words in the Standard's list can be substituted for 'adequate.' Are they not better distributed among other articles? The longer I study the material, the more strongly I feel that more articles, each discriminating fewer words, are advisable. The longer articles are, as a matter of fact, confusing, and seem to have led often to strained attempts to find a single common factor for words which fall more naturally into several groups. What is your opinion?"

Kittredge answered briefly: "Yes. I agree fully."⁶

Thus, very early it was established that the Webster tradition of discriminating synonyms, which are synonyms in the accepted sense, be followed. Looser synonyms, or closely related words, were still given in the word-finding lists and these also were revised by Lowes, whose interests, however, were concentrated on the articles discriminating synonyms.

By temperament and training, Professor Lowes was especially fitted for the task assigned him. He excels all his predecessors in philosophic grasp and powers of analysis, yet he never confuses synonymizing with philosophizing or moralizing; he outstrips them all in the range of his knowledge of literature and of his contacts with language as the medium of expressing ideas and emotions; great scholar though he is, his work is utterly free of the pedantry, dogmatism, and heaviness that so often mars the work of lesser men. Though not a lexicographer by training or experience, he almost perfectly adapted the art of synonymizing to the science of lexicography, so that whatever can contribute in either to the advantage of the other was brought out in his articles.

It is in the clarification of the differences between terms that are to a large extent equivalent in denotation that Lowes made the greatest advances in the art of synonymizing. Practically every synonymist before him had inklings of the kinds of differences that he saw clearly; many of them, such as Miss Whately, had used the language adopted by him, but no one so fully realized its possibilities. Rambling, persistent missing of the real differences, and constant confusion of the content of the word itself with the concept for which that word stood, were characteristic and prevalent faults of many earlier writers of synonymies. With Lowes, direct attack at each problem became possible and, with it, swift, sure shafts that rarely fail to make the desired cleavage.

It may be said that as a rule he was careful in his synonymies to state the ground of agreement; but sometimes he neglected to do so when the likeness was obvious. But in regard to differences he was extremely particular and rarely departed from the aim he held before him. His most frequently used method may be illustrated by an excerpt from the article at foretell in Webster's New International Dictionary (1909):

Foretell (Saxon) and predict (Latin) are frequently interchangeable; but predict is now commonly used when inference from facts (rather than occult processes) is involved; as, "Some sorcerer . . . had foretold, dying, that none of all our blood should know the shadow from the substance" (Tennyson); "Mr. Brooke's conclusions were as difficult to predict as the weather" (G. Eliot); an astronomer predicts the return of a comet. Prophecy connotes inspired or mysterious knowledge, or great assurance of prediction; as, "ancestral voices prophesying war" (Coleridge); "Wrinkled benchers often talked of him approvingly, and prophesied his rise" (Tennyson). Forecast connotes conjecture rather than inference; presage implies shrewd forecast, sometimes presentiment or warning; as, "Who shall so forecast the years" (Tennyson); "I presage, unless the country make an alarm, the cause is lost" (Scott)....Forebode...implies obscure prescience or premonition (esp. of evil); portend..., threatening or ominous foretokening; as, "His heart forebodes a mystery" (Tennyson); "My father put on the countenance which always portends a gathering storm" (Richardson).

If we supply the common denotation of all these words — "to indicate what will happen," — the difference lies in other ideas involved in their meaning. In each case, this difference forms part of the word's definition, the other part of which will be the common denotation. Indeed, although the dictionary definition may be presented from another point of view, a good and fair definition may be made according to this method. The synonymist, however, should find it the best method when his job is merely to show how far a group of words agree and then to point out their individual differences. Other methods are conceivable, indeed some are necessary in special cases, but as yet no better method has been devised for the general run of synonyms. Miss Whately is largely responsible for it, but Lowes has greatly improved it.

It was (and is), however, impossible always to be equally exact, clear, and direct. This is especially true when the differences are less a matter of meaning than of coloring, as by historical and literary associations, or a matter of idiomatic usage. The difference in coloring or, in other terms, the difference in connotations—is especially difficult, requiring not only great knowledge but fine perceptions, imagination, and taste. Few would dare to attempt to distinguish connotations, but Lowes, whose feeling for these differences is not equaled by any synonymist, is especially successful in their handling. Many of these could not be incorporated in a dictionary definition, but they must be felt if the word is to be used with the accumulated power that has been stored in it. A particularly effective synonymy of this type is to be found at idiot.

Idiot, imbecile, fool, simpleton are here compared esp. in their connotations; for technical distinctions, see defs. Idiot (a learned word become popular) implies absence, commonly congenital, of intellectual or reasoning powers; it is often less strictly used to characterize one who is felt to have acted with utter stupidity; imbecile (less common as a popular term) implies great mental feebleness or (in its looser derogatory sense) entire fatuity; fool, the more vigorous word, is wholly popular, and frequently suggests lack of sense or wisdom rather than of brains; from its Biblical use, it still connotes, in elevated style, grave, pitying, or scathing condemnation; in colloquial usage, as a term of contempt, it is strongly offensive; simpleton (also wholly popular) implies silliness or (sometimes) unsophisticatedness; it is often used lightly as a term of indulgent contempt; as, "He said you were... a senseless, driveling idiot" (Wycherly); "What an idiot am I, to wait here for a fellow who probably takes a delight in mortifying me" (Goldsmith); "custom's idiot sway" (Cowper); cf. an idiotic grin; "The petty passions, the imbecile desires... daily moving her contempt" (G. Eliot); "She's a fool to stay behind her father" (Shak.); "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread" (Pope); "They look upon persons employing their time in making verses... as simpletons easily to be deceived" (J. Knorr); poor, innocent little simpleton! "The 'Great simpleton'... of Mr. Newman, and the 'Thou fool' of the Bible, are something alike; but 'Thou fool' is very grand, and 'Great simpleton!' is unatrocious. So too... Shakespeare's 'Poor venomous fool, be angry and dispatch!' is in the grand style" (M. Arnold)....

Differences in idiomatic usage are oftentimes not a matter that can easily be presented by definition. Many terms in a dictionary are defined almost in the same words, though written by various editors, the only clue to difference consisting in the illustrations. The consultant is often at a loss, because he does not see that these examples may constitute the only uses of the term, or a few such uses, and are not representative of a large number of uses. It was in such cases that the method which we have called (p. viii, above) the Piozzi method (from Mrs. Piozzi, its originator) was first used, but without a full understanding of its dangers and limitations. Lowes avoided this method except where he was dealing with fixed idioms. Then he safeguarded his statement with a parenthetical elimination such as "one ascends (not mounts) a mountain; one mounts (not ascends) a horse." The sparing use of this method did not, however, lead to his ignoring the problem presented by such synonyms as are definable in almost identical terms yet are incapable of discrimination in implications and connotations. To get at his method, let us examine parts of certain synonymies where his effectiveness is most apparent:

One excuses (either as a superior or as an equal) small faults, minor omissions, or neglects, esp. in social or conventional obligations; one pardons (as a superior, or by act of mercy or generosity) serious faults, crimes, or grave offenses, esp. against laws or morals; as, to excuse an unintentional oversight, an absence from a required exercise; "Excuse my glove" (Sheridan); to pardon a thief; to pardon a theft; "Apollo, pardon my great profaneness 'gainst thine oracle" (Shak.).

Stop...applies primarily to action, or to that which is thought of as moving; cease applies also to states and conditions, or to that which is thought of as being; as, a train stops, but does not cease; the noise it makes both stops and ceases; one's love may cease, but scarcely stop.

Fast and rapid are often used without distinction; but fast frequently applies to the moving object, whereas rapid is apt to characterize or suggest the movement itself; as, a fast horse, a fast train, boat; a rapid current, gait, progress.

Hateful and odious are sometimes used with little distinction. But hateful more frequently applies to that which excites actual hatred, odious, to that which is excessively disagreeable, or which awakens repugnance; as, "Why shouldn't we hate what is hateful in people, and scorn what is mean?" (Thackeray) . . . "There was something more odious to him in her friendship than her hatred" (Thackeray).

In these discriminations, the original contribution of Lowes is the generalization regarding usage or application. An occasional synonymist before him had experimented with it, but no one before him succeeded. He knows how to guard the expression, never claims too much, and yet, in spite of all the difficulties involved, makes statements that are just and therefore convincing. There seems to have been no inclination on his part to overstate the case. If there must be inexactness, he preferred it on the side of understatement. "This is as much as it is safe to say" was a not infrequent comment of his.⁶

Much more could be said about the interesting technique developed by Lowes. Much more could also be said about other excellences and some defects which characterize his work. But when all is said and done there still remains his superiority as a discriminator, as manifested in his selection of methods according to his material. Whether his synonyms differed in implications, in connotations, or in applications or, more probably, some in one way, some in another, he was seldom at a loss.

Just a word about antonyms. There is no evidence at hand⁷ to prove that Lowes was ever asked to enter antonyms in Webster's New International Dictionary. He did, however, incorporate a few (though not by that name) in his articles under the general formula of "opposed to . . .," when the difference between synonyms (usually very general ones) could be apprehended more easily by knowing the term which was the direct opposite of each. He does this several times, as at base, where base is "opposed to high-minded," vile is "opposed to pure, noble," and mean is "opposed to generous, magnanimous." It is possible to guess his definition of antonym, but no more. The addition of antonyms and the revision of Lowes's word-finding lists were made by an office editor for Webster's New International Dictionary, Second Edition (1934).

There is no need to go further in the history of synonymy. Further synonymists⁸ there have been, some very good, some not quite so good, and some very bad; but they have all taken sides, either with those who support the traditional definition of synonym as one of two or more words having the same essential meaning, or with those who favor its extension to one of two or more words which coincide in some part of their meaning. There has been no compromise: it might even be said that the break has scarcely been noticed. Nevertheless, it is apparent that, unless there be some clarification in definitions, especially of synonym and antonym, the prevailing popular misunderstanding will increase—with what results no one can estimate. This clarification we propose to undertake in the essays that follow.

It is because we firmly believe in the values implicit in the study of synonyms, antonyms, and word-finding lists (in this book divided into analogous words and contrasted words) that this Dictionary has been written. We hope, therefore, that it not only carries some steps forward the admirable work accomplished by Goodrich and Lowes, but that it removes some sources of confusion or perplexity which have arisen outside of their work. The old defect inherent in synonymies, the overuse of illustration without a sufficient background in differences of implications (which we have called, above, the Piozzi method), has not entirely disappeared from more recent writing, but, at least, the snake was scotched by the publishers' preface of the 1859 edition of Webster's Dictionary. In its place has come an uncertainty in the definitions of synonym and antonym which is even more insidious. In the three essays that follow, we shall, therefore, make clear our own position. In the first of these essays (pp. xxvi-xxviii), we shall define synonym briefly, in order to show what effect that definition has had on our choice of words to be discriminated and on the technique of discrimination. In the second (pp. xxviii-xxxii), we shall define antonym at length, for the reason that this term has never been clearly examined and that the definitions in the major dictionaries are all at variance with Smith's tentative definition and with the selections of many of his successors. In the third (p. xxxiii), we shall explain our aims and practices with respect to the word-finding lists.

SYNONYM: ANALYSIS AND DEFINITION

The chief reason for including in this Introduction an article on synonyms is not to phrase a new definition of that term. It is rather to make a protest as to the loosening of the definition within the last fifty or sixty years and to restate very clearly what we believe to be the true and generally accepted meaning. In addition, we shall show briefly the effect of this definition upon our method.

For approximately one hundred years in the history of English synonymy there was very little real difference of opinion as to what a synonym is, or as to what words should be the material of discrimination. It is true that John Trusler discriminated "words esteemed synonymous," Mrs. Piozzi "words apparently synonymous," and Miss Whately "pseudo-synonyms." Roget, who held that discrimination was foreign to his purpose, claimed that "the investigation of the distinctions to be drawn between words apparently synonymous, forms a separate branch of inquiry." Nevertheless, all four made a distinction between true, or actual, synonyms (that is, words identical in meaning), and the terms which they discriminated or, in the case of Roget, which were discriminable (that is, terms that are so nearly alike that they appear to be synonyms). For all practical purposes, however, the words which were discriminated were not at all different from the "words closely allied" in meaning between which, according to Crabb, it is the business of the synonymist "to mark the nice shades of distinction"; nor is there any clash with Soule's simple definition of a synonym as that which has "the same meaning as" the entry word under which it is listed "or a meaning very nearly the same."

It is also true that these synonymists did not always agree in their choice of synonyms. In part, this was due to some confusion as to the limits of their scope, but mostly it is the result of conditions which still, to a degree, prevail. Some advances have been made in precision, but the truth was and is that there are too many factors entering into the selection of synonyms to make for absolute certainty or perfect accuracy in their choice. But these synonymists were not so far wrong as William Perry, who accepted Johnson's "proximate words" as synonyms and made no distinction between them in reference to sense. The failure of his Synonymous . . . Dictionary may be ascribed to this cause.

The error Perry made has renewed itself, though with slightly more justification. This renewal, also, is initially the result of the misinterpretation of a highly popular work, Roget's Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases, and of a belief that Roget presented two lists of terms, those that were alike (synonyms) and those that were opposed. It was to give voice to this interpretation that Charles J. Smith coined the word "antonym" for the opposed terms and gave to the world in 1867 his small book A Complete Collection of Synonyms and Antonyms (see p. xvii, above). But because he was not following Roget in the arrangement of his material, choosing the dictionary (alphabetical) method rather than the classificatory method, he defined synonym (and antonym) in such a way that it would apply to Roget's lists (so far as they were of the same part of speech) and to his own. Synonyms are, in Smith's definition, "words which agree in expressing one or more characteristic ideas in common" (with the entered word). It is possible that he believed he was more careful in his selection than Roget. In line with his definition, he gives lists of synonyms such as that at accelerate, which are, it is true, less diverse than Roget's, but which are still susceptible of criticism as synonyms. There are, for example, some that are not questionable, such as speed, quicken, and hasten, but there are others such as promote, urge, expedite, facilitate, and dispatch, which are open to question. Accelerate means to make go faster: so do speed, hasten, and quicken. But promote, for example, stresses aid given in attaining an end, and only occasionally implies to make go faster; urge throws the emphasis upon the force that impels rather than upon the result, which usually, but not always, is to make go faster; expedite stresses the removal of impediments so that a progress or process is not delayed longer than is necessary or normal, and therefore usually means to make go faster than it might. But in all these three cases, a making go faster may or may not be implied; if implied, this notion is subordinate to the main implication of the word. Agreement "in one or more ideas" is a poor basis for the selection of synonyms, for these may or may not form a part of the essential meaning.

As the demand grew for a large number of synonyms, even agreement in one or more characteristic ideas tended to break down. Twenty-five and more years later, certain synonymists of repute were offering groups of words as synonyms of one word rather than of one another and were not restricting those words to one sense of their key term. For instance, one synonymist of this period gave as the synonyms of stain, blot, color, discolor, disgrace, dishonor, dye, soil, spot, sully, tarnish, tinge, tint. It is true that not all are discriminated, blot, disgrace, dishonor, soil, spot, sully, tarnish, and tint being omitted, but even so, they are all given in alphabetical order as synonyms and without explanation. In the list as it stands, some words are synonyms of stain in the sense of to discolor, some in the sense of to impart color to or suffuse with color, and some in the sense of to bring reproach upon; but others have only a slight idea in common with stain in one of its senses. Such lists are far from rare in the very late nineteenth century or the early twentieth century: to the consultant who seeks another and closer word for the one which occurs to him, they must be hopelessly confusing. They have no value in teaching the precise use of language: their only merit is to indicate some of the words which may be used when one feels the need of a word like stain in any of its senses.

It is against a definition so loose as that favored by Smith, or implied by others who went even further, that this book makes a protest. In line with the tradition of the Merriam-Webster dictionaries, we believe that such a definition is destructive of all the values that have come to be recognized in synonyms. We hold that only by a clear return to something like the time-honored definition can we conserve these values and recognize a synonym when we see it. To emphasize this aim, we propose in this Dictionary to restate that definition fully and unequivocally so that none of the loopholes may be left through which some synonymists have escaped, and to tighten the method of discrimination, so that it will be very clear at points where even the best of synonymists have, in the past, unconsciously permitted vagueness.

A synonym, in this Dictionary, will always mean one of two or more words in the English language which have the same or very nearly the same essential meaning. This is not a matter of mere likeness in meaning, for words may have some implications (ideas involved in their meaning) in common and yet not be synonymous. It is rather a likeness in denotation, which may be inadequately defined as the meaning which includes all the important implications, but which is more strictly defined as the meaning or signification of a term as expressed in its definition. The denotation must include more than a summary of implications: it must indicate the part of speech and the relations of the ideas involved in a term's meaning. Synonyms, therefore, are only such words as may be defined wholly, or almost wholly, in the same terms. Usually, they are distinguished from one another by an added implication or connotation, or they may differ in their idiomatic use or in their application. They may be, and usually are, interchangeable within limits, but interchangeability is not the final test, since idiomatic usage is often a preventive of that. The only satisfactory test of synonyms is their agreement in denotation. This agreement is seldom so perfect as to make the words absolutely identical in meaning, but it is always so clear that the two or more words which are synonyms can be defined in the same terms up to a certain point.

Consequently, the statement of this common denotation is of the greatest importance. In the discriminating articles in this Dictionary it is, as a general rule, presented in the first sentence, but sometimes when there is need of a preliminary statement it is put in the second sentence. For example, at nice, the common denotation of the words to be discriminated (nice, dainty, fastidious, finical, particular, fussy, squeamish) is given as "exacting or displaying exacting standards as in selection, judgment, workmanship, or the like"; at object (where object, protest, remonstrate, expostulate, kick are discriminated) it is "to oppose something such as a course, a procedure, a policy, or a project, especially by making known one's arguments against it"; at delusion (where delusion, illusion, hallucination, mirage are discriminated) it is "something which is believed to be or accepted as true or real, but which is actually false or unreal." Each of these sentences is so worded that the part of speech of the words discriminated is made clear. For example, the wording is in the form of a definition of an adjective where the words discriminated are adjectives, in the form of a definition of a verb where the words discriminated are verbs. Some of these synonyms have other senses than the one here given, but in each such meaning the word has other synonyms and another common denotation. A distinct attempt, it may be said here, has been made to select synonyms according to their range of meaning. It has not always been possible to do so, since, occasionally, the more general word has no synonyms except more specific words (cf. let in the list: let, allow, permit, suffer, leave). As a rule, however, a division between words of wide range and words of narrow range of meaning has been made, because it permits a more definite denotation for the narrower terms and makes for closer agreement and fewer differences. It is for this reason that we have separated the general terms for a political or legal agreement (agreement, accord, understanding) from those that are very explicit (contract, bargain, compact, pact, treaty, etc.), and have separated the general terms large, big, great from terms which specify unusual size (enormous, immense, huge, vast, etc.) and from terms which imply size and impressiveness (grand, magnificent, imposing, stately, etc.). But the difference between groups of synonyms is not always dependent on generality: it often implies a different emphasis or a different combination of implications. There have been many times when it was a serious question whether to add a word as a synonym to one group or to another, the arguments on both sides being of equal cogency. In such cases (as, for example, hellish and fendish) the decision has usually depended on many factors, such as basic rather than derived meaning and the fact that, if certain words were treated separately, terms which are synonyms of one, but not of the other, could be added. For many reasons, the problem of selecting synonyms has not been an easy one, but we have always tried to base our judgment upon evidence that was not affected by any personal prejudices or predilections.

Not all the words discriminated in this Dictionary are synonyms. A few articles discuss a group of words that are sometimes wrongly taken as synonyms because they are confused or their actual meanings are misunderstood or because they once had one or more meanings which made them synonymous. In articles discussing such words, the reason for their not being synonyms, whatever it may be, is stated clearly and unambiguously in the first or second sentence of the article. We have added these groups not merely because we believe them useful, but because we believe that they come rightly within the province of the discriminator.

The method of discrimination is not invariable, for every set of synonyms presents its own problems. But, in general, the points of distinction are in: (1) implications — here, mostly minor ideas involved in the meaning of the word; (2) connotations — the ideas which color the word's meaning and are the product of various influences, such as etymology, language of origin, and historical and literary association; (3) applications — the restrictions in a word's use as prescribed by idiom or in accordance with the nature of the other words with which it may be associated, as when an adverb may be used to modify only certain kinds of verbs, or when a verb may take only certain kinds of nouns as its subject or its object. Not all of the words discriminated in a single article differ in only one of these ways, however: some may differ in implications, some in connotations, some in applications, and some in more than one way. For no method adopted by the discriminator should be so artificial as to foster merely theoretical distinctions. The distinctions drawn should be real distinctions based on the evidence of recorded use — and it is such evidence, we cannot too strongly emphasize, that has guided the editors of this Dictionary and has determined the distinctions set forth in its discriminating articles.

ANTONYM: ANALYSIS AND DEFINITION

There are probably few words more generally used with less understanding of their meaning than the word antonym. True, all the dictionaries define it, but often in such terms that the definition may be interpreted to include radically different conceptions. Is an antonym theoretically only one word, or, at the most, one of two or three words, which can be opposed to another word in a definite sense or is it any one of several words which may be opposed to it or to a group of synonymous terms? Probably because the latter conception is the easier one it has gained widespread acceptance, but still the dictionary definitions incline to back up the opinion of those who think of an antonym in the abstract as something more specialized and nearer to the former conception.

No one will dispute the right of a person to coin a term that fills a definite need or to give to that term the meaning he desires — provided such definition accords with the term's etymology. Where it does not accord, however, the meaning may fairly be questioned — as in the case of antonym. For C. J. Smith who, in his . . . Synonyms and Antonyms (1867), introduced this term (which, in his own phrasing, "he has ventured, not to coin, but to reissue") adopted it primarily because of its analogy to synonym and knew that only by considerable stretching could the meaning he proposed for it be made to approach the meaning of its Greek original. Despite his recognition of this fact, the term seemed to Smith preferable to counterterm, though he acknowledged that some persons might still prefer the latter. As for definition, he related synonym and antonym. "Words," he wrote, "which agree in expressing one or more characteristic ideas in common [that is, with a given term] he has regarded as Synonyms, those which negative one or more such ideas he has called Antonyms."

Therefore, no one is likely to dispute the right of a later investigator to examine anew the meaning of a coined word falsely grounded and vaguely defined that has become established in the language. In fact, there is not only the right but a duty on the part of such an investigator when, as in the case of antonym, he finds that there is a great difference between the theory, as manifested in the definition, and the practice, as manifested in selection. There will always be strict constructionists and loose constructionists but, in this case at least, the difference is more apparent than real, for many of the latter have been forced into this position by the practical difficulties confronting them in the selection of antonyms, rather than by indifference to the concept involved.

frequently with such qualifying words as exact and true (the "exact antonym" of this word; the "true antonym"), we must suspect an attempt on the part of men to approximate an ideal.

Modern unabridged dictionaries, without exception, define antonym with comparative strictness. It is "a word of opposite meaning" (Webster's New International Dictionary, Second Edition), "a term which is the opposite or antithesis of another, a counter-term" (Oxford English Dictionary), "a word directly opposed to another in meaning; a counterterm: the opposite of synonym" (Funk and Wagnalls New Standard Dictionary), "a counterterm; an opposite; an antithetical word: the opposite of synonym" (Century Dictionary), and "a word that is an opposite in meaning of a particular word" (New Century Dictionary). In all of these definitions, the burden is on the word opposite or opposed; and, it should be added, all differences of opinion as to the criteria for determining antonyms are due to uncertainty as to what is meant by opposite or opposed. The physical connotations of these words always stand in the way of a strict definition of their abstract senses. How complex is the concept of opposition may be seen from the following analysis of its physical connotations.

Opposition is a relation involved when two things are so placed that: (1) they may be connected by a straight line (straightness as distinguished from obliquity being determined by external conditions such as the lines of a room) drawn from one to another (as, opposite windows); (2) they lie at either end of an axis, diameter, or the like (as, opposite points on the earth's surface); (3) they are contiguous but reversed in position (as, the opposite halves of the globe); (4) they face each other, the distance apart being of no consequence (as, partners stand opposite); (5) they depart or diverge from each other (as, to go their opposite ways); (6) they work against each other (as, opposite forces); (7) they cannot exist together, because they reverse or undo each other (as, the opposite processes of growth and decay); (8) they represent the obverse and the reverse (as, the opposite faces of a coin).

What this relation is both materially and immaterially and in all instances is, frankly, hard to determine. It is not invariably the confrontation of one with another, for "persons who go their opposite ways" and "the opposite processes of growth and decay," for example, do not respond to this test; it is hardly complete divergence or difference, for "the opposite halves of the globe" and "the opposite faces of a coin" represent difference only in one or more particulars, otherwise remaining fundamentally alike; it is still less antagonism or irreconcilability, for there is no hint of either in the opposite position of partners in a dance or in opposite windows. Although some of these ideas exist as implications distinguishing meanings of the word opposite, they do not yield any fundamental meaning which is involved in every sense. One can go no further than to say that opposite represents a setting of one thing against another so as to sharpen their differences or to reveal their divergencies.

It will be necessary, therefore, to get at what is meant by "opposite meaning" in another way. First, let us take the words listed as antonyms in the dictionaries and manuals of synonyms and antonyms and see into what classifications they fall. When possible, we shall offer a classification known to logic, but when not possible, we shall form our own, naming it in unambiguous terms.

A large number of words listed as antonyms fall into two well-known logical categories, those of contradictory terms (or contradictories) and contrary terms (or contraries).

(1) Contradictory terms are so opposed to each other that they are mutually exclusive and admit no possibility between them. If either is true, the other must be false; if either is false, the other must be true. Examples:—A thing is either perfect or imperfect: no matter how slight or how extensive the imperfection, the fact remains that the thing cannot be called perfect if any flaw, blemish, or defect exists. If a person is asked for his opinion, he may agree with that of others, or he may disagree, or differ: it is unimportant whether the disagreement is radical or superficial or the difference concerns a major or a very minor point; he cannot be said to agree.

(2) Contrary terms are so opposed in meaning that the language admits no greater divergence. They are the true "diametrical opposites." But they must be of, or must apply to things of, the same genus or fundamental kind. Thus, white and black represent the extremes in color, the former, as popularly understood, implying the absorption of all colors and the latter implying the privation of every vestige of color. Prodigal and parsimonious represent extremes in expenditure (chiefly of money), but prodigal implies excessive extravagance and parsimonious excessive frugality. Superiority and inferiority represent extremes judged by a standard of what is good. Between these extremes represented by each of these pairs of examples, there are many words which may more truly describe or designate the person or thing in question.

Other classes are the following:

(3) Many words are listed as antonyms that normally appear in pairs. Some are what the logician calls relative terms, pairs of words which indicate such a relationship that one of them cannot be used without suggesting the other; as, parent and child, husband and wife, predecessor and successor, employee and employer. Others are complementary terms involving, usually, a reciprocal relation or the incompleteness of one unless the other follows; as, question and answer, attack and defend, stimulus and response.

(4) An important class of words sometimes listed in antonymies may be called for want of a better name reverse terms: these comprise adjectives or adverbs which signify a quality, or verbs or nouns which signify an act or state, that reverse or undo the quality, act, or state of the other. Although they are neither contradictory nor contrary terms, they present a clear opposition. Their addition is usually justified in this way: if the antonym of admit is reject, what shall we do with eject which implies not the negative, but the reverse of admit; if the antonym of destructive is harmless, must we ignore constructive, which goes further and implies either the reverse or the undoing of destructive? Many words of the reverse type are often equal in value, sometimes they are even stronger than the first.

(5) There is still a class of words listed as antonyms, which are neither contradictories nor contraries nor reverse terms, which do, however, present a sharp contrast—for example, such pairs as rich and destitute, dry and moist, and keep and abandon. This is one of the most perplexing of classes and one that appears very frequently in antonym lists. Such words may be designated contrasted terms. We shall return to them later (see p. xxxi).

(6) The last class of so-called antonyms is very inclusive. Words in this class might be called “loosely contrasted terms,” since, when they are presented side by side with the word of which they are given as antonyms, they never fully clash but show a difference in only a small part of their meaning (as, abstruse and superficial, frank and hypocritical, vigilant and careless). For the sake of uniformity, however, we shall call them incompatibles, for they usually cannot both at the same time be said of, or applied to, the same person or thing. Frank means open and free in one’s talk and uninhibited by any restraints, such as fear, whereas hypocritical means presenting an appearance of being other, and usually better, than one is; abstruse means so remote from the range of ordinary human experience that there is difficulty in comprehension, while superficial, in this limited sense, means not penetrating below the surface or exterior so as to unveil what lies behind. So put there is not the slightest sign of a clash in meaning, yet the difference which confuses, though slight, is there, for the person who is called frank gives the appearance of sincerity and the person who is called hypocritical is adjudged insincere. Similarly, a work that is spoken of as abstruse differs from a work that is spoken of as superficial in that the one is profound, the other shallow. It is sincere and insincere (not frank and hypocritical), and profound and shallow (not abstruse and superficial) which clash in meaning. Since this class is based upon a mistake in analysis, it will be eliminated from the discussion.

If, then, we were to make a definition of antonym according to the type of word which dictionaries and manuals select as such, it would be phrased something like this: “An antonym is a word that so differs from another word that it represents its contradictory, its contrary, its relative (or counterpart), its complement, its reverse, its contrasted term, or its incompatible in some way or degree.”

That this is too inclusive a definition is obvious. No one, it seems fair to state, would define in terms as broad as this the word antonym as it is understood in concept; yet everyone who has made it his business to select antonyms is aware of the dangers involved and of the difficulty in avoiding the questionable types. An easygoing attitude is not chiefly responsible for this wide diversity. The English language was clearly not made to measure: it was not devised to show likenesses or differences. The discovery both of words which are closely alike and of words which are sharply different is, for the most part, the product of the need for expressing ideas or of understanding expressed ideas. No mechanical shaping power sets words right before men begin to use them.

It must be remembered that the task of selecting antonyms is imposed upon a living structure, in a desire to know its resources and so far as possible bend it to our needs. The selection not only of antonyms but also of synonyms is similar, at least in aim, to the scientist’s classification of animals into orders, families, genera, and species. Both help us in the understanding and mastery of the material involved. When an old system breaks down in its study of the animal world, a new one must arise. None is perfect, but each is a help in bringing within the range of human understanding something that would otherwise be too vast for study and beyond the range of experience of any one man. So we proceed to study synonyms, words which closely resemble each other not in particular ways but in the very heart of their meaning, that we may know them better and use them more wisely, more precisely, more effectively, or the like.

We should like to do the same thing with antonyms. It is good, we feel, to know the exact antonym of a word, for not only will it give us a firmer grasp of the meaning of the word to which it is opposed but inversely, of itself. Is there any test that will help us in discovering such words, that we may be enabled not only to speak and to write more expressively but to have a richer understanding of the pages of men who have known how to express themselves?

There is a word in Smith’s definition of antonym which may give us the clue, “those [words] which negative one or more such ideas he has called Antonyms." In fact, even today, some persons argue that an antonym is "the exact negative" of a word. It is not clear just what this is intended to mean. Taken quite literally and expressed in the phraseology of logic an "exact negative" is a word's contradictory term. But this is too narrow, as even those who vigorously support this definition must agree. By the terms of its definition, a word's contradictory must be the equivalent in meaning of its not-compound. Otherwise the two terms (a word and its contradictory) could not be mutually exclusive. Let us see this in tabular form.

word	not-compound	contradictory
colored	not-colored	colorless
perfect	not-perfect	imperfect
agree	not-agree	disagree or differ

So put, it is obvious that there is no disagreement between the not-term and contradictory: in this case the negative and the opposite agree. The trouble comes, however, with the naming of the antonym. As a matter of practical policy, if we accept the "exact negative" as the antonym, we must restrict ourselves to the very few contradictories which have an independent form, and to the very few in-, un-, dis- and similar compounds which are obviously contradictory terms. But if we wish completeness, we must supply antonyms for the vast majority of English words by constructing a not-form. That might do in logic, but it would not do when greater knowledge of the English language exists as our clear aim. Moreover, we feel the lack of the clash that gives so much savor to the antonym.

On the other hand, it is clear that the other terms listed as antonyms do not equal the "exact negative." The logical contradictory of white (not-white) may include any chromatic color or any other achromatic color, yet the contrary, or diametrical opposite, is only black; the logical contradictory of parsimonious (not-parsimonious) may include many terms, such as liberal, extravagant, prodigal, yet the contrary, or diametrical opposite, is prodigal; not-liking may include both indifference and aversion, but no one will question that aversion is the contrary of liking. Even more obvious is the difference between the logical contradictory and the relative or the complementary term, for in this case they neither represent nor include the same thing. Not-attack, for example, does not equal defend; not-husband is not the equivalent of wife; and not-stimulus does not in any way approach response.

More important than relative and complementary terms (most of which may be doubted, with good reason, to be the antonyms of each other) are the terms which take a reverse as the opposite. While the not-term in these cases often equals or includes a word that is called the term's antonym, it is never equivalent with what may be called the "reverse antonym." For instance, not-admit equals reject, but it does not cover the reverse of admit, which may be either eject or expel: not-abandon may include keep, but it cannot be interpreted to cover the reverse of abandon, which is reclaim.

One class of words listed as antonyms remains for our consideration, contrasted terms (see p. xxx, above). As has been said, this class covers a large number of words the listing of which as antonyms puzzles rather than enlightens the reader. It is easy to prove that they cannot be "exact negatives." For example, keep, which is often given as the antonym of abandon, is not its contradictory, for the logical contradictory (not-keep) also includes sell, lose, give away, and many other words; rich is not the contradictory of destitute, for the logical contradictory not-rich includes needy, indigent, poor, comfortable, and many other terms as well as destitute. But this does not get at the heart of the matter and display what is wrong with these terms. Obviously also, they are not contraries, for they do not represent extremes of divergence as do parsimonious and prodigal or white and black. What is the matter with them? In answering this question, we shall find the clue to the solution of our problem.

Superficially viewed, these contrasted terms differ sharply in some part, but not in all parts, of their meaning. They do not clash full force. One term covers more ground than the other, or one term is more explicit in its implications than the other. The logician would say that they equal each other neither in extension nor in intension. Put more simply, they differ (1) in their range of application or applicability, one being general, the other specific, or one being more inclusive or less inclusive than the other, and (2) in their depth of meaning — that is, in the number and quality of implications contained in the terms. It is clear that keep is more general than abandon and that to equal it in generality and at the same time to negative (or, much better, to negate) its implications, relinquish would be a better choice: it is clear that abandon has more specific implications than are found in keep, such as surrender of possession or control and relegation to the mercy of others, and that a word which exactly equates these implications in number and quality, yet, at the same time, negates them, must be the true antonym. There seems to be no term that fills these demands except a "reverse term," one that undoes what has been accomplished by the act of abandoning. That term is reclaim in its definite sense of regaining control or possession of something and giving it full care and attention. Rich is too broad and general to pair with the very explacit destitute. There are many implications in the latter which have no clear parallel in rich. Only poor could be opposed to rich in breadth of extension and in vagueness of intension, because rich suggests more possessions than one needs, and poor suggests fewer possessions than one requires and so negates in full the meaning of the other. On the other hand, opulent could be opposed to destitute in narrowness of extension and in explicitness of intension, for destitute suggests the miserable condition where one is deprived of all that is needed for bare existence, and opulent the felicitous condition where everything that is desired is possessed in abundance. Though rich and poor come close together (the dividing line being marked by such a word as comfortable) and destitute and opulent are very far apart, being in fact "diametrical opposites," each represents the negation of the other.

In this way, wet, because it equals dry in range of meaning and negates dry in number and quality of implications, is the antonym of dry, whereas damp and moist are merely contrasted terms to dry; alleviate for the same reasons is the antonym of aggravate, and mitigate, assuage, and allay are nothing more than contrasted terms; elevation in the sense of promotion is the antonym of degradation in the sense of demotion, for it contains implications not found in preferment or advancement.

In selecting antonyms, therefore, one should be on guard to match in range of meaning the word from which one starts, and to negate every one of its implications, so that the opposition is complete. Otherwise the opposing words do not clash full force, one word covering more or less ground than the other or exhibiting differences not apparent in the other. It is for this reason that in this Dictionary we have preferred to give contrasted words as distinct from antonyms, not denying or ignoring the value of the former in word study, but emphasizing the unique, disciplinary value of the latter.

It is for a similar reason that we have ruled out relative and complementary terms as antonyms of each other. Pairs of words of this class are, it is true, usually matched in extension, but one of the pair seldom negates the intension of the other. Rather they suggest union, convergence, or completion when taken together. Husband and wife, employer and employee are different elements in a combination, which we may call opposites, not in the sense of negating each other, but of fulfilling each other. The same is true of stimulus and response, of question and answer. Without the former, the latter could not be: without the latter, the former remains incomplete. An occasional instance, however, remains, such as attack and defend. Since these come as close to reverse terms as they do to complementary terms, they may be treated as the former.

The foregoing analysis would seem to leave us with three classes as possible antonyms: contradictory, contrary, and reverse terms. It is true that, in general, all antonyms may be fitted into each of these classes. But, as the first two classes are the creation of logicians, who are dealing with symbols rather than with words, they are somewhat too rigid or too artificial for our use. Whether good and bad, right and wrong, true and false are contradictories or contraries might be disputed: it is wiser, for our purposes, not to raise this issue. They still remain antonyms according to our tests. So do a large number of more specific terms, which are equated in range of meaning and are negated in their specific implications, such as extol and decry, aboveboard and underhand, constant and fitful (as applied to things), adulation and abuse. The designation "reverse term" may also be dropped now that its purpose in exposition has been served. There are only three tests which should be applied to a word selected as the antonym of another word, and these are stated in the following definition:

An antonym is a word so opposed in meaning to another word, its equal in breadth or range of application, that it negates or nullifies every single one of its implications.

It is this definition that has guided the selection of antonyms in this Dictionary. Not every entry, of course, exhibits an antonym, for there are many words that have no antonym. In some few cases, moreover, we have been unable to supply any word that meets the three tests of the above definition or have been obliged to resort to an approximation. In such cases, we shall always welcome intelligent criticism that may enable us to supply these gaps. But, for the most part, where an antonym is listed, the editors rely upon its self-justification to the consultant who will apply these tests.

THE TREATMENT OF ANTONYMS

A few words should be added to clarify the practice of this Dictionary in regard to antonyms. They form an important part of its make-up; but, as they do not require much space, their significance may be overlooked.

It must be emphasized that each antonym is directly related to its entry word in the special sense in which that word is discriminated. It bears not a loose relation but a very close one to that word, and even though it may also be the antonym of some other word (especially of a synonym of the entry word) it must be judged only by the relation it bears to the entry word with which it is associated.

Sometimes, however, the antonym fits that word only when it is used in a narrowed sense or in a narrow application. This limitation is indicated in a parenthetical phrase with words in italics. Thus, at abet, we have as antonym “deter (with a personal subject)” and at actuate, “deter (with a motive, fear, etc., as subject).” A simpler instance is the antonym at brilliant, in the sense of bright, which reads “subdued (of light, color, etc.).”

At other times, the entry word is so inclusive that it takes more than one antonym to cover it. Then some indication is given of the differing collocations in which each antonym appears. Thus, check, as a synonym of restrain, has for its antonyms “accelerate (of speed, etc.): advance (of movements, plans, hopes, etc.): release (of feelings, energies, etc.).”

A cross reference (introduced by “see”) following an antonym is merely an indication of the sense in which it is used. Thus, close, as a synonym of silent and reticent, takes open as its antonym, but the sense in which open is used here is made clear by the cross reference to FRANK, where the word open is discriminated.

ANALOGOUS AND CONTRASTED WORDS

The essential part of this Dictionary consists of the synonyms and their discriminations and of the antonyms of the words thus discriminated. With these, judged from the point of view of one who is interested in the clarification of the differences in meaning between synonyms and in finding their direct opposites, it is a complete work. Yet for those who use this book as a word finder or as a vocabulary builder, there might be something lacking if it went no further. It is in view of the needs of such consultants that we have added lists of analogous words and of contrasted words.

Some of the analogous words, or terms closely related in meaning, merit the name of “near synonyms,” so close are they to the vocabulary entry: some contain much the same implications as the entry word, but the implication that they emphasize is not the same as that expressed in the common denotation of the discriminated group of which the entry word forms a part. Some are more general than the entry word, some more specific; some come together in only a part of their meaning. But in some important particulars they are all like the word under which they are listed.

So, too, with contrasted words, or terms sharply differing in meaning from the entry word. Some are close synonyms of its antonym, but many are opposed to it only in part of their meaning. Through these lists, the consultant who is seeking a word may find exactly the one he needs or the student may discover a useful means of extending his vocabulary.

These aims are made practical and easy of attainment by an additional aid which no work on synonyms has hitherto given the consultant. Terms listed as analogous words and contrasted words are arranged in groups, all of which are discriminated in this book. Most of the words are themselves directly discriminated, cross reference to the entry where the article is given being made by means of an asterisk or a reference introduced by “see”: a few that are not themselves directly discriminated are closely dependent on words that are, as by being their derivatives or inflected forms, or by being their negatives, and are thereby covered by the article to which a clear cross reference is made. Thus, at amenity (in the sense of courtesy) the list of analogous words contains: (1) civility, politeness, courteousness, plus a cross reference to the article at CIVIL, where civil, polite, courteous are discriminated; (2) graciousness, affability, cordiality, geniality, sociability, plus a cross reference to GRACIOUS, where gracious, affable, cordial, genial, sociable are discriminated. Similarly, among the contrasted words at banal are stimulating or stimulative, provoking or provocative, exciting, piquing, which, though not discriminated themselves, are fully covered by the article at PROVOKE, where their corresponding verbs are treated. Through the cross reference, then, the consultant can find the meaning of every term in the word lists, and can sharpen his sense of their differences.

It is perhaps unnecessary to point out that the selection of words in each of these lists is not determined by the group of synonyms, but by the one word at whose entry the list appears. As a result, each vocabulary entry is complete in itself: it has not only its synonyms and antonym or antonyms, but also analogous words which are closely related to it and contrasted words which are sharply opposed to it. It is thus treated as a unit, and all essential information is gathered about it.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

The left-hand column below consists of entries or, usually, parts of entries selected from the main vocabulary to illustrate the principal devices used in this Dictionary. The right-hand column provides explanations of these devices.

(adage.) *Saying, saw, proverb, maxim, motto, epigram.

aeon (or eon.) Age, era, epoch, *period.

aerial or ærial, (adj.) *Airy, ethereal.
aerial or ærial, (n.) *Antenna.

affection, (f.) *Feeling, emotion, passion, sentiment.

affection, (n.) *Disease, malady, complaint, distemper, ailment.

amble, v. (1) Rack, single-foot, pace, walk, canter, lope, trot. See under TROT, n.

(2) *Saunter, stroll.

ambush, n. (Ambush, ambuscade, ambuscado) agree in meaning a device to entrap the enemy by lying in wait.

(Ambush), however, is also used to designate any act of lying in wait or in concealment as for spying, frightening, obtaining an advantage, or the like; as, "ambushes of cutthroats" (Thackeray). (Ambuscado) usually implies the legitimate strategic disposition of troops in concealment, but in military use is more often applied to the body of troops or to their position than to the trap. "An ambuscade to cut off the convoy" (Froude). (Ambuscado) was once more common in English than ambuscade, but is now distinctly archaic. "Then dreams he of cutting foreign throats, Of breaches, ambuscadoes, Spanish blades" (Shak.).

artful. Wily, crafty, cunning, tricky, *sly, foxy.

articulation. 1 Integration, concatenation. (See under INTEGRATE, v.)

2 *Joint, suture.

ascertain. Determine, *discover, unearth, learn.

(Ana.) Inquire, query, interrogate, *ask; study, contemplate, weigh, *consider; observe, survey (see SEE).

(Con.) *Conjecture, surmise, guess; presume, assume (see PRESUPPOSE).

ascetic, adj. Austere, *severe, stern.

(Ant.) Luxurious, voluptuous (see SENSUOUS).

assuage. Alleviate, *relieve, mitigate, lighten, allay.

(Ant.) Exacerbate; intensify.

austere. *Severe, stern, ascetic.

(Ant.) Luscious (of fruits, etc.); warm, ardent (of persons, feelings, etc.); exuberant (of style, quality, etc.).

1 The vocabulary entry (usually a single word; occasionally a phrase) is printed in heavy-faced type.

2 Alternative forms, chiefly variant spellings, are listed when they are likely to be of value to the consultant.

3 The part of speech is indicated (by means of the commonly accepted abbreviations, printed in italic type) where it is desirable or necessary to do so.

4 Words identical in spelling and part of speech, but of different etymology, are given separate entries and each entry is numbered with a superior numeral. These numerals are also used in cross references to such entries.

5 Two or more meanings (or senses) of a single vocabulary entry are clearly separated, and each meaning is numbered with a heavy-faced numeral.

6 The words to be discriminated in an article (see pp. xxvii ff., above) are listed in heavy-faced type at the beginning of the article.

Each word is repeated in heavy-faced type at the point in the article where it is individually discussed.

The meanings or applications of the words discriminated are profusely illustrated by means of familiar examples (often idiomatic or characteristic phrases) or by quotations from named authors or sources. The word illustrated is printed in italic type.

The source of a quotation is also printed in italics. A list of sources quoted is given on pp. 899 ff.

7 Where there is no discriminating article, the first item under an entry is a list of its synonyms (except as explained on p. xxviii). These synonyms are discriminated from one another in an article in this Dictionary. The place where this article is to be found is indicated by an asterisk prefixed to one of the words in the list or by a reference introduced by the word "see."

8 Each vocabulary entry is provided (where the facts require or permit) with "finding lists" of two kinds (see p. xxxiii, above): Analogous Words introduced by the label Ana. and Contrasted Words introduced by Con.

Words given in these finding lists are divided into groups. Each group consists of words discriminated (or related to those discriminated) in a single article.

The groups are separated from one another by colons.

Words within each group are separated by commas.

The place of entry of the article discussing each group is indicated by an asterisk or a "see" reference (see §7).

9 The label Ant. introduces the antonym or antonyms of a vocabulary entry.

In the antonym lists, commas are used between words that are synonyms of one another, and colons are used to separate words that do not have such a relationship.

While many of the words listed as antonyms are themselves entered as vocabulary entries and are therefore discussed in the articles in this Dictionary, the selection of antonyms has not been restricted to such words (see pp. xxxii ff., above). For this reason the antonym lists do not as a rule contain references to discriminating articles.

10 In the lists of Antonyms and, less often, of Analogous Words and Contrasted Words, italic notations in parentheses indicate the limited use or application in which the preceding word is to be taken. See also p. xxxiii.

A DICTIONARY OF DISCRIMINATED SYNONYMS WITH ANTONYMS AND ANALOGOUS AND CONTRASTED WORDS

a-. *Un-, non-, in-.

abaft. Abaft, aft, astern are nautical terms meaning behind, or to or at the rear (of). Abaft and aft are applied to objects or their positions in a ship. Abaft (opposed to afore) commonly suggests position relatively nearer the stern or rear part of the ship; as, his station is abaft the foremast; the wave struck her abaft the beam. Aft (opposed to forward) suggests position actually in that part of the ship to the rear of the midship section; as, they went aft to hoist the mainsail; a cabin ast of the lounge. Astern (opposed to ahead) now chiefly implies position outside and to the rear of a ship; as, the wake astern of a vessel; a brisk breeze astern.

Ana. After, rear, back, *posterior, hind, hinder.

Ant. Afore. — Con. Ahead, forward, *before.

abandon, v. 1 Abandon, desert, forsake, though often used interchangeably in the sense of to quit absolutely, are not exact synonyms. Abandon, in its strictest use, implies surrender of control or possession and, frequently, the knowledge that the thing abandoned is left to the mercy of someone or something else. "The ghost of grandeur that lingers between the walls of abandoned haciendas in New Mexico" (M. Austin). "In the frantic rush to escape, the insane had usually been forgotten and abandoned to horrible deaths" (V. Heiser). Desert, in precise usage, commonly implies previous occupation, companionship, or guardianship, and often connotes desolation; in its narrower sense (esp. in deserter, desertion) it emphasizes violation of one's duty as guardian or protector, and extreme culpability. "He that takes the forlorn hope in an attack, is often deserted by those that should support him" (Scott). Forsake still often retains its etymological connotation of repudiation; it frequently suggests renunciation; even in its loosest use it commonly stresses the breaking off of an association with someone or something; as, to forsake the world and all its pleasures. "She was forsaken at the altar" (Deland).

Ana. *Discard, cast (away or off), scrap, junk: reject, repudiate (see DECLINE).

Ant. Reclaim. — Con. Hold, possess, enjoy (see HAVE): shield, safeguard, protect (see DEFEND): redeem, *rescue, save.

2 Surrender, *relinquish, yield, resign, leave.

Ant. Cherish (hopes, opinions, etc.): restrain (oneself). — Con. *Keep, retain: treasure, prize (see APPRECIATE): *maintain, assert, defend: inhibit, bridle, curb (see RESTRAIN).

abandon, n. *Unconstraint, spontaneity.

Ana. License, *freedom, liberty: relaxation, laxity or laxness, looseness (see LOOSE).

Ant. Self-restraint. — Con. Repression, suppression (see SUPPRESS): self-possession, aplomb (see CONFIDENCE): poise (see BALANCE, TACT).

abandoned. Abandoned, reprobate, profligate, dissolute fundamentally mean utterly depraved. Abandoned and reprobate were originally applied to sinners, and to their acts. One is abandoned who by his complete surrender to a life of sin seems spiritually lost or morally irreclaimable. "I disdain . . . to paint her as she is, Cruel, abandoned, glorying in her shame!" (Cowper). One is reprobate who is abandoned and therefore rejected—in Calvinism, by God; in more general use, by one's fellows. In its modern weakened sense, reprobate implies ostracism by, or exclusion from, a social group for a serious offense against its code. "Don't count on my appearing your friend too openly. . . . remember always that I'm a reprobate old clergyman" (Hugh Walpole). Profligate and dissolute convey little, if any, suggestion of divine or social condemnation but both imply complete moral breakdown and self-indulgence to such an extreme that all standards of morality and prudence are disregarded. One is profligate who openly and shamelessly flouts all the decencies and wastes his substance in riotous living. "There was no excess which was not encouraged by the ostentatious profligacy of the King and his favourite courtiers" (Macaulay). One is dissolute who has completely thrown off all moral and prudential restraints on the indulgence of his appetites. "Chance spectators, chiefly dissolute men and shameless women" (Wordsworth).

Ana. Depraved, debauched, perverted, debased (see DEBASE): degenerate, corrupt (see VICIOUS): wanton, lewd, lascivious, libidinous, lecherous (see LICENTIOUS).

Ant. Redeemed, regenerate. — Con. Saved, rescued, reclaimed, delivered (see RESCUE).

abase. Abase, demean, debase, degrade, humble, humiliate are synonymous when they denote to lower (one) in one's own estimation or in that of others. Abase commonly suggests loss of dignity or prestige without necessarily implying permanency in that loss; as, to abase the proud. When used reflexively (abasement often equals self-abasement), it usually connotes humility, abjectness, or a sense of one's inferiority. In this reflexive use, humble is often used interchangeably. "Whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased [D.V. and R.V. humbled]; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted" (Luke xiv. 11). De-mean implies less humility than abase but is stronger in its implications of loss of dignity or social standing. "It was . . . Mrs. Sedley's opinion that her son would de-mean himself by a marriage with an artist's daughter" (Thackeray). Debase emphasizes deterioration in value or quality: it is more often used of things (as, to debase the currency), but when used of persons it commonly connotes weakening of moral standards or of the moral character; as, officeholders debase themselves by accepting bribes. "How books . . . debase The many for the pleasure of those few" (Wordsworth). Degrade stresses a lowering in plane rather than in rank and often conveys a strong implication of the shamefulfulness of the condition to which the person (or group or thing) has been reduced. "That she and Charlotte, two spent old women, should be . . . talking to each other of hatred, seemed unimaginably hideous and degrading" (E. Wharton). Often (esp. in degradation) it connotes actual degeneracy or corruption. "It was by that unscrupulous person's liquor her husband had been degraded" (Hardy). Humble is frequently used in place of degrade in the sense of demote, when the ignominy of the reduction in rank is emphasized. "We are pleased . . . to see him taken down and humbled" (Spectator). When it is employed without any implication of demotion, it often suggests a salutary increase of humility or the realization of one's own littleness or impotence. "It was one of those illnesses from which we turn away our eyes, shuddering and humbled" (DeLand). Occasionally it implies a lowering in station. "In such a man . . . A race illustrious for heroic deeds, Humbled, but not degraded, may expire" (Wordsworth). Humiliate, once a close synonym of humble, now comes closer to mortify, for it stresses chagrin and shame. "When we ask to be humbled, we must not recoil from being humiliated" (C. Rosselli).

Ana. Cringe, truckle, cower, *fawn, toady: grovel (see WALLOW): abash, discomfit, disconcert, *embarrass.

Ant. Exalt: extol (esp. oneself). — Con. Magnify, aggrandize (see EXALT): elevate, *lift, raise: laud, acclaim, *praise.

abash. Discomfit, *embarrass, disconcert, faze, rattle.

Ana. Fluster, flurry, *discompose, perturb, disturb, agitate: chagrin, mortify (see ASHAMED): confound, dumfound, nonplus (see PUZZLE).

Ant. Embolden: reassure. — Con. Elate, exult (see ELATED).

abate. 1 *Abolish, extinguish, annihilate.

Ana. End, terminate (see CLOSE): *annul, void, avoid, abrogate: cancel, obliterate (see ERASE): *nullify, invalidate.

Ant. Perpetuate. — Con. *Continue, last, persist, abide.

2 Reduce, diminish, *decrease, lessen.

Ana. Retard, slow, slacken, *delay: *moderate, temper: mitigate, lighten, alleviate (see RELIEVE).

Ant. Augment: accelerate (pace, speed): intensify (hopes, fears, a fever). — Con. *Increase, multiply, enlarge: aggravate, heighten, enhance (see INTENSIFY): *speed, quicken, hurry.

3 Abate, subside, wane, ebb are synonymous in their extended senses only. All then denote to die down in force or intensity; all imply previous approach to a high point and present movement towards a vanishing point. Abate, however, stresses the idea of progressive diminution in intensity; subside suggests falling to a low level and cessation of turbulence or agitation; as, the wind is abating; the waves are subsiding. "The revolutionary spirit has abated" (Grandgent). "The child's quick temper subsided into listlessness under the fierce Italian heat" (A. Repplier). Wane adds to abate the implications of fading or weakening; it tends, therefore, to be predicated of things that have value or excellence as well as force and intensity. "After the first flush of excitement, the interest of doctors, nurses, and patients all began to wane" (V. Heiser). Ebb adds to abate the suggestion of recession or of gradual loss; it is idiomatically associated with things subject to fluctuation; as, ebbing vitality is often a warning of illness. "There were many, many stages in the ebbing of her love for him, but it was always ebbing" (D. H. Lawrence).

Ana. Dwindle, diminish, *decrease.

Ant. Rise: revive. — Con. *Increase, augment: *expand, swell, dilate: mount, soar, tower, surge (see RISE).

abatement. *Deduction, rebate, discount.

Ant. Addition. — Con. Increment, accretion, accession (see ADDITION): increase, augmentation, enlargement (see corresponding verbs at INCREASE).

abbé. *Cleric, clergyman, priest, ecclesiastic.

abbey. *Cloister, convent, nunnery, monastery, priory.

abbreviate. *Shorten, abridge, curtail.

Ana. Reduce, *decrease, lessen: *contract, compress, shrink, condense: attenuate, extenuate (see THIN).

Ant. Elongate, lengthen. — Con. *Extend, prolong, protract: enlarge, *increase: *expand, amplify, dilate.

abdicate. Abdicate, renounce, resign, demit are synonymous when they are used in the sense of to give up formally or definitely as a position of trust, honor, or glory, or its concomitant authority or prerogatives. Abdicate is the precise word to use when that which is relinquished involves sovereign or inherent power; it is applied specifically to the act of a monarch who gives up his throne, but in extended use it may also be applied to any act involving surrender of an inherent dignity or claim to preeminence. "The Herr Doktor has a lamentably feeble character. He means to be kind . . . but he abdicates his rights [as a parent] and avoids his duties" (Santayana). Renounce is often used in place of abdicate (as, the king renounced his throne), especially when sacrifice for a greater end is intentionally implied. So strong is this implication and also that of finality in renounce (as here considered: see also ABJURE) that it often, and its derivative renunciation commonly, connotes self-denial or surrender for the sake of moral or spiritual discipline. Consequently, in good use, one renounces not only a right, a title, an inheritance, but also some desired or desirable possession. "She remains . . . the sort of woman who has renounced all happiness for herself and who lives only for a principle" (T. S. Eliot). Resign is used in reference chiefly to positions held on tenure and formally relinquished. Ordinarily it implies asking permission to leave a position or office before the expiration of a term. Demit is chiefly Scottish and may have the force of either abdicate or resign. It commonly connotes voluntary relinquishment.

Ana. *Relinquish, surrender, abandon, leave.

Ant. Assume: usurp. — Con. *Take (sense 3): *arrogate, appropriate, confiscate.

abdomen. Abdomen, belly, stomach, paunch are often regarded as synonyms, selection being determined merely by the proprieties. It is historically correct to employ any one of them to name the front part of the human trunk below the chest; as, to crawl on one's abdomen, stomach, or belly; a bulging abdomen, belly, or paunch: it is also historically correct to use stomach, belly, or paunch to designate the place where food is digested. In technical usage, abdomen refers to the cavity below the diaphragm (and sometimes, above the brim of the pelvis), the structures in that cavity, or the walls (often the front wall) enclosing it; as, a pain in the abdomen; an abdominal incision or operation. Technically, stomach designates the organ in which the earlier processes of digestion take place. Belly and paunch have no technical standing and they savor of vulgarity; when used in place of abdomen they suggest roundness and protuberance; when used in place of stomach they are less definitely referred to a particular organ and suggest rather the region where food is digested.

abdominal. Abdominal, ventral, anterior. Abdominal is the adjective corresponding to abdomen. Ventral, though synonymous with abdominal in its primitive sense, is more often employed, as in zoology and anatomy, to imply relationship to the entire front surface of the body (in man) or to the under surface of most vertebrates normally in a horizontal position, such as reptiles, fish, dogs, and horses; as, the ventral abdominal wall; the ventral scales of a reptile. In anatomy, anterior often replaces ventral when applied to parts of the human body; as, the anterior thoracic nerve.

abduct. Abduct, kidnap are terms commonly employed without distinction as denoting to carry off (a person) surreptitiously for an illegal purpose. In popular usage, kidnap is regarded as the more specific term because it commonly connotes seizure and detention for ransom. In law, however, the reverse is true, for the verbs acquire their meanings from the rigid technical definitions of kidnaping and abduction. Kidnaping is the legal term of wider application, implying that a person has been seized by violence or fraud and detained against his will or that of his legal guardian. Abduction is the carrying off of a girl (usually one below the legal age of consent), either against her will or with her consent, for the purpose of marriage or defilement. Consequently, in law, kidnaping and abduction, and kidnap and abduct can be used interchangeably only when the person carried off is a girl below a fixed age, her seizure and detention are against her will, and the motive is marriage or rape.

Ana. Seduce, entice, *lure, inveigle.

Con. *Rescue, ransom, redeem, deliver.

aberrant. Atypical, *abnormal.

Ana. Divergent, *different, disparate: *irregular, anomalous, unnatural: *exceptional: singular, peculiar, odd, *strange, eccentric.

Ant. True (to type). — Con. *Usual, wonted, customary: normal, *regular, typical, natural.

aberration. 1 *Deviation, deflection.

Ana. Abnormality, aberrancy (see ABNORMAL): *error, blunder, mistake, slip, lapse: *fault, failing: *variation, mutation: anomaly (see PARADOX).

Ant. Conformity: regularity. — Con. Normality (see REGULAR): norm, *average, mean: agreement, correspondence, accord (see corresponding verbs at AGREE).

2 Aberration, derangement, alienation, as here compared, denote mental disorder. Aberration may be used to designate any form of mental unsoundness; commonly, however, it names a disorder insufficient to constitute insanity; often, it connotes a temporary mental lapse. Derangement may be applied to any functional mental disturbance whether permanent or not. Alienation, the strongest word, implies more or less permanence in the condition, the irresponsibility of the individual, and the necessity for his restraint.

Ana. *Insanity, lunacy, mania, dementia: *delusion, hallucination, illusion: *mania, delirium, hysteria, frenzy.

Ant. Soundness (of mind).

abet. *Incite, foment, instigate.

Ana. Aid, assist, *help: back (up), *support, uphold: co-operate, concur (see UNITE): forward, further, promote (see ADVANCE).

Ant. Deter (with a personal subject). — Con. *Frustrate, thwart, foil, balk, circumvent.

abettor or abetter. Accessory, accomplice, *confederate, conspirator.

abeyant. Dormant, quiescent, *latent, potential.

Ana. Deferred, suspended, postponed, stayed, intermitted (see DEFER): suppressed, repressed (see SUPPRESS).

Ant. Operative: active: revived. — Con. In progress (see PROGRESS, n.): live, dynamic (see ACTIVE): *living, alive, quick: renewed, restored, refreshed (see RENEW).

abhor. Abominate, loathe, detest, *hate.

Ana. *Despise, condemn, scorn: shun, avoid, eschew (see ESCAPE).

Ant. Admire (persons, their qualities, acts, etc.): enjoy (things which are a matter of taste). — Con. *Like, love, relish, dote (on or upon): cherish, treasure, prize, value (see APPRECIATE): court, woo, solicit (see INVITE): esteem, respect, regard (see under REGARD, n.).

abhorrence. Detestation, loathing, abomination, hatred, hate. See HATE, v.

Ana. Distaste, repugnance, repellency (see corresponding adjectives at REPUGNANT): horror, dismay (see FEAR).

Ant. Admiration: enjoyment. — Con. Esteem, *regard, respect: liking, relish (see corresponding verbs at LIKE): love, affection, *attachment.

abhorrent. 1 Abominable, *hateful, detestable, odious.

Ana. *Contemptible, despicable, scurvy: *execrable, damnable.

Ant. Admirable: enjoyable. — Con. Grateful, agreeable, *pleasant, pleasing, gratifying, welcome: *delightful, delectable.

2 *Repugnant, repellent, obnoxious, distasteful, invidious.

Ana. *Antipathetic: uncongenial, unsympathetic (see INCONSONANT): foreign, alien (see EXTRINSIC).

Ant. Congenial. — Con. Attractive, alluring, captivating (see corresponding verbs at ATTRACT): tempting, enticing, seductive (see corresponding verbs at LURE).

abide. 1 *Stay, wait, remain, tarry, linger.

Ana. Dwell, *reside, live, sojourn, lodge: *stick, cleave, cling, adhere.

Ant. Depart. — Con. *Go, leave, quit: *move, remove, shift.

2 Endure, last, persist, *continue.

Ana. *Stay, remain, linger: subsist, exist, live (see BE).

Ant. Pass, v.i. — Con. Flee, fly, *escape: *flit.

3 Endure, *bear, suffer, tolerate, stand, brook.

Ana. Submit, *yield, bow, defer: acquiesce (in), accede (to), consent (to) (see ASSENT): accept, *receive, take.

Ant. Resist. — Con. Withstand, *oppose, combat: *decline, refuse, spurn: shun, avoid, evade, elude (see ESCAPE).

ability. Ability, capacity, capability are often confused in use, in both their primary and extended senses. Ability, in its most general significance, denotes the quality or character of being able (to do, perform, etc.) and is applied chiefly to human beings. Capacity, in its fundamental sense, means the power to receive, hold, or absorb something expressed or understood, and is said of persons or things. Thus, it is correct to say "a child's ability to learn" but not, "the hall's ability to seat 2000 persons"; on the other hand, it is correct to say "a child's mental capacity (or capacity for learning)" or, "the hall has a seating capacity of 2000." In an extended sense, and especially as referred to persons, ability suggests actual power, whether native or acquired, whether exercised or not. "He [the curate leaving his first curacy] was intended to take away . . . an ability to understand and to sympathize with the commonplace of clerical effort" (C. Mackenzie). In its secondary sense, capacity still stresses receptiveness, but since the commonly implied reference is to man's intellectual, moral, or spiritual, rather than physical, nature, the implication of receptiveness becomes more explicitly that of responsiveness, susceptibility, aptitude, or the like. Capacity therefore suggests potential, as distinguished from actual or, especially, manifest power. This distinction is not only perceptible in good usage but also in English idiom. Thus, ability to weep, the ability to work, the ability to pay, are not respectively identical in meaning with the capacity for tears, the capacity for work, the capacity for payment. The phrases of the first group mean that one can weep (because his tear glands are normal), one can work (because strong, trained, etc.), one can pay (because he has the money): those of the latter group indicate, in the first case, a special sensitiveness to that which is pathetic; in the second case, a readiness to work as hard as is necessary on any or every occasion; in the third case, the qualities of mind and character that promise earning power and imply a recognition of one's obligations. "If Peter had a capacity for friendship, these speechless years had made it dumb" (Deland). "Had he discovered in himself a capacity and a taste for that sort of thing [preaching]?" (Conrad). Capability is the character in a person (less often, a thing) arising from the possession of the qualities or qualifications necessary to the performance of a certain kind of work or the achievement of a given end; as, to test the capability of the ear to distinguish pitches; no applicant will be considered who does not offer proof of capability. In a secondary sense, as applied exclusively to persons, capability means competence, often special competence. This connotation is usually supplied or enforced by the context.

Ana. *Power, strength, might, force, energy: proficiency, skill, adeptness (see PROFICIENT): aptitude, talent, genius, faculty (see GIFT): competence, qualification (see corresponding adjectives at ABLE).

Ant. Inability, incapacity. — Con. Impotence, powerlessness, impuissance (see corresponding adjectives at POWERLESS): incompetence, incapability (see corresponding adjectives at INCAPABLE).

abject. *Mean, ignoble, sordid.

Ana. Servile, slavish, menial (see SUBSERVIENT): *misable, wretched: cringing, truckling, cowering (see FAWN): groveling (see WALLOW): abased, demeaned, humbled, humiliated (see ABASE).

Ant. Exalted (in rank, state, condition, mood, behavior, etc.): imperious (in manner, speech, attitude, etc.). — Con. Arrogant, lordly, overbearing, supercilious (see PROUD): domineering, *masterful: aristocratic, patrician (see corresponding nouns at GENTLEMAN).

abjure. Abjure, renounce, forswear, recant, retract are synonymous when they agree in meaning to abandon irrevocably and, usually, with solemnity or publicity. Except in the extended senses of abjure, renounce, and forswear, they all imply the recall of one's word. Abjure and renounce are scarcely distinguishable when they imply solemn repudiation as of an oath or vow. "He shall, before he is admitted to citizenship, declare on oath in open court that he . . . absolutely and entirely renounces and abjures all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty" (U. S. Code). In their extended senses, however, abjure distinctively suggests deliberate rejection or avoidance; renounce specifically connotes disclaiming or disowning; as, to abjure force; to renounce one's principles. "If a man is content to abjure wealth and to forego marriage, to live simply without luxuries, he may spend a very dignified gentle life here" (A. C. Benson). "Science will never renounce the attempt to bring everything under a single system of laws" (Inge). Forswear often adds to abjure (especially in the reflexive use of the verb or in the participial adjective forsworn) the suggestion of perjury or of culpable violation of a solemn engagement. "I have sworn to obey the laws, and I cannot forswear myself" (Blackie). In its chief current use, it often means little more than to swear off. "One is often tempted of the Devil to forswear the study of history altogether as the pursuit of the Unknowable" (Birrell). Recant and retract stress the withdrawal of something professed or declared; recant always, and retract often, implies admission of error. One recants, however, something that one has openly professed or taught, as religious or scientific doctrines; one retracts something one has written or spoken, as a charge, a promise, an order. "A word informs your brother I retract this morning's offer" (Browning).

Ana. *Forgo, forbear, eschew: abstain (from), *refrain (from): reject, repudiate, spurn (see DECLINE): abandon, *relinquish.

Ant. Pledge (allegiance, a vow, etc.): elect (a way of life, a means to an end, an end, etc.). — Con. Plight, engage (see PROMISE): *choose, select, opt: own, avow, *acknowledge.

⚠ Do not confuse abjure with adjure.

able. Able, capable, competent, qualified are close synonyms when they denote having marked power or fitness for work and are used attributively. In their predicative use able (followed by to and infinitive) and capable (followed by of) suggest mere possession of ability or capacity without any clear indication of its extent or quality. "They must be capable of living the life of the spirit . . . ; they must be able to cope intelligently with weighty problems of public policy" (Grandgent). In general, competent and qualified in predicative use suggest mere fitness in the one case and sufficient training in the other; as, a servant competent to take full charge. "Headmasters and education authorities want to be able to distinguish between those who are 'qualified' to teach them [literature and fine arts] and those who are not" (A. Huxley). On the other hand, all four words are manifestly richer in implications when (especially in attributive use) they are thought of as characterizing persons or their activities. Able then suggests ability markedly above the average; it often connotes power of mastery; it does not exclude the connotation of promise even when the emphasis is on performance. "Able boys and girls will . . . submit willingly to severe discipline in order to acquire some coveted knowledge or skill" (B. Russell). Capable, so used, stresses possession of qualities such as adaptability, resourcefulness, versatility, industry, or efficiency and seldom indicates, apart from its context, the specific ability involved. "Pretty and charming, but stupid . . . because she believes men prefer women to be useless and extravagant; if left to herself she would be a domestic and capable person" (Millay). Competent and qualified are seldom used to characterize a person or his activities except in relation to a specific calling; as, a competent housekeeper; a qualified accountant. Competent implies the ability to satisfy capably all the special demands or requirements of a particular situation, craft, or profession, but it does not necessarily imply, as does qualified in its current strict use, compliance with set standards, such as special training and the testing of one's competence at the end of such training; as, a qualified accountant. "A competent portraitist knows how to imply the profile in the full face" (A. Huxley).

Ana. Skilled, skillful, *proficient, expert: efficient, *effective: clever, brilliant, *intelligent, smart.

Ant. Inept (by nature, training, etc.): unable (to do, etc.).

— Con. *Incapable, incompetent, unqualified: inefficient, *ineffective: mediocre, fair, indifferent (see MEDIUM): maladroit (see AWKWARD).

ablution. *Purification, lustration, purgation, catharsis.

Ana. Cleansing, cleaning (see CLEAN, v.).

abnegate. Sacrifice, *forgo, eschew, forbear.

Ana. Renounce, *abdicate: surrender, abandon, *relinquish, waive: abstain (from), *refrain (from).

Ant. Indulge (in). — Con. Gratify, delight, regale, rejoice, gladden, *please: *satisfy, content.

abnegation. Self-abnegation, *renunciation, self-denial.

Ana. Forgoing (or foregoing), forbearance, eschewal (see corresponding verbs at FORGO): abstinence, abstemiousness, continence, *temperance: restraining, curbing, bridling (see RESTRAIN).

Ant. Indulgence, self-indulgence. — Con. Intemperance, incontinence (see affirmative nouns at TEMPERANCE).

abnormal. Abnormal, atypic (or atypical), aberrant, agree in meaning deviating markedly from the rule or standard of its kind. All are terms often used in the sciences, as in biology and psychology, to express non-conformity to type. Abnormal frequently connotes strangeness or excess and sometimes, as in abnormality or abnormity, deformity or monstrosity. "Power when wielded by abnormal energy is the most serious of facts" (H. Adams). In psychology, as applied to persons, abnormal often suggests poorer than normal performance or poorer than normal adjustment to the conditions of life, and is equivalent to subnormal; in general use, however, better than normal powers are often implied. "If a boy has abnormal mental powers in some direction . . . he may be quite incapable of fitting into a crowd of normal boys" (B. Russell). Atypic stresses divergence, upward or downward, from that which has been established as the average for anything of its kind or for any person at a particular stage of development; as, atypical reactions. When applied to students, it suggests intelligence or achievement below or above the average and therefore requiring special educational treatment. Aberrant seldom loses its literal implication of wandering or straying; in the sciences, where it is applied to departures from type, it carries none of the extra connotations of abnormal and is less restricted in its reference than atypic; as, aberrant forms of a botanical species. In general use, it often suggests moral deviation. "Such a choice must argue Aberrant senses, or degenerate blood" (Kingsley).

Ana. *Irregular, unnatural, anomalous: unusual, unwonted, uncustomary, unaccustomed (see affirmative adjectives at USUAL): *monstrous, prodigious.

Ant. Normal. — Con. *Regular, typical, natural: ordinary, *common, familiar: *usual, wonted, customary.

abode. Residence, domicile, dwelling, *habitation, house, home.

abolish. Abolish, annihilate, extinguish, abate are comparable terms when they mean to make nonexistent. All are found both in general and legal use except abate which is now rarely employed except in law. Abolish seldom refers to purely physical objects but rather to such things as are the outgrowth of law, custom, human conception, or the conditions of human existence; as, attempts to abolish slavery; a proposal to abolish the income tax. "No plan will be acceptable unless it abolishes poverty" (Shaw). Annihilate distinctively implies destruction so complete that the (material or immaterial) thing or things involved are wiped out of existence, and cannot be revived in any form. "The possibility of both the creation and annihilation of matter" (Jeans). Extinguish or its related form extinction is often interchangeable with annihilate (or annihilation). It, however, stresses the power of the cause to overwhelm and suppress rather than the finality of the result. "The man whose hopes and fears are all centred upon himself can hardly view death with equanimity, since it extinguishes his whole emotional universe" (B. Russell).

In law, abolish keeps close to its general sense of to make nonexistent; annihilate is sometimes used as an emphatic substitute for abolish. "The appointment cannot be annihilated" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Extinguish implies destruction of a right or obligation by some act, decision, or the like, which nullifies it or makes it void. Abate implies termination, especially by a legal decision; as, to abate a nuisance; to abate an action or writ.

Ana. Extirpate, eradicate, wipe out, *exterminate: obliterate, efface, blot out, expunge (see ERASE): negate, *nullify, annul, abrogate.

Ant. Establish. — Con. *Found, institute: *bear, produce, turn out: create, discover, *invent.

abominable. Detestable, *hateful, odious, abhorrent.

Ana. *Execrable, damnable, accursed, cursed: scurvy, despicable, *contemptible, sorry: loathsome, repulsive, revolting, repugnant, *offensive: horrid, *horrible.

Ant. Laudable (practices, habits, customs, etc.): enjoyable, delightful. — Con. Pleasing, *pleasant, gratifying: commendable, applaudable (see corresponding verbs at COMMEND): attractive, charming, enchanting (see under ATTRACT).

abominate. Loathe, detest, abhor, *hate.

Ana. *Despise, contemn, scorn, disdain: *execrate, ob-jurgate, curse, damn.

Ant. Esteem: enjoy. — Con. Admire, respect, regard (see under REGARD, n.): relish, *like, love, dote (on or upon).

abomination. 1 Abhorrence, detestation, loathing, hatred, hate. See HATE, v.

Ana. Scorn, despite, contempt, disdain (see under DESPISE): execration, ob-jurgation (see corresponding verbs at EXECRATE).

Ant. Esteem: enjoyment. — Con. Admiration, respect, *regard: relish, gusto, zest, *taste.

2 Abomination, anathema, bugbear, bête noire agree in meaning a person or thing from which one shrinks with intense dislike. That which is an abomination (in older idiom, without the article) provokes loathing, disgust, and extreme displeasure. "Lying lips are abomination to the Lord: but they that deal truly are his delight" (Proverbs xii. 22). "Everything was to be slick, which was Marvin's term of approbation; but not too slick, which was his abomination" (M. Austin). That which is anathema (or an anathema) to one is banned from one's presence, dismissed from one's mind, or the like, as something odious or beyond the pale. The word in this sense is always reminiscent of St. Paul's use: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema" (1 Corinthians xvi. 22). "They [new writers] were as welcome to him as they were anathema to most editors of that day" (A. Repplier). "All plays are anathema to him, and he even disapproves of dancing bears" (Quiller-Couch). That which is a bugbear to one is something one anticipates encountering with detestation and dread and therefore tries to evade or avoid; often, but not invariably, the word connotes an imaginary basis for one's fears. "What is the dire necessity and 'iron' law under which men groan? Truly, most gratuitously invented bugbears" (T. H. Huxley). "But to the world no bugbear is so great, As want of figure, and a small estate" (Pope). That which is one's bête noire (the English translation black beast is very rarely used) is one's pet aversion, a person or thing one habitually or particularly avoids, often with superstitious fear. "Truth . . . the breath of the poet, the vision of the artist and prophet, the quarry of the scientist . . . the toy of the careless, the bête noire of the politician" (Forum). "It was the bête noire of Clerk Gum's life, Mrs. Jones" (Mrs. H. Wood).

Ana. Plague, pest, annoyance (see corresponding verbs at WORRY): aversion, *antipathy.

Ant. Joy. — Con. Delight, *pleasure, delectation: gratification, regalement (see corresponding verbs at PLEASE).

aboriginal. Indigenous, autochthonous, *native.

Ana. Primitive, primordial, primeval, pristine (see PRIMARY): savage, barbarous, *barbarian, barbaric.

Con. Sequent, successive (see CONSECUTIVE): advanced, progressive (see LIBERAL; PROGRESS, v.): civilized, cultured (see corresponding nouns at CIVILIZATION).

aborigine. Native, indigene, autochthon, endemic. See NATIVE, adj.

abortion. Abortion, miscarriage denote the premature expulsion of a fetus before it is capable of living independently. Abortion, esp. in law, connotes purposeful and therefore criminal induction of the process in order to avoid childbearing. In medicine, however, abortion sometimes denotes the expulsion of the human fetus through any cause during the first sixteen weeks of pregnancy. Miscarriage, in general use, differs from abortion in suggesting a natural expulsion rather than one produced artificially. In medicine, miscarriage is technically used of any expulsion of the fetus occurring after the first sixteen weeks, and before the fetus is capable of living independently.

abortive. Fruitless, vain, *futile, bootless.

Ana. *Immature, unmaturing, unripe: inchoate, unformed (see FORMLESS): ineffectual, *ineffective, inefficient: unfortunate, unlucky (see affirmative adjectives at LUCKY).

Ant. Consummated. — Con. Completed, concluded (see CLOSE, v.): finished, accomplished, *consummate: effectual, *effective, efficacious.

abound. Superabound, overflow, *teem, swarm.

Ana. Predominate, preponderate (see corresponding adjectives at DOMINANT).

Ant. Fail, fall short. — Con. Want, *lack, need, require: scant, skimp, scrimp (see corresponding adjectives at MEAGER).

about. 1 About, around, round are often used interchangeably in their comparable prepositional and adverbial senses but not without slight changes in meaning in nearly every case. Thus, when it is said of the earth that it revolves "around the sun," the circularity of its orbit and the central position of the sun are more clearly implied than if "about the sun" were the chosen expression. When "around the sun" is changed to "round the sun," the orbit is less definitely suggested than motion in a circular direction and repeated passage through a circuit. Throngs may crowd about a man whose back is to a wall, but not around or round him until he can be surrounded on all sides. To travel about the world is to journey hither and thither over much of the earth's surface; to travel around or round the world is to cover the circumference of the globe in one's journeyings and end one's travels where one has begun them.

In America, around is often used colloquially in senses better covered by about; as, to travel around the country; he weighs around 200 pounds. It is often used also where the British prefer round, especially when a circuit including a succession of persons or places, or a ring formation, or an encompassing limit, is to be implied; as, there were not enough cigars to go around (Brit. round).

2 About, concerning, regarding, respecting, anent are synonymous prepositions when they take an object that names something which is the subject of talk, thought, interest, or the like. About is usually interchangeable with any of the others without marked loss of meaning, but it alone may follow its object as well as precede it; as, to talk about many things; there is nothing to complain about. Concerning is more meaningful because it often retains its verbal implications of affecting and influencing; as, to make laws concerning public welfare. Regarding and respecting commonly suggest little more than about in very precise use, however, regarding is appropriate when its object names the goal or center of attention or thought; as, they avoided all discussion regarding the scandal; respecting is felicitously employed when selectiveness or specification is to be implied; as, he had nothing to say respecting Spain. "There's no outwitting you respecting him" (Browning). Anent comes very close to respecting, but it is now rather pedantic.

above. Above, over are synonymous prepositions when they indicate elevation in position. They seldom imply contact between that which is higher and that which is lower; as a rule, they allow an interval. Over and above differ in that over implies verticality, while above may or may not. Thus, the entire second story of a building is above, but only a small part of it is directly over, one who stands on the ground floor. Between the figurative senses analogous relations hold. Over and above agree in the idea of superiority, but differ in the immediacy of reference. Thus, the rank of ambassador is above that of minister, but the British ambassador is not over the Chinese minister; he stands in that relation to his own subordinates only. Similarly, above and over indicate a relationship of excess; as, his strength is above the average; we now have over half the amount required; we shall not be tempted above our power to resist. Above only, however, implies transcendence. "One there is, above all others, Well deserves the name of Friend; His is love beyond a brother's" (J. Newton).

aboveboard. *Straightforward, forthright.

Ana. Open, *frank, candid: honest, *upright, scrupulous: *fair, impartial, just: ingenuous, unsophisticated, artless (see NATURAL).

Ant. Underhand, underhanded. — Con. Furtive, covert, surreptitious, *secret, clandestine: *dishonest, deceitful, mendacious: *crooked, devious.

abracadabra. *Gibberish, hocus-pocus, mummary.

Ana. *Magic, sorcery, thaumaturgy: amulet, charm, periapt (see FETISH).

Con. Sense, *meaning, significance, import.

abrade. Abrade, excoriate, chafe, fret, gall come into comparison chiefly when they are referred to injuries of the skin, but they are also comparable to an extent in some of their more extended applications. Abrade, which means to wear off the surface of something by rubbing or scraping, may be used wherever that result is attained consciously, as by grinding, filing, or polishing, or accidentally by friction; as, an abrasive is a substance used in abrading, smoothing, or polishing a surface; the steel plates of the ship's side were abraded in the collision. In medical use, abrade implies the scraping off of skin or mucous membrane in patches and shreds. Excoriate in medicine often equals abrade, but it sometimes implies a corrosive rather than an abrasive agent as the cause of the injury. Chafe and fret come close to abrade in denoting to injure a surface by friction. Distinctively, they usually imply prolonged friction that causes wear or, in the case of the skin, irritation rather than loss of cuticle. Chafe is often used in reference to ropes or yarn, but is more commonly used in connection with slight inflammations of the skin; as, woolen garments chafe some skins. Fret adds to chafe so strong a suggestion of annoyance or disturbance that the implication of physical irritation is often blurred; as, high collars fret him (that is, annoy him by chafing his skin). In reference to other substances, fret retains its etymological implication of eating and sometimes suggests erosion; as, the dripping water fretted a channel in the stone. Gall, now chiefly used with reference to persons and animals, implies a superficial flesh wound or a blister induced by friction; as, a saddle too long worn galls a horse's back.

abrasion. *Erosion, attrition, corrosion.

abridge. *Shorten, curtail, abbreviate, retrench.

Ana. Condense, *contract, compress, shrink: *cut, slash: *limit, restrict: reduce, diminish, *decrease.

Ant. Expand: extend. — Con. Amplify, swell, distend (see EXPAND): lengthen, elongate, prolong, protract (see EXTEND): enlarge, augment, *increase.

abridgment. Abridgment, abstract, brief, synopsis, conspectus, epitome are terms denoting a condensation of a larger work or of an extended treatment. Abridgment implies reduction in compass with the retention of relative completeness; it is widely applied, but seldom without further specification except in reference to dictionaries or similar works. An abstract is a condensation of a treatise or of a proposed treatment, summarizing its essential points; it is seldom thought of as attaining independent worth. A brief is an abstract stating concisely a case or an argument, especially in law. A synopsis or conspectus is a presentation of the salient points of a treatise (sometimes a subject) in so concise and orderly a fashion that the whole treatment (or subject) may be apprehended at a glance. An epitome is the briefest possible condensation, giving a complex whole in miniature, often in such fashion as to acquire value of its own.

Ana. Digest, précis, *compendium, sketch, syllabus.

Ant. Expansion. — Con. Paraphrase (see TRANSLATION): *development.

abrogate. 1 *Annul, avoid, vacate, quash, void.

Ana. *Abolish, extinguish, abate.

Ant. Institute (by enacting, decreeing, etc.). — Con. *Ratify, confirm: establish, *found.

2 *Nullify, annul, negate, invalidate.

Ana. *Abolish, annihilate, extinguish: *destroy, demolish: *ruin, wreck: cancel, obliterate, blot out (see ERASE).

Ant. Establish, fix (a right, a character, a quality, a custom, etc.). — Con. Settle, firm (see SET): uphold, *support.

abrupt. 1 *Steep, precipitous, sheer.

Ana. Perpendicular, *vertical, plumb.

Ant. Sloping. — Con. *Level, flat, plain, plane, even, smooth: slanting, inclined (see SLANT, v.).

2 Sudden, *precipitate, headlong, impetuous, hasty.

Ana. Quick, speedy (see FAST): hurried, hastened (see HASTEN): unceremonious (see ceremonious under CEREMONIAL): curt, brusque (see BLUFF).

Ant. Deliberate, leisurely. — Con. *Slow, dilatory, laggard: easy, *comfortable, restful, reposeful.

abscess. Abscess, ulcer, canker, canker sore denote sores formed by the disintegration of tissue. An abscess is a collection of pus having its beginning in the depths of the tissues, usually resulting from bacterial infection; it may or may not break through to a surface. An ulcer is an open, and, often, pus-discharging sore on the surface of the skin or of an organ, or on any of the mucous membranes. It is commonly caused by bacterial or parasitic infection, faulty nutrition of a part, or chemical action; thus, a peptic ulcer is caused by the action of the gastric juice on the walls of the stomach or intestine. Canker denotes a corroding or sloughing ulcer, but now usually refers to a spreading ulcer or collection of ulcers in or about the mouth. A canker sore is a small ulcer affecting chiefly the lips and mouth, and is caused by digestive derangements.

abscond. Decamp, flee, fly, *escape.

Ana. Depart, leave, quit, *go, scam, clear out.

Ant. Give (oneself) up. — Con. *Stay, wait, remain, abide: confess, *acknowledge.

absence. *Lack, privation, defect, want.

Ana. *Need, necessity, exigency: deficiency (see corresponding adjective at DEFICIENT): destitution (see corresponding adjective at DEVOID): void, vacuum (see HOLE).

Ant. Presence. — Con. Abundance, copiousness, plenty (see corresponding adjectives at PLENTIFUL): sufficiency, adequacy, competence, enough (see corresponding adjectives at SUFFICIENT).

absent, adj. Preoccupied, *abstracted, absent-minded, distrait, distraught.

Ana. Engrossed, absorbed, *intent, rapt: heedless, inadvertent (see CARELESS): oblivious, unmindful, *forgetful.

Ant. Attentive. — Con. *Thoughtful, considerate: attending, listening, hearkening (see ATTEND).

absent-minded. Absent, *abstracted, preoccupied, distrait, distraught.

Ana. Inattentive, thoughtless, inconsiderate (see affirmative adjectives at ATTENTIVE): heedless, inadvertent (see CARELESS): unobserving, unseeing, unperceiving, unnoticed (see affirmative verbs at SEE).

Ant. Wide-awake. — Con. *Watchful, alert, vigilant: *attentive.

absolute. 1 *Pure, simple, sheer.

Ana. *Perfect, whole, entire: *real, true: *abstract, ideal: *consummate, finished.

Ant. Mixed, qualified. — Con. Incomplete (see affirmative adjective at FULL): imperfect, unentire, unintact (see affirmative adjectives at PERFECT).

2 Absolute, autocratic (or autocratical), arbitrary, despotic (or despotical), tyrannical, tyrannous denote in common exercising power or authority without external restraint. Absolute does not of itself add any further implication to this general denotation. It is restricted in application chiefly to words for authority or for one in authority; as, an absolute monarch; absolute control. "The power of the lawyers was not absolute . . . The King by exceptional action could compel them to do his will" (Belloc). Autocratic implies assumption or exercise of absolute power or authority; though it is not necessarily opprobrious, it often connotes egotistical consciousness of power and haughty imposition of one's own will. "Let the Emperor turn his nominal sovereignty into a real central and autocratic power" (Belloc). Arbitrary implies the exercise, usually the abuse, of power in accord with one's opinion of the moment, free of such reasoned guides as constitution and laws which make for consistent and reasonably predictable action. "All the constitutional safeguards of English freedom were swept away. Arbitrary taxation, arbitrary legislation, arbitrary imprisonment were powers claimed without dispute and unaparingly used by the Crown" (J. R. Green). Despotic and tyrannical are stronger than autocratic; despotic implying the arbitrary and imperious exercise of absolute power or control, and tyrannical, the abuse of such power or control (frequently through harshness, oppression, or severity). "The simplest form of government is despotism, where all the inferior orbs of power are moved merely by the will of the Supreme" (Burke). "How could I have borne to become the slave of her tyrannical humors?" (Burney). "The [school] master, I fear, must be something of a despot at the risk of his becoming something like a tyrant" (Scott). Tyrannous is more frequently used of things than of persons. "A . . . skeptical smile, of all expressions the most tyrannous over a susceptible mind" (G. Eliot).

Ana. *Totalitarian, authoritarian: *dictatorial, magisterial: domineering, imperious, *masterful.

Ant. Restrained; limited. — Con. Circumscribed, restricted (see LIMIT, v.): irresponsible, unanswerable, unamenable (see affirmative adjectives at RESPONSIBLE).
3 *Ultimate, categorical.

Ana. Ideal, transcendent, transcendental (see ABSTRACT): independent, autonomous, *free, sovereign: *infinite, eternal, boundless.

Ant. Conditioned. — Con. Relative, *dependent, conditional, contingent, adjective: circumscribed, limited, restricted (see LIMIT, v.).

☞ Very frequently in loose use absolute (and still more, absolutely) suggests no more than one of the simple ideas involved in any of the complex meanings of the word. For example, absolute is often regarded as an exact synonym of unqualified (an absolute denial), or unconditional (an absolute gift), or complete (absolute indifference), or positive (absolute proof). Moreover, in loose use, the prime implication of absolute in its rich senses—detachment from that which conditions or determines—is lost or obscured.

absolution. *Pardon, indulgence, amnesty.

Ana. Forgiveness, remission (see corresponding verbs at EXCUSE).

Ant. Condemnation: reservation (as defined in canon law). — Con. Censure, reprobation, reprehension (see corresponding verbs at CENSURE).

absolve. 1 Exonerate, acquit, *exculpate, vindicate.

Ana. Pardon, forgive, remit (see EXCUSE): release, *free, discharge.

Ant. Hold to (a promise, an obligation, etc.): charge (with a sin, the blame, the responsibility, etc.). — Con. Blame (see CRITICIZE): *sentence, condemn, doom: *punish, discipline, chasten.

2 *Confess, shrive, remit.

absorb. 1 Absorb, imbibe, assimilate agree in denoting to take (something) in so as to become imbued with it or to make it a part of one's being. The original meaning of absorb, to swallow up (both literally and figuratively), has been maintained in spite of the development of a later and more common sense, to soak up (both literally and figuratively). When the former idea is stressed, absorb implies the loss of identity of that taken in; as, the trust absorbed three small corporations. "In England . . . the aristocracy are subordinate to the middle class, which is gradually absorbing and destroying them" (T. S. Eliot). When soaking up is implied, absorb often suggests enrichment of the recipient; as, the roots of plants absorb moisture. "An adult reader with trained habits of attention and concentration will absorb the contents of a book with . . . speed and retentiveness" (C. W. Eliot). In its literal sense, imbibe usually implies drinking or inhaling; as, to imbibe intoxicating liquors; to imbibe fresh air.

However, imbibe, like absorb, often connotes soaking up; as, the ground imbibes (or absorbs) moisture. In its figurative sense, imbibe, like absorb, implies a process of learning, but it often carries the suggestions that the process has been unconscious and that the effect has been noticeable or profound. "The pupils imbibe no respect for intellectual values at home, and find none among their school-fellows" (Inge). "Egdon was her Hades, and since coming there she had imbibed much of what was dark in its tone" (Hardy). Assimilate implies not only absorption, but also the conversion of what is absorbed into the substance of the assimilating body. In its strict sense, it applies esp. to physiological processes; as, food is assimilated and converted into organic tissue. In its figurative use, it often suggests lasting enrichment without loss of integrity or unity. "Poets . . . who assimilate a number of influences and construct an original speech from them" (Day Lewis). Sometimes it stresses completeness of fusion and consequent loss of identity; as, races incapable of assimilation.

Ana. *Soak, saturate, impregnate: *receive, take: incorporate, embody (see IDENTIFY).

Ant. Exude, give out. — Con. *Eject, expel: *throw (off), cast (off or out).

2 Engross, *monopolize, consume.

Ana. Fix, *fasten: rivet, *secure: immerse, submerge (see DIP).

Ant. Dissipate (time, attention, energies, etc.). — Con. *Scatter, disperse, dispel: *deplete, drain, exhaust.

absorbed. *Intent, engrossed, rapt.

Ana. Immersed (see DIP): riveted (see SECURE, v.): fixed, fastened (see FASTEN).

Ant. Distracted. — Con. Absent, absent-minded, distraught, distrait, *abstracted: wandering, straying, rambling (see WANDER).

abstain. *Refrain, forbear.

Ana. *Forgo, eschew, abnegate: *decline, refuse, spurn, reject: desist (from) (see STOP).

Ant. Indulge. — Con. Pamper (see INDULGE): *sate, sate, surfeit, cloy, gorge, glut: gratify, regale (see PLEASE).

abstemiousness. Abstinence, *temperance, sobriety, continence.

Ana. Self-denial, self-abnegation (see RENUNCIATION): asceticism, austerity (see corresponding adjectives at SEVERE).

Ant. Gluttony. — Con. Greed, rapacity (see CUPIDITY): epicurism (cf. EPICURE).

abstinence. *Temperance, continence, abstemiousness, sobriety.

Ana. Forbearance, refrainment (see corresponding verbs at REFRAIN): forgoing, eschewal, abnegation (see corresponding verbs at FORGO): *renunciation, self-denial, self-abnegation.

Ant. Self-indulgence. — Con. Greediness, covetousness, graspingness, acquisitiveness (see corresponding adjectives at COVETOUS): satisfying, contenting (see SATISFY): gorging, eating, surfeiting (see SATIATE).

abstract, adj. Abstract, ideal, transcendent, transcendental are, in strict use, closely analogous rather than synonymous terms. The difference in meaning between abstract and ideal is not apparent when they are applied to things which are admirable in actuality as well as in idea, as a virtue, some qualities, some attributes; as, abstract (or ideal) justice; ideal (or abstract) morality. When, however, they are applied to the name of a species or type known through actually existing representatives, they reveal their fundamental differences in meaning; as, abstract man (or, man in the abstract); ideal man. For abstract implies the formulation of the idea by abstract-

tion, a logical process in which the mind selects the characters common to every known member of a species or every known instance of a quality and builds up a conception (technically, a concept) which describes no one actually existing thing or instance, but covers all things of the same kind or marked by the given quality. "To shed tears over abstract justice and generosity, beauty, etc., and never to know these qualities when you meet them" (W. James). "Poetic theory is almost invariably an abstraction from poetic practice" (Day Lewis). Ideal may or may not imply abstraction; very often it suggests the exercise of imagination, or the adding and the elimination of characteristics, as the mind seeks a conception of a thing in its perfection. "Plato, in the construction of his ideal republic, is thinking . . . of the symmetry and beauty of the whole" (G. L. Dickinson). In general, therefore, abstract connotes apartness from reality and, often, lack of specific application to actual things. "Algebra . . . is more abstract than geometry" (B. Russell). On the other hand, ideal very frequently connotes superiority to reality or, less often, fancifulness, and, at times, untruth. "That lofty order of minds who pant after the ideal . . . [whose] emotions are of too exquisite a character to find fit objects among their everyday fellow-men" (G. Eliot). Transcendent and transcendental, though often used as though they are equivalents of ideal, actually imply existence beyond experience and lack of correspondence to reality as known through the senses. Thus, in careful use, transcendent (or transcendental) beauty is not the perfection of the beauty that is known, but a supersensual beauty which has no parallel in experience and which cannot be apprehended through any likeness in actuality. "The idea that God is transcendent . . . exalted above the world . . . is yielding to the idea of God as immanent in his creation" (A. V. G. Allen). In Kant's philosophy they are distinguished. That which is transcendent is both beyond experience and beyond human knowledge; that which is transcendental is beyond experience yet knowable, because the mind possesses knowledge not derived from experience but inherent in its own constitution and essential to its understanding of experience. Thus, space and time, in Kant's philosophy, are transcendental ideas.

Ana. Universal, general, generic: specific (see SPECIAL): *ultimate, absolute, categorical.

Ant. Concrete. — Con. Practical (see PRACTICABLE): actual, *real: *material, physical, corporeal, objective, phenomenal.

abstract, n. Brief, synopsis, epitome, *abridgment, conspectus.

Ana. Sketch, précis, aperçu, *compendium, digest.

Ant. Amplification. — Con. Expansion, dilation (see corresponding verbs at EXPAND): enlargement (see corresponding verbs at INCREASE).

abstract, v. Prescind, *detach, disengage.

Ana. Withdraw, *remove, draw: *separate, part, divorce, divide: purloin, filch, *steal.

Ant. Insert, introduce. — Con. Interpolate, insinuate, interpose (see INTRODUCE): *replace.

abstracted. Abstracted, preoccupied, absent, absent-minded, distract, distracted are comparable when they mean inattentive to that which presently claims or demands consideration. Abstracted implies absorption of the mind in something other than one's surroundings, and often suggests reflection on weighty matters. "Then he sat and thought . . . in the concentrated, abstracted way he has . . . almost forgetting my presence" (R. Macaulay). Preoccupied implies unreadiness for any new demands on one's attention because one is already busy with other thoughts or occupations. "Edna was so preoccupied with misgivings as to whether he wanted to marry her that she had never faced squarely the more important problem of whether she wanted to marry him" (M. A. Barnes). Absent stresses inability to fix the mind on present concerns; it often connotes mental wandering rather than concentration on other things. "Sir Joshua . . . was quite absent all the day, not knowing a word that was said to him" (Burney). Absent-minded implies that the mind is fixed elsewhere: it suggests abstractedness or preoccupation more than absentness; as, he absent-mindedly put the lighted end of the cigar in his mouth. It often implies a mental habit rather than a present mood; as, the absent-minded professor. Distract, a French word now naturalized in English, implies dispersal of the powers of attention and inability to concentrate. It may describe a temperament or a mood; as, she has been noticeably distract since her illness. Distracted also suggests inability to concentrate but it always implies an agitated state of mind caused by worry or perplexity. "O, if I wake, shall I not be distracted, Environed with all these hideous fears?" (Shak.).

Ana. *Intent, engrossed: oblivious, unmindful (see FORGETFUL): ignoring, overlooking, disregarding (see NEGLECT, v.).

Ant. Alert. — Con. Wide-awake, vigilant, *watchful: attentive, *thoughtful, considerate: observant, noting, noticing, seeing (see corresponding verbs at SEE).

abstruse. *Recondite, occult, esoteric.

Ana. *Complex, complicated, intricate, knotty: *abstract, ideal: enigmatic, cryptic, dark, *obscure.

Ant. Obvious, plain. — Con. *Evident, manifest, clear, palpable: *easy, simple, facile: *clear, perspicuous, lucid.

absurd. Silly, preposterous, *foolish.

Ana. Ludicrous, ridiculous, *laughable, droll, funny, comic: *irrational, unreasonable: asinine, silly, fatuous, *simple.

Ant. Rational, sensible. — Con. Reasonable (see RATIONAL): *wise, sane, judicious, prudent: *logical.

abundant. Copious, ample, *plentiful, plenteous.

Ana. Abounding, teeming, overflowing, superabounding (see TEEM): *profuse, lavish, luxuriant, lush, exuberant.

Ant. Scarce. — Con. *Infrequent, rare, uncommon: *meager, scant, scanty, skimpy, exiguous, sparse: *deficient.

abuse, v. Abuse, misuse, mistreat, maltreat, ill-treat, outrage all denote to use or treat a person or thing improperly or wrongfully. Abuse and misuse are capable of wider use than the others for they do not invariably imply either deliberateness or wantonness. "My dear Vicar, I can't abuse your generosity to that extent. You're doing more than enough for me already" (C. Mackenzie). "It turns a man's stomach t'hear the Scripture misused i' that way" (G. Eliot). Abuse, however, commonly suggests perversion of the ends for which something was intended. "The constitution leaves them [the states] this right in the confidence that they will not abuse it" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "In the heyday of Capitalism, when . . . no laws had been made to limit its abuse" (Shaw). Sometimes it implies excess in use that injures or impairs; as, to abuse one's strength. Misuse, by contrast with abuse, emphasizes the actual mistreatment or misapplication rather than its results. "Who misuses a dog would misuse a child—they cannot speak for themselves" (Tennyson). "Artful misuse of the confidence of others" (J. Martineau). Mistreat, maltreat, and ill-treat usually imply a fault or an evil motive in the agent, such as meanness, culpable ignorance, or spitefulness. "Many more patients die from being mistreated for consumption than from consumption itself" (Lyttton). "The metre, though a well-known English critic has maltreated it of late, is a very fine one" (Saintsbury). "His deliberate maltreatment of another man's soul resulted in the loss of his own moral free-will" (J. Hawthorne). "Ill-treatment of animals was especially tormenting to him" (G. Bradford). Outrage implies abuse so violent or extreme in its nature as to exceed all bounds. "This interview outrages all decency" (Broome). "Wherever there is war there is misery and outrage" (Cowper).

Ana. Hurt, *injure, harm, damage, impair, mar, spoil: *wrong, persecute, oppress: pervert, corrupt, *debase, debauch, vitiate.

Ant. Respect, honor. — Con. Esteem (see corresponding noun at REGARD): *revere, venerate, reverence: *commend, applaud, compliment: cherish, treasure, prize (see APPRECIATE).

abuse, n. Abuse, vituperation, invective, obloquy, scurrility, billingsgate agree in denoting vehemently expressed condemnation or disapproval. Abuse, the most general term, implies the anger of the speaker and stresses the offensiveness of the language. "The extended vocabulary of barrack-room abuse" (Kipling). "Those thunderous comminations, that jeering and abuse which make Milton's prose such lively reading" (A. Huxley). In a weakened sense it now often implies hardly more than expression of personal disapproval or displeasure. "The word ['rhetoric'] is merely a vague term of abuse for any style that is bad" (T. S. Eliot). Vituperation suggests the overwhelming of someone or something with a torrent of abuse. "The daily volleys of that great French master of vituperation, Léon Daudet" (T. S. Eliot). Invective implies vehemence and bitterness in attack or denunciation, and (often in distinction from abuse) connotes a command of language and skill in making one's points. It is the precise term when the attack is public and made in a good cause. "John Bull stopped at nothing in the way of insult; but its blazing audacity of invective never degenerated into dull abuse" (A. Repplier). Obloquy suggests defamation and consequent disgrace. "Those who . . . stood by me in the teeth of obloquy, taunt and open sneer" (Wilde). Scurrility stresses coarseness or indecency of language and emphasizes the quality of the abuse rather than the attack in itself. "He was . . . interrupted in his defence by ribaldry and scurrility from the judgment seat" (Macaulay). Billingsgate stresses more strongly than any of the other words the offensiveness, often foulness or obscenity, of the language of an attack. "The more I humbled myself the more he stormed . . . provoking me with scandalous names that I could not put up with; so that I gave a loose to my passion, [and] returned his billingsgate" (Smollett).

Ana. Aspersion, reflection, stricture, *animadversion: reviling, railing, rating, berating (see SCOLD, v.): vilification, malignment (see corresponding verbs at MALIGN).

abusive. Abusive, opprobrious, vituperative, contumelious, scurrilous, scurrile (or scurril) apply chiefly to language or utterances, and to persons as they employ such language: in such use, the words agree in meaning coarse, insulting, and contemptuous in character or utterance. Abusive means little more than this; as, abusive language; an abusive master; abusive satire. All the other terms carry specific and distinctive implications. Opprobrious suggests the imputation of disgraceful actions or of shameful conduct: it implies not only abusiveness but also severe, often unjust, condemnation. "This party . . . has generally mentioned [the allies] under opprobrious appellations, and in such terms of contempt or execration as never had been heard" (Burke). Vituperative implies indulgence in a stream of abusive, insulting, or opprobrious language, especially in attacking an opponent; as, the vituperative controversialists of the seventeenth century; "vituperative . . . editors" (Carlyle); "to restrain this employment of vituperative language" (J. S. Mill). Contumelious adds to opprobrious the implications of insolence and extreme disrespect and usually connotes the bitter humiliation of its victim; as, "With scoffs and scorns and contumelious taunts" (Shak.); "Curving a contumelious lip, [he] gorgonized me from head to foot with a stony British stare" (Tennyson); "I . . . expose a chain of causes and effects that Roosevelt himself, if he were alive, would denounce as grossly contumelious to his native purity of spirit—and perhaps in all honesty" (Mencken). Scurrilous or, now less often, scurrile or scurril, often approaches vituperative in suggesting attack and abuse, but it always implies gross, vulgar, often obscenely ribald, language; as, "They never fail to attack the passengers with all kinds of scurrilous, abusive, and indecent terms" (Fielding); "May plaister his clean name with scurrilous rhymes!" (Tennyson); "What outcries and lewd laughter, scurril gibe" (Browning).

Ana. Insulting, affronting, offending, outraging (see OFFEND): aspersing, maligning, vilifying (see MALIGN).

Ant. Complimentary: respectful. — Con. Flattering (see COMPLIMENT, v.): panegyric, eulogistic (see corresponding nouns at ENCOMIUM): praising, lauding, extolling, acclaiming (see PRAISE, v.).

abutment. Pier, *buttress.

abutting. Contiguous, adjoining, *adjacent, tangent, conterminous, juxtaposed.

Ana. *Close, near, nigh, near by: joining, connecting (see JOIN): *nearest, next: impinging (cf. impingement under IMPACT).

Con. Detached, disengaged (see DETACH): disconnected, disjointed, disassociated (see affirmative verbs at JOIN).

abysm. *Gulf, chasm, abyss.

abysmal. *Deep, profound.

Ana. Illimitable, *infinite.

Con. *Superficial, shallow.

abyss. *Gulf, chasm, abysm.

abyssal. Bathysmal, bathybic, pelagic, oceanic, marine (see AQUATIC).

academic. 1 Scholastic, *pedantic, bookish.

Ana. *Dry, arid: erudite, scholarly, *learned.

Con. Unlettered, uneducated, untaught, unlearned, illiterate, *ignorant.

2 *Theoretical, speculative.

academy. Academy, seminary, institute, college, lycée, gymnasium are here compared as types of secondary schools and not in their other applications. In general, but not without exceptions, the first three represent American usage; the last three, respectively, British, French, and German. Academy was originally applied to a type of school established in the early republic to educate youth not planning to enter a university yet wishing to go further than was possible in the lower schools. Many of these old foundations still exist, some as public high schools, some as private schools, and are still called academies; as, Rome Free Academy; Phillips Exeter Academy. Newer schools using the designation academy are for the most part private; as, Friends Academy. Seminary, in its early English use with reference to a secondary school, was a designation (often a supposedly refined designation) of a private school, especially one for young ladies. It is now nearly obsolete in England but is still found in the United States in the names of some finishing schools for girls and of some private denominational schools for both sexes; as, Wyoming Seminary Institute is even more variable in its application. It is especially applied to technical schools and military schools (as, Virginia Military Institute), though some of the former are now or were originally of collegiate rank; as, Pratt Institute College, as used in reference to secondary schools, is found only in the names of a few mostly ancient English public schools (as, Eton College, Winchester College) or of similar schools in the British dominions and colonies; as, Upper Canada College. Collège is also used in the name of some secondary schools in France, but lycée is the designation of the type of government-controlled school, with a seven-year course ending with the baccalaureate and preparing for the university, for St. Cyr (the military school) or for one of the great technical schools. The German gymnasium has a nine-year course and corresponds roughly to the American secondary school and the first two years of college, as understood in the United States. Lycee and gymnasium are also used of similar schools in other European countries.

accede. Acquiesce, *assent, consent, agree, subscribe.

Ana. Concur, co-operate (see UNITE): *yield, submit, defer, relent: allow, permit, *let.

Ant. Demur. — Con. *Decline, refuse, reject, spurn: shy, stickle, stick, strain, balk (see DEMUR): *object, protest, kick: *oppose, resist, withstand.

accelerate. *Speed, quicken, hurry, hasten, precipitate.

Ana. Forward, further, *advance, promote: drive, impel (see MOVE).

Ant. Decelerate: retard. — Con. *Delay, slow, slacken: impede, obstruct, block, *hinder: *hamper, clog.

accent, n. 1 Stress, accentuation, *emphasis.

Ana. Beat, pulse, throb, pulsation (see corresponding verbs at PULSATE): *rhythm, cadence, meter.

2 Intonation, *inflection.

Ana. Pronunciation, enunciation, articulation (see corresponding verbs at PRONOUNCE).

accentuation. Accent, stress, *emphasis.

Ana. *Rhythm, cadence, meter, pronunciation, enunciation, articulation (see corresponding verbs at PRONOUNCE).

Ant. Inaccentuation. — Con. Evenness, steadiness, uniformity (see corresponding adjectives at STEADY).

accept. *Receive, admit, take.

Ana. *Adopt, embrace, espouse: acquiesce (in), *assent (to), agree (to), subscribe (to).

Ant. Reject. — Con. *Decline, refuse, repudiate, spurn: disavow, disown, disacknowledge (see affirmative verbs at ACKNOWLEDGE): *deny, contradict, negative: ignore, disregard (see NEGLECT).

acceptance. Acceptance, acceptance have both at one time or another carried the meanings: the act or fact of accepting, or the state of being accepted. Present good usage, however, restricts their denotations. Acceptance only is used to denote the act of accepting ("A blind acceptance of authority"—Inge) or the state of one who accepts something, especially something inevitable or inescapable ("All settled back into a sad sort of acceptance of the situation"—Deland). Both acceptance and acceptation may be used to denote the state of being accepted, or especially, of being approved or believed. "Metrical forms are conventional, and therefore rest . . . on acceptance" (Lowes). "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance" (1 Timothy i. 15). Acceptation tends, however, to confine itself to denoting the sense in which a word or expression is generally received. "Not . . . a cultivated man in the ordinary acceptance of the words" (C. W. Eliot).

acceptation. 1 *Meaning, sense, signification, significance, import.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

2 *Acceptance.

access. 1 Ingress, *entrance, entree, entry.

Ana. Approaching or approach, nearing (see APPROACH, v.): *admittance, admission: *way, route, passage: *door, portal, gate, gateway.

Ant. Outlet. — Con. Departure, withdrawal, retirement (see corresponding verbs at GO): retreat, recession (see corresponding verbs at RECEDE).

2 Accession, attack, *fit, paroxysm, spasm, convulsion.

Ana. Onset, onslaught, assault (see ATTACK): seizure, clutch, taking (see corresponding verbs at TAKE): twinge, *pain, stitch, pang, throe.

accession. 1 *Addition, accretion, increment.

Ant. Discard.

2 Access, attack, *fit, paroxysm, spasm, convulsion.

Ana. See those at ACCESS, 2.

accessory or accessory, adj. Contributory, *auxiliary, subsidiary, adjuvant, ancillary, subservient.

Ana. Secondary, collateral, tributary, succursal, *subordinate: concomitant, concurrent, coincident (see CONTEMPORARY): incidental, adventitious (see ACCIDENTAL).

Ant. Constituent, integral: principal (in law). — Con. *Inherent, intrinsic, constitutional, ingrained: essential, indispensable, requisite, *needful, necessary: fundamental, vital, cardinal (see ESSENTIAL).

accessory, n. 1 Appurtenance, adjunct, *appendage.

Ana. Concomitant, *accompaniment: *addition, accretion, increment.

2 Accessory, abettor, *confederate, conspirator.

Ant. Principal.

accident. 1 *Quality, character, attribute, property.

Ana. Mark, *sign, note, badge, token, symptom: characteristic, peculiarity (see corresponding adjectives at CHARACTERISTIC).

Ant. Substance (in philosophy).

2 *Chance, hazard, luck, fortune, hap.

Ana. Contingency, fortuity or fortuitousness, adventitiousness (see corresponding adjectives at ACCIDENTAL).

Ant. Design, intent. — Con. Calculation, circumsppection (see corresponding adjectives at CAUTIOUS): *plan, plot, project, scheme: *intention, purpose.

3 Accident, casualty, mishap are synonyms when they designate chance or a chance event bringing injury or loss. Accident is broadest in its application, being used of events that involve persons or things, or injuries or losses, serious or slight; as, he was crippled by the accident; a railway accident; owing to an accident to the machines, one department was closed down; accidental spilling of ink. Casualty commonly implies destruction, especially of life. "The martlet [=the martin, a bird], Builds in the weather on the outward wall, Even in the force and road of casualty" (Shak.). Casualty is now chiefly applied to an individual whose death, serious injury, or even desertion, constitutes a loss to a military (or similar) force engaged in hazardous activities; as, the regiment suffered heavy casualties. As applied to insurance, accident and casualty are usually distinguished: accident insurance is a provision against injury to oneself through accident; casualty insurance is a provision for indemnification, especially for damages incurred through one's liability for injury or loss to others. Mishap, as a rule, is applied only to slight accidents, especially those involving disappointment or frustration; as, a day seldom passes without one mishap or another.

Ana. *Disaster, catastrophe: mischance, *misfortune.

accidental. Accidental, casual, fortuitous, contingent, incidental, adventitious. The last five of these words are synonyms of accidental but not always of one another. For accidental denotes simply either happening by chance (as, an accidental meeting) or not of the real or essential nature of a thing (as, the essential and the accidental values of a college education). Casual, fortuitous, and contingent come into comparison with accidental in the first of these senses; incidental and adventitious, chiefly in its second sense. Casual so strongly stresses absence of prearrangement or premeditation that it tends to obscure the implication of chance; as, a casual discovery. "It was no casual re-encounter. He had been enticed into the place . . . with some sinister and perhaps deadly purpose" (Froude). As applied to persons, their actions, their clothes, and the like, it often implies heedlessness or indifference. "This strange landscape, which seemed so dull to the casual view" (C. Rourke). "[The rector] had been very casual about visiting his parishioners" (C. Mackenzie). Sometimes it is the appearance of carelessness or nonchalance, and not the reality, that is suggested. "This sense of an audience made him deliberately casual in his bearing" (H. G. Wells). Fortuitous so strongly implies chance that it sometimes connotes the absence, or seeming absence, of a cause. "The good frame of the universe was not the product of chance or fortuitous concourse of particles of matter" (M. Hale). Contingent, as here compared, always implies both possibility and uncertainty, the former because that which is so described may come about, the latter because the outcome is unpredictable owing to the possible operation of chance, of unseen causes, or of the possible influence of unforeseen events. Contingent is therefore always applied to what may come; as, the contingent advantages of a new law are to be distinguished from those that are immediate and certain; to prepare for all contingencies. Incidental may or may not imply chance: it often suggests a real, and it may be, a designed relationship, but one which is secondary and nonessential; thus, an incidental advantage of a college education may have been foreseen or sought after, but it is not regarded as of first importance; the incidental expenses of housekeeping must be provided for in one's budget, but they cannot be enumerated under any of the usual headings. "The Irish question is only incidental to the larger question" (J. R. Lowell). Incidental sometimes implies contingency that amounts to a strong probability; as, ills incidental to old age; loss of morale is incidental to poverty. Adventitious conveys no necessary suggestion of chance but it does imply a lack of essential relationship. That which is adventitious is that which does not belong to the original and intrinsic nature of a thing but has been added. "In works of imagination and sentiment . . . metre is but adventitious to composition" (Wordsworth).

Ana. Haphazard, *random, hit-or-miss, chance: unintended, undesigned, unpurposed (see affirmative verbs at INTEND): contingent, *dependent, adjective, conditional.

Ant. Planned: essential. — Con. Intended, designed, purposed (see INTEND): plotted, projected, schemed (see corresponding verbs under PLAN, n.): *inherent, constitutional, intrinsic, ingrained: *innate, inborn.

acclaim, v. Extol, laud, *praise, eulogize.

Ana. *Applaud, cheer, root, huzza: *exalt, magnify: glorify, honor (see corresponding nouns at FAME).

Ant. Vituperate. — Con. Revile, berate, rate (see SCOLD): *execrate, objugate, damn: denounce, censure, reprobate (see CRITICIZE).

acclaim, n. Acclamation, *applause, plaudits.

Ana. Homage, *honor, reverence: renown, glory, élat (see FAME): huzza, hurrah, cheer (see corresponding verbs at APPLAUD).

Ant. Vituperation. — Con. Obloquy, *abuse, invective: condemnation, denunciation, reprobation, censure (see corresponding verbs at CRITICIZE).

acclamation. Acclaim, *applause, plaudits.

Ana., Ant., Con. See those at ACCLAIM, n.

acclimate. Acclimatize, *harden, inure, season.

Ana. Accustom, *habituate: *adapt, adjust, conform.

acclimatize. Acclimate, *harden, inure, season.

Ana. See ACCLIMATE.

acclivity. Slope, *slant, grade, gradient, incline, inclination.

Ana. Ascent, *ascension: elevation, *height, altitude.

Ant. Declivity. — Con. Descent (see corresponding verb at DESCEND): decline, declension (see DETERIORATION).

accommodate. 1 Adjust, *adapt, conform, reconcile.

Ana. *Yield, submit, bow, defer: modify, *change, alter, vary: temper, attemper, *moderate, qualify.

Ant. Constrain. — Con. *Estrange, alienate.

2 *Oblige, favor.

Ana. *Help, aid, assist: gratify, gladden, *please: *indulge, humor.

Ant. Incommode. — Con. *Inconvenience, discommode, trouble: annoy, harass, harry, *worry: vex, irk (see ANNOY).

3 Hold, *contain.

Ana. Lodge, house, board, shelter, *harbor, entertain: take (in), *receive, admit.

accompaniment. Accompaniment, concomitant denote in common something attendant upon, or found in association with, another thing. Both may imply addition, but they vary chiefly in the kind of relationship connoted between the principal and the attendant things. Accompaniment often suggests enhancement by the addition of something appropriate; as, the piano accompaniment for a violin solo; the usual accompaniments of a turkey dinner; fame is not always the accompaniment of success. Sometimes, it so stresses concurrence or coincidence that a lack of causal connection is suggested. "A Roman sedition was the all but invariable accompaniment of a Roman coronation" (Bryce). Concomitant, by contrast, conveys the idea of customary or necessary association. It does not as a rule need the qualifying words "invariable," "essential," "inevitable" which so often precede it, for it implies in itself the qualities attributed by these words; as, disruption of routine is the concomitant of illnesses in a staff; unemployment is the concomitant of a financial panic. "Reproach is a concomitant to greatness" (Addison).

accompany. Accompany, attend, conduct, escort, convey, chaperon agree in meaning to go or be together with; they differ chiefly in their implications as to the nature or purpose of the association. Accompany implies companionship (its etymological notion) or closeness of association and, often, with a personal subject, equality of status; as, rain accompanied by wind; "the light-headedness which accompanies fever" (Kipling); to accompany a friend. Attend commonly implies the subordinate or inferior status of the accompanying person or thing; as, the prince was attended (rather than accompanied) by an equerry, a secretary, and a courier. "The physical sensation that attends it [an emotion]" (Lowes). Sometimes it suggests a service or courtesy. "The General attended her himself to the street door" (Austen). Sometimes it connotes following or coming in the wake of someone or something. "A train of mourning friends attend his pall" (Gray). "The Nemesis that attends upon human pride" (G. L. Dickinson). Conduct usually retains its etymological implication of guidance, even when the subject is impersonal; as, to conduct a blind man across the street; to conduct sightseers through a museum; the pipe conducts water from a trough. Occasionally, the emphasis is not on guidance but on conveyance or transmission; as, metals that conduct heat. Escort and convoy add to accompany the implication of protection. In contemporary use both words and their corresponding nouns often suggest the use of an armed force as a guard, but there is a tendency to prefer escort when persons, and convoy when things, are protected. Also, escort is more often used for journeys on land and convoy for journeys by sea; as, soldiers escorted the caravan through the desert; a cruiser convoyed the freighter (or troop ship) through the submarine zone. Escort, however, often suggests (as convoy in current good English no longer suggests) attending as a courtesy or honor; as, three battleships escorted the visiting potentate's ship into the harbor; to escort a lady to her home after a party. Chaperon suggests propriety, or sometimes, supervision as the motive of the one who accompanies; in ordinary use, it implies the presence of an older woman as the protector of a young girl at a public place or affair or in mixed company; as, she is younger than you, and therefore cannot chaperon you.

Ana. Associate (with), link (with), combine (with), *join (to): *guide, lead, pilot.

Con. Forsake, desert, *abandon: leave, quit, withdraw (see GO).

accomplice. *Confederate, accessory, abettor, conspirator.

accomplish. Achieve, effect, fulfill, discharge, execute, *perform.

Ana. Complete, finish, conclude (see CLOSE): consummate (see corresponding adjective at CONSUMMATE): implement, *enforce.

Ant. Undo. — Con. Thwart, *frustrate, foil, circumvent: defeat, beat, lick (see CONQUER): *nullify, annul, negate.

accomplished. Finished, *consummate.

Ana. *Proficient, skillful, skilled, adept, expert: *versatile, many-sided, all-round.

accomplishment. Attainment, *acquirement, acquisition.

Ana. *Art, skill, craft: proficiency, adeptness, expertness (see corresponding adjectives at PROFICIENT).

accord, v. 1 Comport, *agree, harmonize, correspond, tally, conform, square, jibe.

Ana. Concur, coincide (see AGREE): blend, fuse, merge, coalesce (see MIX): cohere, adhere (see STICK).

Ant. Conflict. — Con. Clash, collide, jar (see corresponding nouns at IMPACT): differ (from), *differ (with): contrast, *compare.

2 *Grant, vouchsafe, concede, award.

Ana. Deign, condescend (see STOOP): bestow, present, confer, *give.

Ant. Withhold. — Con. *Deny, gainsay: refuse (see DECLINE): hold back, detain, reserve (see KEEP).

accord, n. 1 Concord, consonance, *harmony.

Ana. Agreement, acquiescence, consent (see corresponding verbs at ASSENT): union, solidarity, *unity: sympathy, affinity, *attraction.

Ant. Dissension, strife: antagonism. — Con. *Discord, conflict, variance, contention: antipathy, animosity, hostility (see ENMITY).

2 *Agreement, understanding.

Ana. Pact, compact, treaty, entente, concordat (see CONTRACT).

accordingly. So, consequently, *therefore, hence, then.

accost. *Address, greet, hail, salute.

Ana. *Speak (to), talk (with), converse (with): affront, *offend, insult.

Con. Avoid, shun, elude, evade, *escape: ignore, slight, overlook (see NEGLECT).

accouchement. Delivery, labor, travail, *childbirth, parturition.

Ana. analogous words.

Ant. antonyms.

Con. contrasted words.

See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

account, v. 1 *Consider, deem, regard, reckon.

Ana. Regard, esteem (see under REGARD, n.): rate, appraise, evaluate, assess, *estimate.

Con. Underrate, underestimate, undervalue (see primitive verbs at ESTIMATE): disregard, disesteem (see affirmative verbs under REGARD, n.).

2 In form account for. *Explain, justify, rationalize.

Ana. *Answer (for): expound, elucidate, interpret (see EXPLAIN).

account, n. 1 Account, statement, bill are comparable in their commercial senses when they denote a record of charges or credits. An account is a running record or detailed reckoning of charges incurred or of debits and credits; as, no entries have been made in this account for a long time; to balance accounts monthly. A statement is the record of an account, rendered either on demand or periodically. A bill gives the amount due for, or an itemized list of, purchases made, services rendered, etc., and always implies notice that payment is due; it may be submitted periodically or at the time of transaction; as, a dentist's or a grocer's bill; to receipt a bill.

2 *Use, service, advantage, profit, avail.

Ana. Benefit (see corresponding verb at BENEFIT): usefulness, utility (see USE): *worth, value.

Con. Futility, vanity, fruitlessness, bootlessness (see corresponding adjectives at FUTILE): unimportance, inconsequence, insignificance (see affirmative nouns at IMPORTANCE).

3 Account, report, chronicle, version, story, as here compared, denote a statement of actual events or conditions or of purported occurrences or conditions. An account is an oral or written, detailed, often firsthand statement. "Lord Mountfalcon asked for an account of her passage over to the island; receiving distressingly full particulars" (Meredith). A report is an account, usually of something witnessed or investigated, given by one person to another (often a superior); as, spies send in their reports in cipher; the secretary gave a verbatim report of the conference. A chronicle, in its nontechnical sense, is a detailed and extended account or report of events in their order of occurrence. "No more yet of this [Prospero's experiences after being shipwrecked]; For 'tis a chronicle of day by day, not a relation for a breakfast" (Shak.). A version or story is a statement of purported facts. Version always, and story often, implies contrast with another statement of the same events, and, usually, difference in details. But whereas version commonly implies honest difference of detail or of interpretation owing to limitations in each point of view, story often implies actual or suspected falsification (which may, however, be meant to amuse and not to deceive; as, a "tall" story); as, the Democratic and the Republican version of the state of the nation; the witness had been primed to tell a different story; he returned after a week's absence with a story of having been held captive by kidnapers.

accountable. *Responsible, answerable, amenable, liable.

Ant. Unaccountable. — Con. *Absolute, autocratic, despotic, tyrannical, arbitrary: irresponsible, inamenable, unanswerable (see affirmative adjectives at RESPONSIBLE).

accountant. Auditor, *bookkeeper.

accouter or accoutre. Equip, arm, outfit, *furnish, appoint.

Ana. Array, attire, *clothe, dress, vest, invest: deck, *adorn, embellish, decorate.

Con. *Strip, divest, dismantle.

accredit. 1 Certify, *approve, endorse, sanction.

Ana. Recommend, *commend: vouch for, attest, *certify.

Con. Reject, repudiate (see DECLINE): *disapprove, deprecate.

2 Commission, *authorize, license.

3 Credit, charge, assign, *ascribe, attribute, impute.

Ana. Attach, *fasten: connect, link, associate (see JOIN).

accretion. *Addition, increment, accession.

Ana. Adjunct, *appendage: adhesion, cohesion (see corresponding verbs at STICK): increase, augmentation, enlargement (see corresponding verbs at INCREASE).

Con. Attrition, *erosion: diminution, dwindling, decrease (see corresponding verbs at DECREASE).

accrue. Redound, contribute, *conduce.

Ana. Gain, win, earn (see GET): collect, *gather: *increase, augment, multiply, enlarge.

Con. *Decrease, lessen, dwindle, diminish: *abate, subside, wane, ebb.

accumulate. Accumulate, amass, hoard agree, in their literal and figurative senses, in denoting to bring together so as to make a store or great quantity. Accumulate implies a piling up by a series of increases rather than by a single complete act; it is applicable to almost anything that may increase in amount; as, unused books accumulate dust; a rolling stone accumulates force; he accumulated a fortune in his lifetime. "True poetry, however simple it may appear on the surface, accumulates meaning every time it is read" (Day Lewis). Amass refers usually, but not always, to things that are regarded as valuable, such as money or treasures; as, to amass a fortune in a business venture; to amass a stock of information. It frequently implies more imposing results and more rapid action than accumulate. "The triumphs . . . had amassed from confiscations enough to furnish the sinews of war" (Buchan). Hoard always implies storing up, and frequently, concealment of that stored; as, squirrels hoard nuts for the winter months. Frequently, hoard implies greed and, when used of money, avarice; as, a miser is one who hoards gold.

Ana. *Gather, collect: *heap, pile, stack.

Ant. Dissipate. — Con. *Scatter, disperse, dispel: diminish, lessen, *decrease: *distribute, dispense, deal, dole.

accumulative. *Cumulative, summative, additive.

Ana. Aggregative, conglomerative (see corresponding nouns at AGGREGATE): multiplicative, augmentative (see corresponding verbs at INCREASE).

Con. Dissipating, dispelling, dispersing, scattering (see SCATTER): disintegrating, crumbling, decomposing (see DECAY, v.).

accurate. *Correct, exact, precise, nice, right.

Ana. True, veracious (see corresponding nouns at TRUTH): *impeccable, errorless, flawless, faultless: punctilious, meticulous, *careful.

Ant. Inaccurate. — Con. *Careless, heedless, inadvertent: *slipshod, slovenly: fallacious (see corresponding noun at FALLACY).

accursed. Damnable, cursed, *execrable.

Ana. Abominable, odious, *hateful, abhorrent, detestable: revolting, repulsive, loathsome, *offensive, repugnant.

Ant. Blessed. — Con. Admirable, estimable (see corresponding nouns at REGARD): *holy, sacred, divine: *honorable, honorary.

accuse. Accuse, charge, incriminate, criminate, indict, impeach, arraign denote in common to declare a person guilty of a fault or offense. Accuse is commonly immediate and personal, and often suggests directness or sharpness of imputation or censure; charge retains much of its primary implication of something laid upon one, and frequently connotes seriousness in the offense and formality in the declaration; as, to accuse a bystander of attempting to pick one's pocket (an accusation which may become a formal charge before a magistrate); to accuse a man of cheating (as an offense which one personally resents); to charge a man with cheating (as an infraction of the laws of the game). Incriminate and criminate denote to charge with crime or serious offense. "It would be wrong to incriminate the Order of S. Francis by any suspicion" (Symonds). "We must begin in self-justification . . . by criminating those whom we mean to destroy" (M. Keatinge). Indict adds to charge the implications of a formal consideration of the evidence, as in law, by a grand jury, or in extended use, by a person or persons acting in the role of jury, and of a decision that the accused person should be called to trial or to an accounting; as, the jury refused to indict the men accused of arson. "I am not . . . bringing an indictment against vers libre" (Lowes). Impeach implies, legally, a charge of malfeasance in office formally brought against a public officer by a branch of the government constitutionally authorized to bring such charges; as, the House of Representatives impeached President Andrew Johnson of high crimes and misdemeanors. In nontechnical language, impeach implies a direct charge which demands an answer. "'You buy your loves.' . . . he did not plead verbally against the impeachment" (Meredit). To arraign, in law, is to call or bring a prisoner before a court to answer to the charge of an indictment; figuratively, it often preserves its legal implication, and means to call a person or thing to account before the bar of reason, taste, or the like; as, the indicted men will be arraigned next week; the relief projects were severely arraigned in an editorial. "I was carried down to the Sessions house, where I was arraigned" (Defoe).

Ana. Denounce, blame, reprobate, censure, *criticize.

Ant. Exculpate. — Con. Exonerate, vindicate, acquit, absolve (see EXCULPATE).

accustom. *Habituate, familiarize, addict.

Ana. *Adapt, accommodate, adjust: *harden, inure, season, acclimatize.

Ant. Disaccustom. — Con. Alienate, wean, *estrangle.

accustomed. Wonted, customary, habitual, *usual.

Ana. Natural, normal, *regular, typical: *common, ordinary, familiar.

Ant. Unaccustomed. — Con. *Strange, singular, peculiar, odd, queer, erratic: *infrequent, uncommon, rare, occasional.

acerbity. *Acrimony, asperity.

Ana. Sourness, acidity, tartness (see corresponding adjectives at SOUR): crabbedness, surliness, dourness, saturninity (see corresponding adjectives at SULLEN): bitterness, acidity (see corresponding adjectives at BITTER): harshness, roughness (see corresponding adjectives at ROUGH).

Ant. Mellowness. — Con. Gentleness, mildness, blandness (see corresponding adjectives at SOFT): amiableness, good nature, complaisance (see corresponding adjectives at AMIABLE).

ache, n. *Pain, pang, throe, twinge, stitch.

Ana. *Distress, suffering, agony, misery: anguish, heart-ache (see SORROW): hurt, *injury: torment, torture, rack (see corresponding verbs at AFFLICT).

Con. Relief, alleviation, assuagement, mitigation (see corresponding verbs at RELIEVE): ease, comfort (see REST).

achieve. 1 Accomplish, effect, *perform, fulfill, execute, discharge.

Ana. Complete, finish, conclude (see CLOSE): surmount, overcome, *conquer.

Ant. Fail (to do something), fail (in). — Con. *Begin, commence, start.

2 Attain, *reach, gain, compass.

Ana. Win, secure, obtain, acquire, earn, *get: *realize, actualize: *come (to), arrive (at).

Ant. Miss (getting or attaining). — Con. Deviate (from), depart (from), *swerve (from): *escape, avoid, elude, shun.

achievement. *Feat, exploit.

Ana. Deed, act, *action: *victory, conquest, triumph: consummation, accomplishment (see corresponding adjectives at CONSUMMATE).

Ant. Failure. — Con. Negligence, *neglect: omission, slighting (see corresponding verbs at NEGLECT): defeat, vanquishment, beating, licking (see corresponding verbs at CONQUER).

achromatic. *Colorless, uncolored.

Ana. *Neutral, negative.

Ant. Chromatic. — Con. Colored, tinted, tinged (see corresponding nouns at COLOR).

acid, adj. Acidulous, tart, *sour, dry.

Ana. Acid, *bitter: hard (see ALCOHOLIC): *sharp: *astringent.

Ant. Bland: sweet: alkaline. — Con. *Suave, smooth: mild, *soft, gentle: basic (see ALKALINE).

acidulous. Acid, tart, *sour, dry.

Ana. *Astringent: *sharp: *pungent, piquant: biting, cutting (see INCISIVE).

Ant. Saccharine. — Con. Mellow, ripe (see MATURE): bland, mild, *soft: *suave, smooth, urbane.

acknowledge. 1 Acknowledge, admit, own, avow, confess are synonymous when they mean basically to disclose something against one's will or inclination. All usually imply some sort of pressure, as that of the law or of conscience, leading to the disclosure. Acknowledge implies the making public of one's knowledge of something which has been, or might have been, kept back or concealed; as, to acknowledge a secret marriage, one's faults, one's ignorance. "She did at last extort from her father an acknowledgment that the horses were engaged" (Austen). Admit, with less suggestion of possible concealment, stresses reluctance to grant or concede, and refers rather to facts than to their implications; to admit a charge may involve merely the granting of the fact alleged, not necessarily (as frequently with acknowledge) the acceptance of the point of view which the charge implies. "We . . . were brought up never to admit that there was anything the matter with Howie except that he wasn't very well, or that he was a little backward" (M. Austin). Own is less formal than acknowledge, and regards the thing acknowledged in its relation to oneself; as, to own oneself at a loss; to own to forty years. "When a man owns himself to have been in an error, he does but tell you in other words that he is wiser than he was" (Pope). Avow, which in both of its senses implies an open or bold declaration, as here compared usually implies assertion in the face of hostility; as, to avow one's participation in a movement. "We who practice it [physics] scarcely dare avow ourselves as physicists in any group of laymen" (Karl K. Darrow). Confess usually applies to what one feels to be wrong; as, to confess a crime; to confess one's sins: but it is often used with no such implication, suggesting merely deference to the opinion of others; as, I am not, I confess, convinced.

Ana. Disclose, divulge, *reveal: *grant, concede, allow: publish, *declare, proclaim.

Ant. Deny. — Con. Conceal, *hide, secrete: disavow, disown (see affirmative verbs at ACKNOWLEDGE): gainsay, contradict, impugn, negative (see DENY).

2 Acknowledge, recognize agree in meaning to take cognizance of in some way, usually in a way dictated by custom or convention and implying acceptance or assent. Acknowledge is found in certain idioms where the concrete method of taking notice is not stated but connoted; as, to acknowledge a letter (that is, to send a note of its receipt); to acknowledge a gift (that is, to send a message indicating the receipt and acceptance of the gift and one's gratitude); to acknowledge an introduction (that is, to respond to it by a bow, a greeting, or the like). In freer expression, acknowledge usually implies definite or formal acceptance, as of a principle as binding or of a claim as rightful or of a person as ruler; as, he acknowledged the obligation of a son to support his aged parents. "In Italy during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries there were two acknowledged sources of political power: the Empire and the Church" (A. Huxley). Recognize, though often used interchangeably with acknowledge, suggests more strongly authoritative sanction or full admission as to a given or implied status, or suggests actual and manifest, as contrasted with formal or merely verbal, acceptance; as, they acknowledged the part he had played in their success, but they refused to recognize it suitably; in 1918, England, France, and the United States recognized Czechoslovakia as an independent state. "The ladies never acted so well as when they were in the presence of a fact which they acknowledged but did not recognize" (Meredith). Recognize sometimes implies, as acknowledge never does, full realization or comprehension. "Courts . . . have been . . . slow to recognize that statutes . . . may imply a policy different from that of the common law" (Justice Holmes). "Some interval . . . between the real advent of the new state of things and the . . . full recognition of that state of things" (Belloc).

Ana. Accept, *receive: notice, note, remark (see SEE): respond, reply, *answer.

Ant. Ignore. — Con. Disregard, slight, *neglect: repudiate, spurn, reject (see DECLINE).

acme. Apex, zenith, culmination, climax, *summit, peak, apogee, pinnacle, meridian.

acoustic, acoustical. *Auditory, audible.

acquaint. *Inform, apprise, advise, notify, advertise.

Ana. Tell, *reveal, disclose, divulge: *teach, instruct, educate, school: familiarize, accustom, *habituate.

Con. Conceal, *hide: withhold, reserve, hold back (information) (see KEEP).

acquaintance. *Friend, intimate, confidant.

Ana. *Associate, companion, comrade, crony.

Con. *Stranger, outsider.

acquiesce. Consent, agree, *assent, accede, subscribe.

Ana. Accept, *receive: conform, *adapt, adjust, accommodate, reconcile (oneself): *yield, submit, bow: concur, coincide (see AGREE).

Ant. Object. — Con. Protest, remonstrate, kick (see OBJECT): *demur, stickle, stick, shy, balk: differ (from), *differ (with).

acquiescence. Compliance, resignation. See under COMPLIANT.

Ana. Deference, obeisance (see HONOR): submissiveness (see corresponding adjective at TAME).

Ant. Rebelliousness or rebellion. — Con. Insubordination, contumaciousness (see corresponding adjectives at INSUBORDINATE).

acquiescent. Resigned, *compliant.

Ana. Submissive (see TAME): yielding, submitting, deferring, bowing, relenting (see YIELD).

Ant. Rebellious. — Con. Contumacious, *insubordinate: protesting, objecting, kicking, remonstrating (see OBJECT, v.): resisting, opposing, combating (see OPPOSE).

acquire. Obtain, *get, gain, win, earn, secure, procure.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

Ana. Attain, achieve, compass, *reach: annex, *add, superadd: *buy, purchase: *take, seize, snatch, grab.
Ant. Forfeit. — Con. Alienate, alien, *transfer, convey: *relinquish, surrender, abandon, yield.

acquirement. Acquirement, acquisition, attainment, accomplishment come into comparison when they denote a power or skill that is the fruit of exertion or effort; in this sense, they are very often used in the plural. Acquirement implies achievement as a result of continued endeavor and self-cultivation rather than of natural gifts or talent. "A woman of considerable information and literature; acquirements not common amongst . . . ladies" (Edgeworth). Acquisition adds to acquirement (in specific and general senses) the implications that the thing acquired is an addition or gain and that the endeavor to acquire has been characterized by avidity, sometimes even by cupidity. "Accumulations of knowledge . . . in excess of his present mental energy. His acquisitions interfere with his judgment" (S. M. Crothers). As applied to an acquired power or skill, acquisition usually stresses, as acquirement does not, the inherent value of that power or skill; as, absolute disinterestedness is a rare acquisition, even in historians. "No philosopher would resign his mental acquisitions for the purchase of any terrestrial good" (Peacock). Attainment commonly refers to distinguished achievements as in the arts, in statesmanship, in science; it suggests fully developed talent or talents; as, artists of high attainments; remarkable literary attainments. "Men that count it a great attainment to be able to talk much" (Glanville). Accomplishment refers to any acquired power or grace such as may make for agreeable social intercourse. "My new accomplishment of dancing" (C. Churchill). "We found that even for Men of Science this neat clean carving of words was a very necessary accomplishment" (Quiller-Couch). "He was distinguished not only by solid acquirements, but by elegant accomplishments" (G. Smith).

Ana. Achievement (see FEAT): *addition, accretion.
Con. *Lack, want, defect, privation.

acquisition. *Acquirement, attainment, accomplishment.

Ana. *Addition, accession, accretion, increment: *possessions, belongings, means, assets: *gift, genius, talent, aptitude: *art, skill, cunning.

acquisitive. Grasping, avaricious, greedy, *covetous.
Ana. Avid, *eager, keen, athirst: possessing or possessive, owning, enjoying (see corresponding verbs at HAVE).
Ant. Sacrificing, abnegating. — Con. Forgoing, forbearing, eschewing (see FORGO): self-denying, renunciate (see corresponding nouns at RENUNCIATION).

acquit. 1 Absolve, exonerate, vindicate, *exculpate.
Ana. Discharge, *free, release, liberate: *excuse, pardon, forgive, remit.

Ant. Convict. — Con. Condemn, *sentence, doom, proscribe, damn, attain: denounce, blame (see CRITICIZE).

2 Quit, *behave, conduct, demean, deport, comport.
Ana. *Act, behave, work, operate, react.

Con. Misbehave, misconduct, misdeemean (see primitive verbs at BEHAVE).

acrid. 1 *Bitter.

Ana. *Pungent, piquant: *astringent: biting (see INCISIVE): *offensive, repugnant, loathsome.

Ant. Savory. — Con. *Palatable, sapid, saporous, toothsome, tasty: fragrant, *odorous, aromatic, balmy: delicious, delectable, luscious, *delightful.

2 *Caustic, mordant, mordacious, scathing.
Ana. *Sharp, keen: surly, crabbed, morose (see SULLEN): malevolent, malign, spiteful, *malicious: virulent, venomous, *poisonous.

Ant. Benign, kindly. — Con. *Suave, urbane, bland, smooth, politic.

acrimonious. *Angry, irate, indignant, wrathful, mad.
Ana. Testy, splenetic, choleric, *irascible, cranky, cross: rancorous, hostile, antagonistic (see corresponding nouns at ENMITY): quarrelsome, contentious, *belligerent.

acrimony. Acrimony, acerbity, asperity agree in denoting temper or language marked by irritation or some degree of anger or resentment. Acrimony implies bitterness or ill will and also greater stinging or blistering power in what is said than the others; as, the controversial writings of the seventeenth century are notorious for their acrimony. "We all know how easy it is to . . . defend a pet theory with acrimony" (Quiller-Couch). Acerbity implies sourness as well as bitterness, sometimes as shown in words or mood, but more often as manifested in a morose, embittered nature. "The judge's smile seemed to operate on her acerbity of heart like sunshine upon vinegar, making it ten times sourer" (N. Hawthorne). Often it suggests crabbedness. "The Milton of religious and political controversy . . . is not seldom disfigured by want of amenity, by acerbity" (Arnold). Asperity now retains its etymological implications of harshness and roughness chiefly in reference to style. "Each of these metres . . . is strange and arresting . . . their asperities tend, with repetition, to pass into beauties" (Quiller-Couch). In general use, asperity stresses quickness of temper or sharpness of resentment but it rarely, if ever, suggests bitterness. "Mrs. Bennet . . . assured him with some asperity that they were very well able to keep a good cook" (Austen).

Ana. Bitterness (see corresponding adjective at BITTER): ill will, malignity, spite, spleen, *malice, malevolence: rancor, animus, animosity, antipathy (see ENMITY).

Ant. Suavity. — Con. Urbanity, diplomacy (see corresponding adjectives at SUAVE): courtesy, civility, politeness (see corresponding adjectives at CIVIL).

acropolis. Citadel, *fort, fortress, stronghold, fastness.

across. Across, crosswise (or crossways), athwart are synonymous when they mean so as to intersect the length of something. A cross and athwart may be used as prepositions as well as adverbs but carry the same implications in either part of speech. Across usually implies extension or passage from one side to the other; as, this board will not go across; he could not get across (the river) that night. Crosswise stresses intersection at right angles and usually, but not invariably, suggests a horizontal direction; as, the stripes run crosswise; the defect lies crosswise to the grain of the wood. Athwart commonly, but not always, implies obliquity of direction or intersection at an acute angle; as, the tree fell athwart the road; on the slopes, the shadows lie athwart; in some weaves, the filling threads run athwart those of the warp.

Figuratively, especially with reference to plans, purposes, hopes, and the like, these words are not always synonymous because they retain and stress their distinguishing implications. Across (colloquial in this use) often implies fulfillment; as, he was able to get his point across to his audience. Crosswise implies contrariety and, therefore, frustration; as, everything goes crosswise with us tonight. Athwart (somewhat archaic in this use) suggests perverseness and distortion, and is now usually replaced by awry. "And quite athwart Goes all decorum" (Shak.).

act, n. 1 *Action, deed.

Ana. Performance, accomplishment, achievement (see corresponding verbs at PERFORM): *feat, exploit.

2 Statute, law, *bill.

act, v. 1 Act, behave, work, operate, function, react are comparable when used with reference to the way in which a person or thing does what is expected or responds to external influences or circumstances. Act is not only the most general word of this group but also the most general of all English intransitive verbs except those which assert being, a state of being, or relation (be, exist, belong, etc.). Act is therefore used largely in interrogative sentences when knowledge of the specific nature of the action is sought or in declarative sentences with a qualifying adverb, adverbial phrase, or adjective complement; as, how did the child act when you called him?; he acted as if he were about to cry; he acted frightened; how should this powder act when mixed with water? It seems to me to act strangely; this medicine acts as a poison to some persons. Behave, in its earliest and still most common use, applies chiefly to persons and their conduct with reference to a standard of what is right or proper or decorous. "One must keep one's contracts, and behave as persons of honour and breeding should behave" (R. Macaulay). However, under the influence of physics and psychology, behave more and more tends to approach act in generality; as, to study how steel behaves under stress or how the thyroid gland behaves during emotional excitement. "Two men may behave like a crowd . . . when their emotions are engaged" (Conrad). Work, operate, function agree in meaning to act in the way that is natural or intended. "The Swiss clock had long since ceased to work" (Bennett). "But she had not thought. Her brain would not operate" (Bennett). "Sound organs functioning vigorously all the time" (Conrad). In distinction from one another, work may, especially when qualified, suggest success or effectiveness; operate stresses efficient activity rather than achievement except when followed by on or upon; function always implies activity with reference to the accomplishment of the end or office for which a thing exists or is designed. "The fact that a theory has actually worked is a better recommendation for its soundness than any amount of ingenious dialectic" (A. Huxley). "The revolutionary spirit, ceasing to operate in politics" (Macaulay). "His sanguine temper, and fearlessness of mind, operated very differently on her" (Austen). "Consciousness ceases altogether at death, when the brain no longer functions" (Grant Allen). "Rules of the game which must be observed, if society is to function at all" (Galsworthy). React, a word of rapidly shifting implications, is often used as though it were a close synonym of the preceding words, especially of act or behave. "How . . . he would have acted—or you, I believe, would say reacted" (F. M. Ford). In discriminating use, it always suggests recoil or rebound; often more narrowly, but still consistently, it implies reciprocal or counteractive influence, or a reverse effect; as, home and the school react [that is, act reciprocally] on each other. "Whilst most people's minds succumb to inculcation and environment, a few react [that is, behave in the contrary fashion] vigorously: honest and decent people coming from thievish slums, and sceptics and realists from country parsonages" (Shaw). As a result of use in chemistry and psychology, react now often implies a favorable or desired response; as, children react [that is, act as desired, in response] to kind treatment.

2 Act, play, impersonate, personate are synonyms when they mean to assume the appearance or role of another person or character. Act, nearly always, and play, usually, imply feigning for theatrical representation; as, to act Hamlet; to play the melancholy Dane. Even the idiom

"to play one's part" has a theatrical origin and still connotes performance and a contribution to an ensemble. Whether impersonate and personate (now increasingly rare) imply simulation for the sake of theatrical representation or for deception can be gathered only from the context; as, an actor who impersonates women; he was arrested for impersonating a clergyman. Personate does not imply fraud, however, when it suggests representation, or standing for someone. "The donors . . . are identified with, and personated by, the trustees" (Ch. Just. Marshall).

acting, adj. *Temporary, supply, ad interim, provisional.

action. 1 Action, act, deed agree in designating something done or effected. Action refers primarily to the process of acting; act and deed, to the result, the thing done. An action is usually regarded as occupying some time, and involving more than one step; an act is more frequently thought of as momentary or instantaneous, and as individual; as, the rescue of a shipwrecked crew is a heroic action; the launching of the lifeboat, a brave act; a course of action, the springs of action; an act of vengeance, caught in the act. But the distinction cannot always be made. In the plural, action has frequently an ethical connotation, and is loosely synonymous with conduct. "By him [the Lord] actions are weighed" (1 Samuel ii. 3). "Only the actions of the just Smell sweet and blossom in their dust" (Shirley). Deed refers to a thing as done; it invariably presupposes intelligence and responsibility in the agent, and therefore often connotes, as act does not (except where it is a translation of the Latin actum) illustriousness or achievement. "The deed is worthy doing" (Shak.). "What, are my deeds forgot?" (Shak.). "Little, nameless, unremembered acts Of kindness and of love" (Wordsworth). Deed is frequently opposed to word, as act to thought. "I'll endeavour deeds to match these words" (Shak.). "Be great in act, as you have been in thought" (Shak.). "Give thy thoughts no tongue, Nor any unproportion'd thought his act" (Shak.).

Ana. *Process, proceeding, procedure: performance, execution, fulfillment (see corresponding verbs at PERFORM): activity, operation, work, behavior, reaction (see corresponding verbs at ACT).

2 Cause, case, *suit, lawsuit.

3 *Battle, engagement, push.

Ana. Combat, conflict, fight, fray, affray, *contest: *encounter, skirmish, brush.

activate. 1 Energize, *vitalize.

Ana. Animate, vivify, *quicken, enliven: *stir, rouse, arouse, rally, awaken.

Ant. Arrest.

2 Activate, actuate, motivate are sometimes confused when used with reference to persons and the motives which govern their actions. They are not synonyms, however, because they carry divergent denotations. Some external influence or agent, rather than a motive or desire, activates a person or thing when it supplies an effective stimulus to activity; the motive, or, at least, a latent desire, for such activity being commonly presupposed. "Kapteyn's work . . . was not final, but it . . . attracted and actuated others" (G. W. Gray). A motive, a principle, a desire, or the like, actuates a person (not an action or undertaking) when it governs or determines his actions; as, the desire for conquest actuated the explorers of the sixteenth century. "In suggesting . . . [another's] name to Moxon-Hughes he had been actuated by good will" (C. Mackenzie). A dramatist, a novelist, or the like, motivates the actions of his characters or the incidents of his plot when he supplies the motives for each; as, the novelist failed to motivate adequately his hero's surrender to temptation. Also, an objective, a desire, a passion, or the like, motivates, or gives the underlying motive of an action or undertaking; as, the desire for conquest motivated the explorations of the sixteenth century; ambition motivated Macbeth's murder of Duncan.

Ana. Stimulate, *provoke, excite, galvanize: spur, goad, induce (see corresponding nouns at MOTIVE): *incite, instigate, foment, abet: drive, impel, *move.

Ant. Restrain, inhibit. — Con. Curb, check, bridle (see RESTRAIN): thwart, foil, baffle, balk, *frustrate.

active. Active, operative, dynamic, live are synonymous when they mean at work or in effective action. Some of their distinctions in implications are observable when they are applied to the same things; as, active, operative, dynamic, live principles; an active, operative, dynamic, live sense of duty. Other distinctions are evident only when their widely varying ranges of application are indicated. Active, in general, may be employed wherever the others are applicable, but it is also capable of being used where none of the others would be appropriate. It may qualify anything that shows its nature or its existence in acts, in action, or in work; as, an active volcano; an active brain; active sympathy: it is applicable to anything which can be worked, operated, manipulated, wielded, or the like; as, an active pen; an active fan; an active bond on the market. It is also applicable to an agent, an operator, an instrument, or a means, and to that which is accomplished by any such agency; as, an active enforcer of the law or active enforcement of the law; an active propagandist or active propaganda; an active seeker of truth or an active search for truth. Active may imply little more action or movement or exertion than shows a state that is not death, rest, or inertness; as, his pulse is low, but his heart is still active: it may, and usually does, imply vigor and energy in action or movement; as, an active market; an active writer; the active stage of a disease. Often it suggests causation or activation; as, the active principle in a soporific. In contrast with active, operative is applicable only to things that have a capacity for acting, working, or effecting ends (as a principle, a motive, an emotion), or for being put into operation (as laws); as, when strict ethical principles are operative in society, men may expect the millennium; the rule has been operative since January first. In contrast with active, however, operative usually is weaker in its implication of effectiveness; thus, one's sense of duty is operative when it in any degree influences one's thoughts or actions; it is active when it serves as a spur to action or is the determinant of one's actions. Dynamic stresses the realization of that which is potential in a thing: it therefore often connotes release of great energy and consequent forcefulness; thus, a dynamic personality is one that exhibits great power and exerts a great influence; love is a dynamic emotion when it sweeps away all that would obstruct its movement. Live, in the figurative sense in which it is here considered, is also applicable to persons, personalities, principles, laws, emotions, and motives. It stresses vitality and modernity more than forcibleness and, when used of persons, intelligent awareness of present conditions or needs and progressiveness more than effectiveness. "Steve had in him the making of a live man of affairs" (S. Anderson). "Remy de Gourmont... a powerfully live thinker" (H. Ellis).

Ana. *Agile, nimble, brisk: alert, wide-awake (see WATCHFUL): *busy, industrious, assiduous, diligent: energetic, strenuous, *vigorous.

Ant. Inactive. — Con. Quiescent, *latent, dormant: inert, idle, supine, passive (see INACTIVE): *lazy, indolent, slothful.

actor. Actor, player, performer, mummer, mime, The- plan, impersonator, trouper denote in common one who, for the entertainment or edification of an audience, takes part in an exhibition simulating happenings in real life. An actor is one who makes a profession of taking part in such exhibitions on the stage or in motion pictures; as, an ambition to be an actor. A player is one who acts in a stage play, whether professionally or for the nonce. "All the world's a stage, And all the men and women merely players" (Shak.). Performer is a wider term than the others of this group: it may refer to one who appears on the stage or in motion pictures, a dancer, musician, circus acrobat, etc. It emphasizes actual participation in an exhibition before an audience. "In theatrical speaking, if the performer is not exactly proper and graceful, he is utterly ridiculous" (Steele). A mummer is a disguised merryman who goes about especially at Christmas time and entertains chiefly by means of dumb show. The term and practice are chiefly British. Mummer is sometimes loosely or contemptuously used for an actor, as in George Moore's novel A Mummer's Wife. Mime is in modern use a term of no very definite application, being applied to various kinds of performances (often dancing) which tell a story by actions rather than by speech. It may be equivalent to pantomime; as, Charlie Chaplin is a mime. Thespian is a mock-heroic term for a stage player, sometimes specifically for a tragedian. An impersonator is one who imitates actual persons, in speech, actions, appearance (as, an impersonator of Theodore Roosevelt), or one who enacts a particular dramatic role (as, an impersonator of Hamlet). A trouper is a member of a group, esp. a traveling group, of actors staging a play or repertory of plays. The term often connotes the seasoning, or the sense of obligation to audience and fellow actors, that characterizes an experienced actor. "No real trouper while conscious will ever confess himself too sick to go on" (E. Ferber).

actual. *Real, true.

Ana. *Material, physical, phenomenal, objective: concrete, particular (see SPECIAL).

Ant. Ideal: imaginary. — Con. *Abstract, transcendental, transcendental: spiritual, divine (see HOLY): *theoretical, speculative, academic: fabulous, *fictitious, mythical.

actuality. *Existence, being.

Ana. Reality, truth (see corresponding adjectives at REAL): realization, actualization, materialization, externalization, incarnation (see corresponding verbs at REALIZE): attainment, achievement (see corresponding verbs at REACH).

Ant. Potentiality, possibility. — Con. Abstraction, ideality, transcendence (see corresponding adjectives at ABSTRACT).

actualize. *Realize, embody, incarnate, externalize, objectify, materialize, substantiate, substantialize, hypostatize, reify.

actuate. 1 *Move, drive, impel.

Ana. Stimulate, *provoke, excite, galvanize, quicken: *stir, rouse, arouse: energize, activate, *vitalize.

2 *Activate, motivate.

Ana. Influence, *affect, sway: *incline, dispose, predispose: *induce, prevail on or upon.

Ant. Deter (with a motive, fear, etc., as subject). — Con. *Hinder, impede, bar: *restrain, inhibit, curb, check.

acumen. Penetration, *discernment, insight, perception, discrimination, divination, clairvoyance.

Ana. Shrewdness, sagacity, perspicacity, astuteness (see corresponding adjectives at SHREWD): sharpness, keenness, acuteness (see corresponding adjectives at SHARP).

Ant. Obtuseness. — Con. Dullness, stupidity, bluntness (see corresponding adjectives at STUPID): blindness, purlblindness (see corresponding adjectives at BLIND).

acute. 1 *Sharp, keen.

Ana. *Incisive, trenchant, cutting: penetrating, piercing (see ENTER).

Ant. Obtuse. — Con. *Dull, blunt: *stupid, dull, crass, dense.

2 Acute, critical, crucial are synonyms when they are applied to times, situations, problems, and the like, and mean full of uncertainty or of menace to the future of those concerned. Acute suggests intensification, as of unfavorable symptoms or conditions, or of conflicting emotions, to the culminating or breaking point; as, the controversy has reached its acute stage; the situation in Europe in 1914 did not become acute until the end of June. Critical, in its richest significance, adds to acute the implications of certain imminent change, of concomitant suspense, and of decisiveness in the outcome; sometimes, the last of these implications is stressed at the expense of the others; as, the critical point in a disease; Gettysburg was the critical battle of the Civil War. Crucial, in loose use, stresses perils or hardships and often means little more than trying; as, it was a crucial experience. In discriminating use it always implies a crossing or dividing of the ways and suggests a test or trial involving the determination, not of an issue or outcome, but of a course or direction; thus, a crucial experiment is one which determines the success or failure of a scientific investigation; a crucial experiment is one that determines the future course or line to be taken by the investigator. "The children were . . . in the crucial stage of adolescence" (D. H. Lawrence).

Ana. Culminating, climactic (see corresponding nouns at SUMMIT): *dangerous, hazardous, precarious, perilous: menacing, threatening (see THREATEN): intensified, aggravated (see INTENSIFY).

adage. *Saying, saw, proverb, maxim, motto, epigram, aphorism, apothegm adamant or adamantine. Obdurate, inexorable, *inflexible.

Ana. Unyielding, unsubmitting (see affirmative verbs at YIELD): immovable, immobile (see affirmative adjectives at MOVABLE): *grim, implacable, unrelenting adapt. Adapt, adjust, accommodate, conform, reconcile agree in denoting to bring into correspondence. To adapt (to) is to fit or suit to something; it distinctively implies modification to meet new conditions, frequently with the added suggestion of pliability or readiness. "He knew how to adapt himself. To one correspondent he is gay . . . To another he is gravely reflective" (A. Huxley). To adjust (to) is to bring into as close and exact correspondence or harmony as exists between the parts of a mechanism; in contrast with adapt, it suggests less of flexibility or tact in the agent and more of ingenuity or calculation. "He must divine what men would welcome and shun what men might resent. He must delicately mould and adjust the popular will to his own" (Buchan). Accommodate (to) is used in preference to adjust when there exists a somewhat marked variance or discrepancy between the objects brought into (often merely superficial, sometimes temporary) agreement or harmony. "Man is no lawgiver to nature, he is an absorber. She it is who stands firm; he it is who must accommodate himself" (W. James). Accommodate is used in preference to adapt when yielding or compromise is to be suggested; as, she is a very accommodating person. "They accommodate their counsels to his inclination" (Addison). To conform (to) is to bring into harmony or accordance with a pattern, example, or principle. "The Liberal . . . does not wish to have to conform himself to any programme or policy" (Inge). In current English the reflexive to conform oneself is comparatively rare, its place being taken usually by the intransitive conform (for other intransitive sense see AGREE). "This officer [secretary of state], as his duties were prescribed by that act, is to conform precisely to the will of the president. He is the mere organ by whom that will is communicated" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Partly because of the association of this word with compulsory legislation regarding religious observances it often implies compliance or, at times, slavish acceptance. "Mark Twain . . . had conformed to a moral régime in which the profoundest of his instincts could not function" (Van W. Brooks). To reconcile (with, to) is to demonstrate to one's own or another's satisfaction the fundamental consistency or congruity of things that are, or seem to be, incompatible. "Mrs. Ballintin's confidence in her own capacity to reconcile conflicting portraits of herself" (M. Austin). "The great men among the ancients understood how to reconcile manual labor with affairs of state" (Locke). In reflexive use, reconcile adds to adapt the implication of resignation or of submission; as, to reconcile oneself to a lonely existence or to the loss of one's fortune.

Ant. Yielding. — Con. Submissive, subdued (see TAME): obliging, complaisant (see AMIABLE) relenting, submitting, capitulating (see YIELD).

Ana. Temper, attempter, qualify (see MODERATE): acclimatize, acclimate, inure (see HARDEN).

Ant. Unfit.

adaptable. Pliant, ductile, *plastic, pliable, malleable.

Ana. Tractable, amenable (see OBEDIENT): supple, flexible, resilient, *elastic.

Ant. Inadaptable, unadaptable. — Con. Intractable, refractory (see UNRULY): unaccommodating, nonconforming, irreconcilable (see affirmative verbs at ADAPT).

adaptation. *Variation, modification, mutation.

add. 1 Add, sum, total, figure, cast, foot are synonyms when they are followed (usually, but not in every case necessarily) by up and mean to find or represent the amount reached by putting together arithmetically a series of numbers or quantities. Add is both the common and the technical word; it usually implies strict adherence to the traditional arithmetical process. Even in its somewhat rare figurative use it implies a similar operation. "She could not understand Constance's state of mind. Certainly she could not claim to have 'added up' Constance yet" (Bennett). Sum stresses the result attained rather than the method followed. This is especially clear in its tendency to escape its literal significance. Thus, one seldom hears today "to sum up the votes in an election"; the commoner expression is "to sum up the results of an election." In figurative use, sum up implies a gathering together in small compass for the production of a single telling effect; thus, a lawyer sums up when he presents in brief and logical form the evidence that has been given in his client's favor. "I summed up all systems in a phrase and all existence in an epigram" (Wilde). "In this knowledge [of the relative values of things], and in the use made of it, is summed up the whole conduct of life" (Inge). Total (often without up) tends to replace sum up in the literal sense; as, to total (up) the liabilities of a defunct corporation. Sometimes it means to reach the sum or number of; as, street accidents in 1938 totaled 162. Figure, cast, and foot are felt to be somewhat colloquial in comparison with the preceding words: at least, their connotations are more homely; figure usually suggests the mere labor of addition (as, to figure the costs of operating an automobile); cast often implies ready reckoning as in mental arithmetic, though commonly used only in the phrase "to cast (or cast up) an account"; foot usually connotes bookkeeping and totals at the bottom of each column of figures (as, the statements have not yet been fooled up).

2 Add, append, annex, subjoin, superadd. Add, the most general of these words, means to join one thing to another thing or to a group, series, or combination of other things so as to increase the original unit in numbers, size, amount, or the like; as, to add ten books to ones' library; please add these items to my order; to add eggs to a batter; she always adds spice to the conversation. One appends when one adds something that is supplemental and accessory (literally, hangs from it) and does not form an integral part of the principal thing; as, to append notes to a book; to append a seal to a document. One annexes when one adds something that becomes part of the original whole yet bears, usually, a subordinate or subsidiary relation to it, or suffers loss of identity in the merging; as, to annex a codicil to a will; to annex conquered territory to the kingdom. One subjoins when one adds something under another thing, or, especially, to what has already been said or written; as, to subjoin a postscript to a letter; to subjoin additional matter in an appendix. One superadds when one adds something to that which is complete in itself or already at its maximum; as, the phrase "to paint the lily" means to superadd decoration to that which in itself is superlatively decorative; the horrors of pestilence super-added to the horrors of war.

Ana. *Fasten, attach, affix: augment, enlarge, *increase.

Ant. Subtract, deduct. — Con. Lessen, *decrease, diminish, reduce: abstract, *detach, prescind.

addendum or (pl.) addenda. Supplement, *appendix.

addict, v. *Habituate, accustom, familiarize.

Ana. *Incline, dispose, predispose, bias: devote, apply, address, *direct.

Ant. Wean. — Con. Alienate, *estrangle: *detach, disengage: disincline, indispose (see affirmative verbs at INCLINE).

addict, n. Addict, votary, devotee, habitué, fiend, fan, as here compared, designate a person who by habit and strong inclination indulges in something or the pursuit of something. Addict implies excessive and continuous indulgence, usually in harmful, but sometimes in harmless, things; as, a drug addict; a detective-story addict. Votary and devotee retain some of the implications of their religious senses such as enthusiasm, often amounting to fanaticism, and zeal. They rarely suggest attachment to that which is degrading or debasing but they do not invariably imply attachment to that which is uplifting; as, a votary of science; a devotee of vegetarianism. "Any worthy object of study, pursued disinterestedly . . . does not permit its votary to be very seriously narrowed by his zeal" (Inge). "Ye devotees to your adored employ [pursuit of worldly pleasures]" (Cowper). Habitué always implies frequent attendance at a place but it commonly also connotes habitual indulgence in a pleasure; thus, a habitué of the theater is a devotee of the drama; a habitué of a gambling house is a gambling addict. Fiend and fan are not literary terms; the latter is still regarded as slang. Fiend implies even greater excess than addict or even greater fanaticism than votary or devotee; as, a dope fiend; a golf fiend; when used of devotees of games, contests of wit, or the like, it often also connotes extraordinary skill; as, a fiend at mathematics. Fan adds to habitué the implication of ardent enthusiasm; as, a baseball fan. It suggests even more than votary or devotee naïve admiration or partisanship; as, a Roosevelt fan; an actor's fan mail.

addition. Addition, accretion, increment, accession, in the sense in which they are here compared, agree in denoting a thing that serves to increase another in size, amount, or content. Addition implies union with something already existing as a whole or as a unit; as, he built an addition to his house in 1900; no addition was made to the collection for five years. "The office boy, a recent addition to the staff, was busy with the copying press" (Arch. Marshall). Sometimes improvement rather than increase is stressed; as, the paintings were an addition to the room. Accretion implies attachment from the outside; it may be used of the process as well as of the thing added; as, a rolled snowball grows by accretion. The word often suggests additions made to an original body over a considerable period of time. "The professional historian, whose aim is exact truth, should brush aside the glittering accretions of fiction that have encrusted it" (Grandgent). Nearly always it implies the addition of unessential or alien matter. "All progress in literary style lies in the heroic resolve to cast aside accretions and exuberances" (H. Ellis). Increment usually implies addition bit by bit in consecutive or serial order; as, teachers' salaries are raised by annual increments. "The movement [free verse] is . . . one more wave in the endless ebb and flow of action and reaction, the infinitesimal increments of which we call Progress" (Lowes). Sometimes it signifies increase in value; as, an unearned increment in the value of land resulting from social progress or increase in population. Accession denotes something acquired that constitutes an addition to contents, holdings, or possessions; as, recent accessions to a library or a museum (that is, new books, new paintings, or the like). "The greatest accession of positive knowledge has come in our own time" (Inge).

additive. Summative, *cumulative, accumulative.

Ana. Aggregative, conglomerative, agglomerative (see corresponding nouns at AGGREGATE): constituent, component, elemental (see corresponding nouns at ELEMENT).

addle. Muddle, bemuddle, *confuse, fuddle, befuddle.

Ana. Confound, dumfound, nonplus, bewilder (see PUZZLE): amaze, flabbergast, astound (see SURPRISE): flutter, flurry, agitate, upset (see DISCOMPOSE).

Ant. Refresh (mentally). — Con. *Quicken, enliven, vivify, animate.

address, v. 1 *Direct, devote, apply.

Ana. Bend, turn (see CURVE): appeal, pray, sue, plead (see under PRAYER): aim, point, level (see DIRECT).

2 Address, accost, greet, salute, hail agree in meaning to speak to (sometimes, to write or to make a sign to) a person in recognition or in order to obtain recognition. Address usually implies formality and an ulterior purpose; it also frequently suggests length of speech or communication; as, to address prayers to God or a petition to Congress; how does one address a governor? "It was Franklin, the thick chief mate, who was addressing him" (Conrad). Address once carried more often than now the suggestion of courting or wooing. "Poor Edward O'Connor was not allowed to address Fanny" (Lover). Accost adds to address the idea of speaking first or without being introduced; it always implies absence of formality but it often suggests boldness or sometimes, evil intent; as, he accosted a passer-by and asked for money. "The women . . . were accosted by two men who wanted to walk with them" (S. Anderson). Greet usually implies friendliness, good will, or cordiality; it is the precise word when welcoming is to be suggested; as, the whole town appeared at the station to greet them. "My lord, the Mayor of London comes to greet you" (Shak.). Salute commonly stresses ceremoniousness or observance of courtesies demanded by custom. "The wife of his brother . . . must be saluted every day; but his paternal and maternal kine-women need only be greeted on his return from a journey" (Sir W. Jones). "Then I salute you with this kingly title: Long live Richard, England's royal king" (Shak.). Specifically, salute applies to formal or prescribed acts of recognition; as, the soldier saluted his superior officer; the president was saluted with 21 guns. Hail implies heartiness, joyousness, and often noisiness. "He smiled and nodded and saluted. To those who hailed him, as it suited" (Masefield). It often stresses the idea of calling out, especially from a distance; as, to hail a cab; to hail a friend.

Ana. *Speak (to), talk (to), converse (with): court, woo (see INVITE).

address, n. 1 *Tact, savoir-faire, poise.

Ana. Dexterity, facility, ease, *readiness: adroitness, cleverness (see corresponding adjectives at CLEVER): graciousness, affability (see corresponding adjectives at GRACIOUS): suavity, urbanity, diplomacy (see corresponding adjectives at SUAVE).

Ant. Maladroitness, gaucherie. — Con. Awkwardness, clumsiness, ineptness (see corresponding adjectives at AWKWARD): boorishness, churlishness (see corresponding adjectives under BOOR).

2 *Speech, oration, harangue, allocution, lecture, prelection, talk, sermon, homily.

adduce. Advance, allege, cite are often used interchangeably in the meaning to bring forward by way of explanation, proof, illustration, or the like. Actually, however, they are clearly distinguishable in their implications and in their idiomatic associations. One adduces facts, evidence, instances, passages, reasons, arguments, when one presents these in support of a contention. "The psychologist W. H. R. Rivers adduced evidence which has led him to believe that the natives of that unfortunate archipelago [Melanesia] are dying out" (T. S. Eliot). "I will not adduce poets of admitted eminence—Mr. Watson, for instance, or Mr. Yeats—to prove my case" (Quiller-Couch). One advances, or puts forward, something that is in itself contentious, as a theory, a proposal, a claim, an argument, when one presents it for acceptance or consideration; as, a writer recently advanced the prediction that modern methods of warfare will bring about the depopulation of large cities. "Half a century later when the Bourbon claim to the Spanish succession is advanced" (Belloc). Allege, because of confused derivation, has two leading senses not quite sharply distinguished from each other. In the first sense, one alleges something when one asserts positively or under oath that it is true and capable of proof; as, the state alleges that the indicted man is guilty of conspiracy. "They [Australians in 1916] alleged we were avoiding the risks of war while reaping the financial benefits of neutrality" (V. Heiser). In law, allege usually means to state in an allegation, or formal recital of what a party undertakes to prove. "It seems to me a miscarriage of justice to sustain liability . . . until the facts have been heard which the petitioner alleged" (Justice Holmes). In the other sense, one alleges something when one adduces it as the reason, ground, excuse, or the like, of an action, decision, or position that is, or may be, questioned; as, he refused to be surety on his friend's bond, alleging a resolve never to be a bondsman after one unfortunate experience. In both cases, the use of allege implies a measure of doubt of that which is asserted; its participial adjective alleged, especially, often serves as a disclaimer of responsibility for the assertion; as, an alleged miracle; the alleged thief. "Some of the alleged reasons for changing our coinage" (Bagehot). One cites only that which is concrete and specific, as a passage from a book or a definite instance, when one adduces it in support of a contention; thus, one cites, or quotes, a passage to give an authority; one cites an instance that serves as a precedent or illustration; one cites definite facts in support of a generalization. "The very real difficulties of modern physical science originate, in large degree, in the facts just cited" (Jeans).

Ana. *Exemplify, illustrate: *remark, comment, commentate, animadvert.

adept, n. *Expert, wizard, artist, dab, dabster, artist, virtuoso.

Ant. Bungler. — Con. Dabbler, tyro, *amateur, dilettante: apprentice, *novice, probationer.

adept, adj. *Proficient, skilled, skillful, expert.

Ana. *Conversant, versed: efficient, *effective: *dexterous, adroit, deft, feat: competent, *able, capable, qualified.

Ant. Inadept, inept: bungling. — Con. Amateurish, dabbling, dilettantist (see corresponding nouns at AMATEUR): *awkward, clumsy, maladroit.

adequate. *Sufficient, enough, competent.

Ana. *Fit, suitable, meet, appropriate, proper: requisite, *needful, essential: *due, condign.

Ant. Inadequate. — Con. *Deficient, defective: scant, scanty, *meager, exiguous: abundant, copious, plentiful, *plentiful.

adhere. *Stick, cohere, cling, cleave.

Ana. *Fasten, attach, affix: glue, *cement, agglutinate: unite, link, combine, *join.

Con. *Separate, part, sever, divide: *detach, disengage: disunite, disjoin (see affirmative verbs at JOIN).

adherence. Adherence, adhesion are usually distinguished in current good use. In spite of exceptions, the tendency prevails to use adherence when mental or moral attachment, and adhesion when physical attachment, is implied; as, they gave their adherence (in older idiom, gave in their adhesion) to the cause of reform; the adhesion of iron to a magnet or of lung tissues to the pleura. Sometimes, however, adhesion is used in place of adherence when the writer feels that the physical connotations of the former will add emphasis. "The iron force of adhesion to the old routine" (Arnold).

Ant. Inadherence, nonadherence.

adherent. *Follower, disciple, partisan, satellite, henchman, sectary.

Ana. Supporter, upholder, backer, champion (see corresponding verbs at SUPPORT).

Ant. Renegade. — Con. Apostate, recreant (see RENEGADE): deserter, forsaker (see corresponding verbs at ABANDON): adversary, *opponent, antagonist.

adhesion. *Adherence.

Ant. Nonadhesion, inadhesion.

adhesive. Adhesive, gluey, glutinous, mucilaginous, gummy, sticky describe the quality of a substance that adheres to any surface with which it comes in contact. Adhesive is applied to any substance, whether in a fluid state or not, that is capable of acquiring this quality when softened by heat or by moisture; as, an adhesive paste; an adhesive plaster; "good adhesive mud" (G. Eliot). As a noun, adhesive is the general term used for any substance uniting surfaces, such as glue (hence, gluey and glutinous), mucilage (U. S.) or gum (Brit.) (hence, mucilaginous, gummy), cement, and the like. Sticky is colloquial and usually describes that which is adhesive (often unpleasantly adhesive) because of weather conditions, imperfect drying, or the like; as, sticky candy; varnish becomes sticky in hot weather.

adiaphorous. Indifferent, *neutral, negative.

Ana. Unimportant, insignificant, inconsequent (see affirmative nouns at IMPORTANCE): unnecessary, nonessential (see affirmative adjectives at NEEDFUL).

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

Ant. Obligatory, compulsory. — Con. Essential, necessary (see NEEDFUL): important, significant (see corresponding nouns at IMPORTANCE).

adieu. Adios, *good-by, farewell, Godspeed, au revoir, auf Wiedersehen, bon voyage.

ad interim. *Temporary, provisional, acting, supply. Ant. Permanent.

adios. Adieu, *good-by, farewell, Godspeed, au revoir, auf Wiedersehen, bon voyage.

adipose, n. Adipose, marrow, suet, tallow, lard designate various forms of animal fat. Adipose, or the more common adipose tissue, may denote the type of membranous tissue in which a greasy semisolid substance called fat (see FAT) is stored in the animal body, but it is more often applied to such tissue with its accumulation of fat. Marrow designates the soft substance which fills the cavities of most bones. Because in the long bones it contains about 95 per cent of fat, marrow is often used, especially figuratively, as though it were akin to fat. All the other words designate fat derived from the animal body. Suet is the hard adipose tissue around the kidney or loins of beef or mutton. When the suet or other adipose tissue of beef and mutton is melted and clarified, it forms a very hard, white, tasteless substance called tallow. The corresponding adipose tissue in hogs when rendered and clarified forms a somewhat soft, buttery, white substance called lard.

adjacent. Adjacent, adjoining, contiguous, abutting, tangent, conterminous, juxtaposed agree in meaning being in close proximity. Adjacent does not always imply actual contact but it does not admit of anything of the same kind between; thus, adjacent lots are in contact, but adjacent houses may or may not be. "It is not likely that pure accident caused three adjacent windows to take a Spanish tone" (H. Adams). Objects are adjoining when they meet and touch at some line or point of junction; as, adjoining estates; adjoining rooms. Contiguous adds to adjoining the implication of meeting and touching on one side or a considerable part of one side; as, streets lined with rows of contiguous houses. It may be used figuratively of events as well as of objects. "Adjacent events need not be contiguous; just as there may be stretches of a string which are not occupied by beads, so the child may experience uneventful periods of time" (Jeans). Abutting is usually applied to that which borders on, or is in contact with, something else, often with the implication of the termination of one thing by the other; as, land abutting on the road. "The Bettersworth yard abutted on the Allingham's for the space of one woodshed and a horse-chestnut tree" (M. Austin). Tangent implies contact at a single point; its use is chiefly geometrical; as, a line tangent to a curve; tangent circles. Objects are conterminous which border on each other or have a common boundary. "Defending the side of Germany conterminous to France" (Lecky). Conterminous applies also to things having the same bounds, limits, or ends; as, the civil and the ecclesiastical parishes in England are sometimes, but not always, conterminous. Things are juxtaposed when they are placed side by side, especially so as to permit comparison or contrast; as, juxtaposed styles of writing; juxtaposed ideas; when colors are juxtaposed, they become affected in hue.

Ana. *Nearest, next: successive, *consecutive: joining, connecting (see JOIN, v.).

Ant. Nonadjacent. — Con. *Distant, removed, remote: separated, parted (see SEPARATE, v.).

adjective, adj. *Dependent, relative, conditional, contingent.

Ant. Substantive (in law and in logic): self-sufficient. — Con. Independent, autonomous, *free: derived (from) or derivative, sprung (from), stemmed (from) (see corresponding verbs at SPRING).

adjoining, adj. *Adjacent, contiguous, abutting, tangent, conterminous, juxtaposed.

Ana. Joined, connected (see JOIN, v.): attached (see FASTEN).

Ant. Detached, disjointed. — Con. Removed, *distant, remote, far.

adjourn. Adjourn, prorogue, dissolve are used of public bodies when they suspend business. When a deliberative body adjourns, it merely suspends (usually for a brief period) its deliberations, which at the next meeting may be resumed where they ended, except for something to the contrary in its rules of procedure; when the crown or its representative prorogues a parliament or other legislative body in Great Britain or her colonies, the session is ended, and all bills not enacted are quashed, and can be taken up only as new business at its subsequent session; when a deliberative body dissolves itself or is dissolved (as, a parliament dissolved by the crown), it entirely ceases to exist as it is then constituted, and cannot have any further meeting or session until after an election.

Ana. Suspend, stay, postpone, *defer.

Ant. Convene. — Con. *Summon, convoke, call: *begin, commence, start.

adjudge. Adjudicate, *judge, arbitrate.

Ana. Rule, *decide, determine, settle: award, accord, *grant: *allot, assign.

adjudicate. Adjudge, *judge, arbitrate.

Ana. Determine, settle, rule (see DECIDE).

adjunct, n. *Appendage, appurtenance, accessory.

Ana. Addition, accretion: appanage (see RIGHT): attachment, affix, fixture (see corresponding verbs at FASTEN).

adjure. Conjure, entreat, *beg, beseech, implore, importune, supplicate.

Ana. Pray, plead (with), appeal (to) (see under PRAYER): request, *ask: bid, enjoin, charge, *command.

Do not confuse adjure with abjure.

adjust. 1 Adjust, regulate, fix are often used interchangeably in the sense to set right, or to rights. Adjust always implies modification to meet a need. In general, one adjusts a thing or things when by some change one brings it into its exact or proper position or condition or them into their right relationship; thus, one adjusts a telescope when one changes the distance between its eyepiece and its object glass so as to bring it into focus; one adjusts the temperature of a house when one changes the setting of a thermostat. Specifically, adjust also often implies rectification or correction; as, to adjust an error in an account; to adjust a loose screw in a machine; to adjust spectacles that are not properly centered: frequently it implies straightening out or settling; as, to adjust one's affairs before going on a journey; to adjust a difficulty with a neighbor; to adjust a claim for insurance. Regulate, on the other hand, usually implies the maintenance of something in a desired condition. One regulates a mechanism, a device, an organ, or the like when one uses (or serves as) the means to make it work or operate regularly, uniformly, or accurately; thus, one regulates a clock when one adjusts its mechanism so that it will keep accurate time; some drugs regulate the beat of the heart by slowing it up, others by hastening it, until its rate of speed is normal. One also regulates that which is produced or effected by a mechanism, an organ, etc., when one uses the means to keep it at a fixed or uniform rate, degree, or the like; thus, one regulates the temperature of one's house when one sets a thermostat at the desired mark and keeps it there. Fix, as a synonym of these words, is colloquial and an Americanism. It is often used where adjust or regulate would be more explicit and effective; as, the optician will fix her glasses; please fix the clock; he will fix up matters for us. In distinctive use it implies restoration to good order or a state of repair; as, to fix one's hair; these shoes are not worth fixing.

Ana. Rectify, *correct: trim, steady, *stabilize, balance: *order, arrange: align, *line, range.

Ant. Derange. — Con. Disarrange, *disorder, disturb: upset, *discompose.

2 *Adapt, accommodate, conform, reconcile.

Ana. *Harmonize, attune: correspond, conform, accord, square (see AGREE).

Ant. Disadjust.

adjutant, n. *Assistant, coadjutor, aide, aide-de-camp, helper.

adjuvant, adj. *Auxiliary, contributory, ancillary, accessory, subsidiary, subservient.

Ana. Aiding, helping, assisting (see AID, v.): supporting, upholding, backing (see SUPPORT, v.): *effective, efficient, efficacious, effectual.

Ant. Counteractive. — Con. Neutralizing, negating (see NEUTRALIZE): obstructing, hindering, impeding (see HINDER, v.).

administer. 1 Administer, dispense come into comparison because they are used in certain idiomatic phrases, similar in wording but not always equivalent in meaning, such as to administer justice or to dispense justice; to administer a medicine or to dispense medicine (or medicines); to administer a sacrament or to dispense the Sacrament. Historically, these words have a common basic meaning, to act in the capacity of a steward, or by extension, of one who is entrusted with the right use of possessions or of power belonging to another. They diverged in meaning, however, in that administer implied management and the carrying out of the wishes or the will of the master and dispense implied meting out or just distribution to individuals. These divergent implications are now often transferred, with the result that it is difficult to distinguish their meanings, especially when the object of the verb is an abstraction, such as justice or charity. "The citizens disliked the rule of William [the Conqueror] on account of the strict justice which he administered" (Freeman). "'These be the sort,'—she took a fine judicial tone . . . 'These be the sort to dispense justice. They know the land and the customs of the land'" (Kipling). In reference to a sacrament, the two words were early used interchangeably. Now, "to administer a sacrament" means to perform the rites and duties prescribed for its proper observance; thus, a layman may in a case of necessity administer baptism; a priest administers the sacrament of penance when he hears a penitent's confession and grants him absolution. In good modern English, the minister does not dispense a sacrament, but only "the Sacrament," that is, the bread and wine of the Eucharist, or the Lord's Supper: this implies distribution and is, therefore, close to the original sense of the word. Administer, however, because it has acquired the implication of distribution, is also used in this latter collocation. In modern English, the two words when used in reference to medicine are precisely distinguished. One administers a medicine who gives the prescribed dose directly to the patient; one dispenses medicines who compounds them according to the prescription of the physician. In this use, dispense retains its etymological implication of weighing and measuring. Thus, also, one administers a blow, a rebuke, advice, or the like, when he deals it out directly to the individual. Dispense, in similar phrases, however, retains its implication of distribution; thus, one dispenses advice when he metes it out to those who in his opinion need it; one dispenses alms when he manages their distribution.

2 *Execute.

Ana. Direct, *conduct, manage, control.

administration. *Government.

administrative. Executive. See under EXECUTE, 2.

administrator, fem. administratrix, administratress. Executive, executor. See under EXECUTE, 2.

admiration. 1 *Wonder, wonderment, amaze, amazement.

Ana. Astonishment, surprise (see corresponding verbs at SURPRISE): awe, fear, *reverence: rapture, transport, *ecstasy.

Con. Indifference, unconcern, aloofness (see corresponding adjectives at INDIFFERENT): boredom, *tedium, ennui.

2 Esteem, respect, *regard.

Ana. Appreciation, cherishment (see corresponding verbs at APPRECIATE): liking, loving, enjoying (see LIKE): adoration, veneration, reverence, worship (see under REVERE).

Ant. Abhorrence. — Con. Loathing, detestation, hate, hatred (see under HATE, v.).

admire. Esteem, respect, regard. See under REGARD, n.

Ana. *Appreciate, value, prize, cherish: *revere, reverence, venerate, adore, worship.

Ant. Abhor. — Con. *Hate, loathe, abominate, detest: *despise, contemn, scorn, disdain.

admission. *Admittance.

admit. 1 *Receive, accept, take.

Ana. Allow, permit, suffer (see LET): *harbor, entertain, shelter, lodge, house.

Ant. Eject, expel. — Con. *Exclude, debar, shut out: bar, obstruct, block, *hinder.

2 *Acknowledge, own, confess, avow.

Ana. Concede, *grant, allow: *assent (to), acquiesce (in), agree (with), subscribe (to): divulge, disclose, *reveal.

Ant. Gainsay: disdain. — Con. *Deny, contradict, negative.

3 *Enter, introduce.

Ana. Induct, *initiate, install: *introduce, insert, interject, interpose.

Ant. Exclude. — Con. Debar, shut out (see EXCLUDE): withdraw, *remove: expel, *eject, oust.

admittance. Admittance, admission. In present usage admittance is mostly confined to the literal sense of allowing one to enter a locality or building; as, no admittance; admittance to the grounds. Admission has acquired the figurative sense of admitting to rights, privileges, standing, membership; as, admission of a person to the church or to the best society, or of new words into the language. When entrance into a building or a locality carries with it certain privileges, admission rather than admittance is used; as, admission to a theater; the admission of aliens into a country.

admixture. 1 *Mixture, composite, blend, compound, amalgam.

2 Admixture, alloy, adulterant are comparable when they denote an added ingredient that destroys the purity or genuineness of a substance. Admixture suggests the addition of the foreign or the nonessential; as, pure Indian without any admixture of white blood; love with an admixture of selfishness. "In the Oration of Aspasia . . . you hear her claim that . . . ours is the land of pure Hellenes, free from admixture" (Quiller-Couch). Alloy, as here compared, derives, from its literal application to a baser substance added to a precious metal to give it hardness, its figurative implication of the addition of that which detracts from the value or perfection of a thing. "There's no fortune so good, but it has its alloy" (Bacon).

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

"He had his alloy, like other people, of ambition and selfishness" (R. Macaulay). Adulterant, both literally and figuratively, implies the addition of that which debases or impairs a thing without markedly affecting its appearance. Consequently, it usually implies the intent to deceive; as, paraffin is used as an adulterant of wax; piety without any adulterant of hypocrisy.

Ana. *Addition, accretion: *touch, suggestion, streak, dash, spice, tinge, smack, shade: infusion, suffusion, leaven (see corresponding verbs at INFUSE).

admonish. Chide, *reprove, reproach, rebuke, reprimand.

Ana. *Warn, forewarn, caution: counsel, advise (see under ADVICE, v.): *criticize, reprehend, reprobate.

Ant. Commend. — Con. *Approve: applaud, compliment (see COMMEND).

ado. Fuss, pother, flurry, bustle, *stir.

Ana. Trouble, pains, exertion, *effort.

Con. Quietness, stillness, silence (see corresponding adjectives at STILL): calm, serenity, tranquillity (see corresponding adjectives at CALM).

adolescence. *Youth, puberty, pubescence.

Ant. Senescence.

adopt. Adopt, embrace, espouse come into comparison when they mean to make one's own that which in some fashion one owes to another. One adopts something of which one is not the begetter, author, or the like, or which is not one's own naturally; as, to adopt the style of Swinburne; to adopt the British pronunciation of a word. "The Ralstons gave up old customs reluctantly, but once they had adopted a new one they found it impossible to understand why everyone else did not immediately do likewise" (E. Wharton). One embraces that which, figuratively, one takes to one's bosom: in looser use it implies merely willingness to accept, in richer use it suggests eager or joyful acceptance; as, to embrace an opportunity; to embrace Christianity. "She embraced with ardour the fantastic ideal of the cleaning up of England" (R. Macaulay). One espouses that to which one attaches oneself as closely as to a wife, giving it support, or sharing the same fortunes and participating in the same experiences; as, to espouse a friend's quarrel. "Those who . . . espouse the cause of free literature" (Galsworthy).

Ana. Appropriate, *arrogate, usurp: *assume, affect.

Ant. Repudiate: discard. — Con. Reject, spurn (see DECLINE): renounce, forswear, *abjure.

adoration. Worship, veneration, reverence. See under REVERE, v.

Ana. *Honor, homage, obeisance: praise, laud, extolling (see corresponding verbs at PRAISE).

Ant. Blasphemy. — Con. Execration, cursing (see corresponding verbs at EXECRATE): *profanation, desecration, sacrilege.

adore. 1 Worship, venerate, *revere, reverence.

Ana. Laud, *praise, extol: *exalt, magnify.

Ant. Blasphemy. — Con. *Execrate, curse.

2 Adore, worship, idolize are here compared only in their nonreligious senses and as meaning to love or admire excessively. Adore commonly implies emotional surrender to the charms or attractions of that which is loved or admired; it often connotes extreme adulation, if the object of love is a person. "Several women of thirty or thereabouts adored him—before it is good for youth to be adored" (H. G. Wells). Worship usually implies more extravagant admiration or more servile attentions than adore; it also commonly connotes an awareness of one's own inferiority or of one's distance from the object of one's love; as, hero worshippers; he worships his wife (cf. he worships the ground she walks on). Idolize often implies absurdly excessive admiration or doting love; sometimes, however, it comes very close to adore; as, a spoiled child is usually one that has been idolized by his parents. Ana. Love, dote on or upon (see LIKE): admire, esteem (see under REGARD, n.).

Ant. Detest. — Con. *Hate, loathe, abhor, abominate: *despise, scorn, contemn, disdain.

adorn. Adorn, decorate, ornament, embellish, beautify, deck, bedeck, garnish agree in meaning to enhance the appearance of something, usually by additions. These words, especially the first five, are often used interchangeably; certain distinctions, however, are apparent in the work of good writers, especially when the subject of the verb is the thing that enhances rather than the agent or enhancer. That which adorns not only serves to heighten the beauty of its background or setting, but also is beautiful in itself. Adorn is now more often used of immaterial than of material things. "Her modest looks the cottage might adorn, Sweet as the primrose peeps beneath the thorn" (Goldsmith). "The most elevated rank, instead of giving her consequence, would be adorned by her" (Austen). That which decorates is that which relieves the plainness or monotony of a background by contributing beauty of color or design to it; as, the walls are yet to be decorated; well-arranged trees decorate a lawn; to use inlaying as a chair decoration. That which ornaments is an adjunct or an accessory which sets off a thing to advantage. "Whose bridle was ornamented with silver bells" (Scott). Ornament, especially the noun, is often used figuratively. "The royal navy of England hath ever been its greatest defence and ornament" (Blackstone). Embellish more often suggests the act of an agent than the effect of a thing. One embellishes who modifies his material, especially by adding adventitious, sometimes gaudy or fictitious, ornament for the sake of effect; as, to embellish one's style with imagery. Embellish often suggests disregard for truth; as, a highly embellished account of a battle. That which beautifies (or one beautifies who) either enhances the beauty of something or counterbalances its plainness or ugliness. "The eternal orbs that beautify the night" (Shelley). "And there, by fresh hopes beautified, Stood He . . . our youngest, fairest flower!" (Wordsworth). That which decks or bedecks is something (or one decks or bedecks who) adds something which contributes to the gaiety, splendor, or, especially in the case of bedeck, showiness of appearance; as, to bedeck oneself with jewels. "Decking with liquid pearl the bladed grass" (Shak.). "He likes to deck out his little person in splendor and fine colors" (Thackeray). One garnishes something when one decks it out with something bright and attractive, as the final touch in preparation for use or service. "And when he cometh [to his house], he findeth it swept and garnished" (Luke xi. 25). The word is now used chiefly in cookery; as, to garnish a broiled fish with lemon slices and chopped parsley.

Ana. Enhance, heighten, *intensify.

Ant. Disfigure. — Con. *Deface, disfigure: mar, spoil, impair, *injure: *deform, distort, contort.

adroit. 1 *Dexterous, deft, feat, handy.

Ana. *Agile, nimble: expert, adept, skillful, skilled, *proficient: effortless, smooth, facile, *easy.

Ant. Maladroit. — Con. Clumsy, *awkward, inept.

2 *Clever, cunning, ingenious.

Ana. *Shrewd, astute, perspicacious: *intelligent, quick-witted, smart: artful, crafty (see SLY).

Ant. Stolid. — Con. *Impassive, apathetic, phlegmatic: *stupid, dull, dense.

adulation. Flattery, *compliment.

Ana. Praise, laud, extollation (see corresponding verbs at PRAISE): *applause, acclaim: fulsomeness, unctuousness (see corresponding adjectives at FULSOME).

Ant. Abuse. — Con. Obloquy, vituperation (see ABUSE): censure, condemnation, reprobation, criticism (see corresponding verbs at CRITICIZE).

adult, adj. *Mature, grown-up, matured, ripe, mellow, full-fledged.

Ana. Developed, ripened, aged (see MATURE, v.).

Ant. Juvenile: puerile. — Con. *Youthful, boyish, virgin, virginal, maiden: adolescent, pubescent (see corresponding nouns at YOUTH).

adulterant, n. *Admixture, alloy.

adulterate. Adulterate, sophisticate, load, weight, doctor, deacon agree in meaning to alter fraudulently, especially for profit. Adulterate, the usual and technical term, especially when used with reference to foodstuffs and drugs, implies either the admixture of ingredients of similar appearance to increase the bulk, or of a harmful substance as a preservative or as a restorer or improver of appearance; as, to adulterate maple sirup with beet sugar sirup. "Lime juice adulterated with five percent sulphuric acid, jellies with formaldehyde, peas with copper" (V. Heiser). In its extended use, adulterate always implies spurlousness or loss of purity; such implications come out strongly in unadulterated, which is the equivalent of pure and sheer in their hyperbolic senses; as, that book is unadulterated trash. Sophisticate, though now comparatively rare, is almost exactly identical in meaning with adulterate, but it is used chiefly of expensive liquors, oils, and the like. Load implies the admixture of something to add weight (as, to load sugar) or specifically, of a substance, such as barite, to a fabric to make it heavier (as, to load silk). Weight is used interchangeably with load in the specific sense. Doctor and deacon are purely colloquial terms which always imply tampering, sometimes by adulteration, but more often by alterations or falsifications which give an illusion of genuineness, of superior quality, or of great value; as, to doctor liquor; to doctor accounts; to deacon fruit (by placing the best specimens at the top of the container).

Ana. *Debase, vitiate, corrupt: pollute, defile, taint (see CONTAMINATE).

Ant. Refine (wine, sugar, oil, etc.). — Con. *Improve, better.

adultery. Adultery, fornication, incest designate forms of illicit sexual intercourse which are clearly distinguished in legal use, both civil and ecclesiastical. Adultery implies unfaithfulness to one's spouse, and therefore can be applied only to sexual intercourse on the part of a married man with a woman other than his wife, or of a married woman with a man other than her husband. Fornication designates sexual intercourse on the part of an unmarried person; thus, in commerce between a married and an unmarried person, the former is guilty of adultery and the latter of fornication. Incest designates sexual intercourse between persons so closely related that their marriage is prohibited by church or state, and usually by both.

Ana. Unfaithfulness, inconstancy, untruthfulness (see affirmative adjectives at FAITHFUL): infidelity, disloyalty (see affirmative nouns at FIDELITY).

adumbrate. *Suggest, shadow.

Ana. Symbolize, typify, emblemize (see corresponding nouns at SYMBOL): signify, denote, *mean.

adumbration. Shadow, umbra, penumbra, *shade, umbrage.

Ana. *Symbol, type, emblem: *sign, token, symptom, note: hint, suggestion, intimation (see corresponding verbs at SUGGEST).

Ant. Revelation. — Con. Disclosure, revealing, divulging, discovering (see corresponding verbs at REVEAL).

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

advance, v. 1 Advance, promote, forward, further. All of these words by derivation mean to move or put ahead, but they come most closely into comparison in their transitive senses when they imply help in moving or putting ahead. Advance still retains its etymological sense, though its use is confined largely to certain idiomatic phrases; as, the army was advancing (moving ahead to its goal or, if a definite point of view is implied, approaching) at a rapid pace; he advanced a step (moved a step ahead or nearer); "a row of girls . . . each with slipped foot well advanced [put forward]" (Deland); the date of opening has been advanced (put ahead, or nearer in time, as opposed to postponed). In its richer transitive meaning, advance usually implies effective assistance, as in hastening a process (the warm rains greatly advanced the spring crops), as in bringing about a desired end (the pact should advance peace among nations), as in exalting or elevating a person, especially in rank or in power ("Ahasuerus . . . advanced him . . . above all the princes" — Esther iii. 1). Promote commonly stresses the assistance more than its effect. However, the implication of moving ahead is dominant when the word means to advance in grade or rank, especially in a predetermined order; thus, to promote a pupil is, provided there is no further qualification, to advance him to the next grade in school; to promote a member of a college faculty is, with the same proviso, to advance him to the next rank in his profession. When the dominant implication is assistance, promote may suggest open backing or support, especially when the subject names a person. "The objects for which a corporation is created are universally such as the government wishes to promote" (Ch. Just. Marshall). It may, especially when the subject names a person, his influence, or his acts, imply actual advance by encouraging or fostering. "Christian mystics, whose influence for good, both in promoting personal piety and in advancing the Kingdom of God upon earth" (Inge). It may, when said of a thing, such as a practice, a policy, a habit, imply subservience to an end that may not be intended. "The habit of regarding the language of poetry as something dissociated from personal emotion . . . was promoted by the writing of Greek and Latin verse in school" (Babbitt). In one or two collocations only, forward does not imply assistance; as, to forward a shipment by express; please forward all letters during my absence. In its more common sense, forward is often not clearly distinguishable from advance, except that it is seldom, if ever, used with reference to persons. "Marie de Médicis had advanced Marillac by marrying him to one of her maids of honor . . . yet . . . she only forwarded the marriage because she wanted to do the girl a favour" (Belloc). Further, less than any other word in this group, implies movement ahead and, perhaps more than any other, emphasizes the assistance given, especially in the removing of obstacles, either to a person in an undertaking or to the project he undertakes, the cause he espouses, or the like. "Her sole object . . . was to further him, not as an artist but as a popular success" (Van W. Brooks). "Bodies like the French Academy have such power for promoting it [genius], that the general advance of the human spirit is perhaps, on the whole, rather furthered than impeded by their existence" (Arnold).

Ana. *Help, aid, assist: hasten, accelerate, quicken, *speed: elevate, raise, *lift.

Ant. Retard: check. — Con. *Hinder, impede: *restrain, curb: *arrest: *delay, slow.

interchangeably; however, there are instances in which one is preferable to the other. Advance only may be used when a concrete instance is signified; though one may say that at a given time science made no advance (or progress), one must say that there were no advances (not progresses) in science at that time. Advance is preferable to progress when the context implies, literally or figuratively, movement ahead such as that of an army marching to its objective, the distance traveled, or the rate of traveling. "There are some . . . who picture to themselves Religion as retreating . . . before the victorious advance of science" (Inge). "In the eighteenth century they [physicists] advanced a long way" (Karl K. Darrow). "It [the Constitution] does not forbid the cautious advance, step by step . . . [characteristic] of English legislation" (Justice Holmes). Progress usually carries, literally or figuratively, implications derived from earlier meanings of a process, a circuit, or a cycle, and so is preferable to advance when the movement forward involves these implications, as by suggesting a normal course, growth, or development; as, the trial is progressing. "Moon . . . begins . . . her rosy progress" (Milton). "[Summer] oft, delighted, stops to trace The progress of the spiky blade" (Burns). In its richest meaning the word does not lose these implications, but it carries additional connotations, largely as a result of its connection with theories of evolution. Sometimes, it stresses development through a series of steps or stages, each marking a definite change. "It would be . . . a dull world that developed without break of continuity; it would surely be a mad world that progressed by leaps alone" (Lowes). "The progress of an artist is a continual self-sacrifice, a continual extinction of personality" (T. S. Eliot). Progress is the preferable word when development with improvement is implied. "It [a certain trend in poetry] may prove . . . to be nothing more than a localized and temporary disturbance of the general progress of poetry" (Day Lewis).

Ana. Develop, *mature: *intensify, heighten.

Ant. Recede. — Con. Retreat, retrograde (see RECEDE): retire, withdraw (see GO).

3 *Adduce, allege, cite.

Ana. *Offer, present, proffer: propose (see corresponding noun at PROPOSAL): broach, *express, air.

advance, v. 1 Progress (see under ADVANCE, v., 2).

Ana. *Development, evolution: improvement, betterment (see corresponding verbs at IMPROVE).

Ant. Recession, retrogression. — Con. Retrograding, retreating (see RECEDE).

2 *Overture, approach, tender, bid.

Ana. *Proposal, proposition: offer, proffer (see corresponding verbs at OFFER).

advanced. 1 Forward, precocious, *premature, untimely.

Ant. Backward. — Con. Retrogressive, retrograde, regressive (see BACKWARD).

2 Radical, *liberal, progressive, left.

Ana. Daring, temerarious, venturous, venturesome, *adventurous.

Ant. Conservative.

advancement. Advancement, preferment, promotion, elevation are here compared as designating the act of raising a person in grade, rank, or dignity, or the honor that comes to one who is so raised. Advancement is the general term of widest application; as, to lose all hope of advancement. Preferment, especially in older use, often comes close to advancement. "'Tis the curse of service, Preferment goes by letter and affection, And not by old gradation, where each second Stood heir to the first" (Shak.). As a rule, however, it implies choice, especially from a series of candidates or possibilities. "Who for preferments at a court would wait, Where every gudgeon's nibbling at the bait?" (Olway). It is now used principally of ecclesiastical and high civil appointments, especially in England. Promotion, usually but not invariably, implies gradation, or raising according to a fixed plan, often involving the passing of tests or the meeting of qualifications. It is the specific word in education to designate the end-of-the-term advance of pupils to a higher grade, or in any field where members of a force or staff are given positions of higher rank with increased remuneration. Elevation is applicable only when the advancement carries marked increase in honor or dignity; as, the prime minister's elevation to the peerage; the bishop's elevation to the cardinalate. "The many men of talent who owed their elevation to Wolsey" (Froude).

Ant. Degradation: reduction (in rank or status).

advantage. 1 Advantage, handicap, allowance, odds, edge agree in denoting a factor or set of factors in a competition or rivalry giving one person or side a position of superiority to the other. Advantage is the general term, and implies superiority of any kind. "The adult, with trained powers, has an immense advantage over the child in the acquisition of information" (C. W. Eliot). A handicap is an artificial advantage assigned by an umpire to an inferior competitor. Thus, in golf, the handicap assigned a player is often the difference between the average of a certain number of his best scores and par for the course; for instance, if the player's best-score average is 78 and par is 75, the handicap is 3, and in a handicap match the player deducts three strokes from his total score. But handicap often (virtually always in extended use) means the exact opposite: an artificial disadvantage imposed on a superior competitor. An allowance is an advantageous handicap stated as a deduction of some sort. Thus in horse racing an allowance is a deduction from the weight that the rules require a horse to carry, granted to a horse considered to be at a disadvantage. Odds usually implies a material advantage, as in strength, numbers, or resources. It is often used of such an advantage possessed by the opposite side. "The overwhelming odds it [the double-barrel gun] affords the sportsman over bird and animal" (Jefferies). "The peculiarly British quality . . . of sticking out against odds" (Contemp. Rev.). Advantage is often stated as a difference, odds as a ratio; as, one boxer has an advantage of ten pounds in weight; one army has odds of two to one over the other. Odds may also denote an equalizing concession made to an inferior competitor; it then differs from handicap and allowance in that the concession is made by the superior competitor, and not assigned by a third party. "Each side feels that it cannot allow any odds to the other" (Bryce). Edge is a corruption of the card term age (the right belonging to the player to the left of the dealer to have the last say); but the idea of a last say is not a necessary nor even a common implication in the extended sense of edge, which is little more than a slang equivalent of advantage or odds. "Here we have the edge on our rivals, not only because of our superior location, but also because we are reputedly reckless about reducing prices" (Publishers' Weekly).

Ana. Pre-eminence, superlativeness (see corresponding adjectives at SUPREME): *supremacy, ascendancy.

Ant. Disadvantage: handicap (in extended sense). —

Con. *Obstacle, obstruction, impediment, bar.

2 *Use, service, account, profit, avail.

Ana. Improvement, betterment (see corresponding verbs at IMPROVE): enhancement, heightening (see corresponding verbs at INTENSIFY): benefit (see corresponding verb at BENEFIT).

Ant. Detriment. — Con. Harm, hurt, damage, *injury. advantageous. *Beneficial, profitable.

Ana. *Expedient, advisable: useful, utilitarian (see corresponding nouns at USE).

Ant. Disadvantageous. — Con. Detrimental, deleterious (see PERNICIOUS): harmful, hurtful, injurious (see corresponding nouns at INJURY).

adventient. *Adventitious, supervenient, adventive.

Ana. Acquired (see GET): external, outside (see OUTER).

Ant. Constitutional.

advent. *Arrival.

Ana. Coming, arriving (see COME): approaching, nearing (see APPROACH, v.): appearing, emerging (see APPEAR).

Ant. Leaving, passing.

adventitious. 1 *Accidental, incidental, fortuitous, casual, contingent.

Ana. Acquired (see GET): accessory, subservient (see AUXILIARY).

Ant. Inherent. — Con. Constitutional, essential, intrinsic, ingrained (see INHERENT): *innate, inborn, inbred.

2 Adventitious, adventive, adventient, supervenient agree in meaning added from without or occurring as a result of external causes. That is adventitious which does not belong to a thing naturally, normally, or historically. "It is important that we distinguish between borrowed, adventitious energy in verse, and its natural energy" (Day Lewis). In the sciences, adventitious and adventive sometimes suggest abnormality; thus, an adventitious root is one arising at any point of the stem other than a normal point of origin; an adventive crater is one on the flanks of a volcanic cone. Both words are used, especially in botany, for sporadic growths of something neither native nor naturalized; as, an adventive weed. Adventient and supervenient have acquired new importance through their use in very modern philosophy and psychology. That is adventient to a thing (especially to the mind) which comes to it as the result purely of external causes. The word is used especially to distinguish that element in a sense impression or an apprehension which is wholly external, from that which is the result of the constitution of the sense organ or the mind. "Admittedly adventient to us is electro-magnetic influence; but color is referred to the thing by propiety" (Lloyd Morgan). That is supervenient which occurs unexpectedly or without known cause. In modern philosophical (as distinguished from biological) theories of evolution it implies emergence of that which is unpredictable and completely novel. "Later in evolutionary sequence life emerges . . . with supervenient vital relations hitherto not in being" (Lloyd Morgan).

Ana. *Abnormal, aberrant, atypic: unnatural, anomalous, *irregular: derived, stemmed (see SPRING, v.).

Ant. Natural, normal.

adventive. Adventient, *adventitious, supervenient.

Ana. & Ant. See those at ADVENTITIOUS, 2.

adventure. Adventure, enterprise, emprise (or emprise), quest come into comparison mainly when they denote an undertaking, an exploit, or an experience involving hazards and requiring boldness. Adventure so stresses the excitement or thrills associated with the encountering of risks or hardships that the word is applicable either to the event or to its emotional effect; as, to seek adventures (the experiences) for adventure's (the emotional effect's) sake. In modern usage, adventure tends to emphasize the pleasurable excitement induced by newness and strangeness, as much as that induced by perils or difficulties. "The thirst for adventure . . . a war, a crusade, a gold mine, a new country, speak to the imagination and offer . . . play to the confined powers" (Emerson). "Why fear death? Death is only a beautiful adventure" (C. Frohman). Enterprise, in its richer as well as in its thinner sense, is always applied to an undertaking (rather than an experience) or to the spirit required for such an undertaking. As distinguished from adventure, it implies arduousness in the undertaking, and initiative, resourcefulness, and sustained energy in the one who carries it through. "Ripe for exploits and mighty enterprises" (Shak.). "Fresh news is got only by enterprise and expense" (Justice Holmes). "The nurse of manly sentiment and heroic enterprise is gone" (Burke). Emprise and quest are archaic words now used only in poetry or elevated prose. Both suggest days of chivalry and romantic adventure. Emprise distinctively connotes deeds of gallantry and daring. "What course were best to take in this hot bold emprise" (Spenser). Quest implies a search or pursuit, always of that which is elusive, often of that which is unattainable; as, the quest of the Holy Grail. Only emprise, however, is used of the spirit as well as the undertaking. "I love thy courage yet, and bold emprise" (Milton).

Ana. Exploit, *feat, achievement: hazard, peril, risk (see DANGER).

adventurous. Adventurous, venturous, venturesome, daring, daredevil, rash, reckless, temerarious, foolhardy denote in common courting danger, or exposing oneself to danger in a greater degree than is required for courage. One is adventurous who is inclined to adventure; the word may or may not imply indiscretion or imprudence in incurring risk or hazard. "A mind active, ambitious, and adventurous . . . always aspiring" (Johnson). "Adventurous boys . . . climbed, shouting and laughing, over the rafters" (S. Anderson). One is venturous who is inclined to take chances; venturesome (often interchangeable with venturous) frequently implies an excessive tendency in that direction. "Every corner Among these rocks, and every hollow place That venturous foot could reach" (Wordsworth). "In 1919 Alcock and Brown undertook the first and highly venturesome crossing of the Atlantic by air" (Manchester Guardian). Daring heightens the implication of fearlessness. "A daring pilot in extremity, pleased with the danger, when the waves went high" (Dryden). Daredevil implies ostentation in daring and is often specifically applied to stunts performed for hire as a public spectacle or to their performers; as, a daredevil act, acrobat, or aviator. Rash implies imprudent hastiness or boldness in word or action; reckless, utter heedlessness or carelessness of consequences. "We must detain him . . . If we do not I am convinced Austin will do something rash that he will for ever repent" (Meredith). "A recklessness which made her almost indifferent whether she sank or swam" (Trollope). Temerarious (the adjective is much rarer than its noun temerity) implies such recklessness as induces one to attempt something that stands but slight chance of success. "The King was one of the first that entred [the breach], choosing rather to be thought temerarious than timorous" (Speed). One is foolhardy who is foolishly daring or reckless. "If any yet be so foolhardy to expose themselves to vain jeopardy" (Bp. Butler).

Ana. Audacious, bold, intrepid, doughty (see BRAVE): aspiring, panting (see AIM, v.): *ambitious, emulous.

Ant. Unadventurous: cautious.

adversary. *Opponent, antagonist.

Ana. Assailant, attacker, assaulter (see corresponding verbs at ATTACK): *enemy, foe: competitor, rival (see corresponding verbs at RIVAL).

Ant. Ally. — Con. Colleague, *partner: supporter, champion, backer, upholder (see under SUPPORT, v.).

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

adverse. 1 Adverse, antagonistic, counter, counteractive agree in meaning so opposed as to cause interference, often harmful or fatal interference. All four may be applied to one thing that comes into conflict with another; as, an adverse policy; an antagonistic associate; a counter attack; a counteractive agency. Only antagonistic, counter, and, occasionally, counteractive are used to express mutual or reciprocal opposition; as, antagonistic principles; counter currents; counteractive poisons. Thus, one says that the ship was delayed by adverse winds (that is, by one head wind after another) or that the trade winds are counter winds (that is, winds coming from opposite points of the compass). Despite their common ground of meaning, each of these four words has distinct implications which limit its applicability and greatly increase its expressiveness. Adverse conveys so strongly the idea of unfavorable or unpropitious opposition that it often means harmful or fatal; as, adverse criticism; adverse fortune; a spirit adverse to the existence of democracy. Antagonistic commonly, but not invariably, implies hostility and also, when mutual opposition is suggested, incompatibility or even irreconcilability; as, neighboring races are often antagonistic; some sociologists believe that the welfare of the individual and the welfare of society are antagonistic aims. In its technical use, antagonistic often connotes the play of opposing things or forces that makes them nullify or neutralize each other; as, antagonistic reflexes. Counter, which usually denotes acting, moving, or proceeding from the opposite side (or sides) does not necessarily connote hostility, but it does imply inevitable contact, with either resulting conflict or tension; as, whirlpools are usually caused by counter currents in a stream; the counter influences of authority and freedom in shaping the character of youth. Counteractive, on the other hand, invariably implies the destruction or nullification of the thing or things opposed; as, prescribing physicians must know the counteractive effects of certain medicines on others; in the training of delinquents, a bad influence is dealt with by the introduction of a counteractive good influence.

Ana. Harmful, hurtful, injurious (see corresponding nouns at INJURY): hindering, impeding, obstructing (see corresponding verbs at HINDER): detrimental, deleterious, *pernicious: fatal, *deadly.

Ant. Propitious. — Con. Auspicious, *favorable, benign: *beneficial, advantageous.

2 Adverse, averse are actually contrasted rather than synonymous terms, though they are occasionally (now rarely) used as though similar in meaning. Etymologically, adverse means "turned to," and averse "turned from." Consequently, in botany they are used to distinguish contrasted types of leaves. In current literary use, adverse implies opposition that interferes and is applied to the thing that stands in the way of one's progress or success; as, the leader would tolerate no adverse opinions among his followers. Averse implies repugnance in the person opposed to a thing, rather than a quality in the thing which is opposed; as, the leader is averse to (British, averse from) all independence of opinion among his followers. However, they are sometimes used as synonyms by good writers with only this distinction, that adverse is chiefly referred to opinion or intention and averse to feeling and inclination. "I . . . hope that our periodical judges will not be very adverse to me, and that perhaps they may even favour me" (Cowper). "The writer of critical studies . . . has to mediate between the author whom he loves and the public, who are certainly indifferent and frequently averse" (Stevenson).

adversity. *Misfortune, mischance.

Ana. *Trial, tribulation, affliction: *distress, misery, suffering: *poverty, privation, indigence, destitution. Ant. Prosperity. — Con. Felicity, *happiness, bliss: ease, comfort (see REST): wealth, affluence, opulence, richness (see corresponding adjectives at RICH).

advert. 1 Advert, revert are sometimes confused because of a similar basic meaning when they are used in reference to discourse or contemplation. Advert denotes to turn from the point, topic, or incident under consideration in order to take up another. In modern usage, it sometimes suggests an unconscious or an illogical break in the chain of thought, but in highly discriminating use, it still retains the verb's primary implication of heeding or taking notice. "We are but too apt to consider things in the state in which we find them, without sufficiently adverting to the causes by which they have been produced" (Burke). "The distinction . . . will be rendered more apparent by adverting to that provision in the second section . . . of the constitution" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Revert adds to advert the implication of return (either consciously or unconsciously) to a point or topic already discussed or previously in one's mind. "He now drops this idea, and reverts to his reasoning on death" (Goldsmith).

2 *Refer, allude.

Ana. Remark, notice, note, observe (see SEE).

Con. Ignore, disregard, overlook, *neglect.

advise. 1 Notify, *inform, apprise, advise, acquaint.

Ana. *Warn, forewarn, caution: *reveal, disclose, divulge, tell.

2 Publish, announce, proclaim, broadcast, promulgate, *declare.

Ana. Report, recount, *relate: *communicate, impart.

Con. *Suppress, repress: conceal, *hide, bury.

advertisement. Publication, announcement, broadcasting, proclamation, promulgation, declaration. See under DECLARE.

Ana. *Publicity, ballyhoo, promotion, propaganda.

advise. 1 Advice, counsel and their corresponding verbs advise, counsel, agree in denoting recommendation (or to make a recommendation) as to a decision or a course of conduct. Advice and advise imply real or pretended knowledge or experience, often professional or technical, on the part of the one who advises, and may apply to any of the affairs of life; as, advice (or, to advise) regarding the choice of books, the conduct of a business, the care of poultry; legal or medical advice. Counsel often stresses the fruit of wisdom or deliberation, and presupposes weightier occasions than advice, or more authority or a closer personal relationship in the one who counsels; as, "I do in friendship counsel you To leave this place" (Shak.); to seek counsel in an emergency, in affairs of state. The noun sometimes suggests instruction or advice of a lofty or ideal character; as, the Christian counsel of perfection.

Ana. Admonition (see corresponding verb at REPROVE): warning, forewarning, cautioning (see WARN): instruction, teaching (see corresponding verbs at TEACH).

2 Intelligence, *news, tidings.

advisable. *Expedient, politic.

Ana. Prudent, *wise, sensible: *beneficial, advantageous, profitable: practical, *practicable.

Ant. Inadvisable.

advise. 1 Counsel (see under ADVICE, 1).

Ana. Admonish (see REPROVE): *warn, forewarn, caution: *induce, persuade.

Con. Consult, *confer, advise.

2 Consult, *confer, commune, parley, treat, negotiate.

Ana. *Discuss, debate, argue: converse, talk (over) (see SPEAK): deliberate (see THINK).

A colon (:): groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Con. Counsel (see under ADVISE, 1).

3 Notify, *inform, apprise, acquaint, advertise.

Ana. Tell, disclose, *reveal: *communicate (with), impart (to).

advised. *Deliberate, considered, premeditated, designed, studied.

advocate, n. 1 *Lawyer, counselor, barrister, counsel, procurator, proctor, attorney, solicitor.

2 Supporter, champion, upholder, backer. See under SUPPORT, v.

Ana. Defender, vindicator, justifier (see corresponding verbs at MAINTAIN): espouser (see corresponding verb at ADOPT): *sponsor, backer: promoter (see corresponding verb at ADVANCE).

Con. *Opponent, antagonist, adversary: assailant, attacker (see corresponding verbs at ATTACK): impugn, traverser (see corresponding verbs at DENY).

advocate, v. *Support, uphold, champion, back.

Ana. Defend, justify, vindicate, *maintain: espouse (see ADOPT): promote, forward, *advance.

Ant. Impugn. — Con. Assail, *attack: combat, *oppose.

aeon or eon. Age, era, epoch, *period.

aeonian or eonian. *Secular, centuried, agelong, diuturnal.

Ana. Eternal, illimitable (see INFINITE): *everlasting, endless: perpetual, perdurable, *lasting.

aerate. Aerate, ventilate, oxygenate, carbonate. Aerate is the general term and interchangeable in certain phrases with any of the others; the last three are specific terms which are not (except in one instance) interchangeable with each other. Aerate means to supply or impregnate with air or to expose to the action of air. It frequently implies a mechanical process; as, to aerate soil by plowing; to aerate water from a reservoir by spraying it into the air so as to remove a flat taste; to aerate sewage by agitation in fresh air so that bacterial action will decompose it. It sometimes, however, implies a natural process; as, when through fresh air that is inhaled, the blood is aerated in the lungs. Ventilate is the term commonly used when the introduction of air, especially in large quantities, with the object of purifying, freshening, or cooling, is implied; as, to ventilate a room by opening windows or by mechanical means; to ventilate an engine by means of holes in its covering. It may be used interchangeably with aerate when applied to the blood, but aerate suggests rather the exposure to air and ventilate the resulting purification. More exact than either for this process is oxygenate, since it is the oxygen in the air that is required by the blood. Technically, aerate and carbonate are not synonyms, for the latter means to impregnate with a gas or carbon dioxide. Aerate (or especially aerated) is, however, used in certain designations, such as aerated water or aerated bread, where carbonated would correctly describe the process. Carbon dioxide was once called "fixed air," and in appearance water and bread impregnated with it suggest the presence of air. As applied to water, however, aerated is distinguishable from carbonated, the former being applied almost exclusively to artificially charged waters, the latter being used also of those naturally impregnated with carbon dioxide (as, carbonated springs).

aerial or aërial, adj. *Airy, ethereal.

Ana. Immaterial, incorporeal (see MATERIAL): impalpable, *imperceptible, imponderable: *subtle, subtile.

aerial or aërial, n. *Antenna.

aeronautics or aëronautics. Aeronautics (or aëronautics), aviation, avigation have to do with the operation of aircraft: aeronautics and avigation with the operation of any kind of aircraft, aviation with the operation of heavier-than-air aircraft. Aeronautics is primarily a science (as, an aeronautical engineer; well versed in aeronautics), aviation an art or practice (as, a man of long experience in aviation). Avigation, a more recent term coined on the analogy of navigation, is the science or art of directing aircraft from point to point through determination of position, course, etc., by methods similar to those of navigation, as by use of the principles of astronomy and geometry, recognition of landmarks, etc.

aerostat or aërostat. Aerostat (or aërostat), balloon, airship, dirigible, zeppelin, blimp denote a lighter-than-air aircraft. An aerostat is any such craft. A balloon is an aerostat, usually spherical, without means of propulsion (other than air currents) and without means of steering. Airship and dirigible are in careful use interchangeable terms for an elongated motor-propelled aerostat, rigid, semirigid, or nonrigid, having steering apparatus. Dirigible, however, is the more definite term, airship being sometimes loosely used for any kind of aircraft. Zeppelin, originally a name for any of the large rigid dirigibles built by Count von Zeppelin and, later, by the Luftschiffbau-Zeppelin, is now often applied in English to any such dirigible of German make, sometimes to any such dirigible, wherever made. A blimp is a small non-rigid dirigible.

aesthete or esthete. Aesthete (or esthete), dilettante, virtuoso, connoisseur are comparable because all designate a person conspicuous for his enjoyment and appreciation of the beautiful, the exquisite, or the choice. Aesthete implies highly developed sensibilities, with acute delight in beauty of color, line, sound, texture, and the like, and violent distaste for the ugly, shapeless, and discordant. "No woman could walk down the street without risk of having her hat torn off . . . by some aesthete who happened to think it unbecoming" (Shaw). "That mystical synthetic sense, of which the modern aesthete dreams,—the sense that 'sees, hears, tastes, smells, touches, all in one'" (Babbitt). Because aesthete was originally applied to one of a small group of artists and writers around 1880 who won notoriety on account of their affectations, as in dress, and their emphasis upon decorative beauty, the term often carries derogatory connotations, such as absurdity, extravagance, decadence, namby-paminess, and the like. "He [Maccenas] had all the foibles of the aesthete" (Buchan). Dilettante originally and still stresses the attitude of the lover of art as distinguished from that of the creative artist. Through its application to amateurs who were neither thoroughly familiar with the technique of their particular form of art nor seriously seeking for mastery, it acquired connotations of desultoriness, dabbling, and superficiality. At present, though still often used in an uncomplimentary sense (as, he is a mere dilettante), there is a strong tendency among good writers to stress its original implication, and to apply it to one who pursues an art or studies it merely for his own delight. "He would always be by nature a contemplative and a dilettante; but he had had high things to contemplate, great things to delight in" (E. Wharton). "A generalization with which I find myself (with all the diffidence of an unlearned dilettante) disagreeing" (A. Huxley). Virtuoso, a term now chiefly in historical use in the sense in which it is here considered, was applied originally (around 1700) to a collector of interesting things such as old coins, butterflies, curios, and the like. Later, it was limited to a collector of articles of virtue, and especially of beautiful antiques. It has also acquired various depreciatory connotations such as faddishness, trifling, and the like, which the word rarely carries in modern historical use. "In the retrospect we can see that some of these virtuosi were on the way to become serious antiquaries" (Babbitt). Connoisseur, like dilettante, implies high appreciation of that which is beautiful in art; unlike it, it implies profound knowledge and a trained taste. Because of the latter implication, connoisseur is applied not only to one who knows a work of art when he sees it but also to one who recognizes superiority in foods, wines, and the like. Therefore the word often comes close to epicure in its meaning. Like virtuoso, which it has practically supplanted, it is also applied to collectors of beautiful things. "Supposing also that the material of his Apologia was . . . defunct . . . who but a few discerning connoisseurs of style would ever read that book now or a century hence?" (T. S. Eliot). "He has found time to make himself a connoisseur of porcelains, one of the most esoteric of collector's hobbies" (V. Heiser).

aesthetic or esthetic. *Artistic.

Ant. Unaesthetic or unesthetic.

afear'd or afear'd. *Afraid, agast.

Ana., Ant., Con. See those at AFRAID, 1.

affable. *Gracious, cordial, genial, sociable.

Ana. Courteous, polite (see CIVIL): open, candid, *frank: *amiable, obliging, complaisant: *talkative, loquacious. *suave, urbane.

Ant. Reserved. — Con. Uncommunicative, taciturn, reticent, *silent: curt, brusque (see BLUFF): surly, glum, crabbed (see SULLEN).

affair. 1 Affair, business, concern, matter, thing come into comparison only when they are little more than vague or general terms meaning something done or dealt with, or to be done or dealt with. Some (rarely all) are used interchangeably in certain similar collocations even by good writers; as, it is his own affair, business, concern; public and private affairs, concerns, matters, business; it is a sorry affair, business, matter, thing; affairs, matters, things are in good condition. However, a degree of precision is possible, for each word carries distinctive implications which are not always obscured. Affair suggests action or performance; it often implies a process, an operation, a proceeding, an undertaking, a transaction. "Seeing a book through the press is a laborious and time-wasting affair" (T. H. Huxley). In the plural it often denotes transactions of great importance, such as those involved in the management of finances or in the carrying on of diplomatic negotiations; as, men of affairs. "He had married a rich woman and administered her affairs. He was not supposed . . . to have any affairs of his own" (M. Austin). Business, as here compared, usually stresses duty or office; sometimes it suggests an imposed task. "Because a Thing is every Body's Business, it is no Body's Business" (Steele). "The flight of his imagination is very swift: the following of it often a breathless business" (Day Lewis). Concern suggests personal or direct relationship: it often implies an important bearing on one's welfare, success, or the like; thus, it is not my concern (that is, it has no bearing on my interests, welfare, etc.). "The simplest way out of the difficulty was to do nothing and dismiss the matter as no concern of theirs" (Conrad). Sometimes, concern is preferred to affair when that which requires attention involves a degree of anxiety or solicitude; as, the concerns of state. Matter usually is more objective as well as more vague than the preceding words. It generally refers to something that is merely an object of consideration or that is to be dealt with; as, he will attend to these matters very soon; this is still a matter of dispute. "Never insist without carrying the matter through" (B. Russell). "'They order,' said I, 'this matter better in France'" (Sterne). Thing is even more indefinite than matter and is often intentionally used when there is a desire to be vague or inexplicit; as, he promised that things would be better in the future; first things should come first; things political. "More things are wrought by prayer Than this world dreams of" (Tennyson). "These things are managed so well in France" (Harte).

2 Affaire, *amour, intrigue, liaison.

affaire. Affair, *amour, intrigue, liaison.

affect. 1 Simulate, *assume, pretend, feign, counterfeit, sham.

Ana. Posture, attitudinize, pose (see under POSTURE, n.).

affect. 2 1 Affect, influence, touch, impress, strike, sway are more or less closely synonymous when they mean to produce or to have an effect upon a person or upon a thing capable of a reaction. Affect always presupposes a stimulus powerful enough to evoke a response or elicit a reaction. "Our ear-drums are affected by ten octaves, at most, out of the endless range of sounds" (Jean). "Even changes of season affect the townsman very little" (A. Huxley). Very often, in addition, affect implies a definite alteration or modification. "I am afraid, Mr. Darcy . . . that this adventure has rather affected your admiration of her fine eyes" (Austen). When the object of the verb is a person, an intellectual or emotional effect is usually implied; as, such poetry affects one as trite and meaningless; the sight affected her to tears; he was in no way affected by their misery. Influence always presupposes an agent or agency that moves a person or thing in some way or to some degree from his or its course, or effects changes in his or its nature, character, or behavior; as, the judge was never influenced in his decisions by his sympathies or prejudices; the body influences the mind and the mind the body. "The Society of Friends had been influenced by Quietism, and adversely affected by the paralyzing rationalism of the reigns of the first two Georges" (Inge). Sometimes, the implication of inducing, or inciting, or persuading, or even bribing, is strong. "Monomaniacs, having first persuaded themselves, contrive to influence their neighbors" (Meredith). Touch, as here compared, frequently equals affect, but it often carries a more vivid suggestion of close contact or of the force of an impact, and therefore variously connotes stirring, arousing, harming, and the like. "He was for the first time powerfully touched by the presence of a woman" (S. Anderson). "Did . . . [ancient Greek religion] touch the conscience as well as the imagination and intellect?" (G. L. Dickinson). "I do not wish to do anything which may touch your credit" (Hardy). Touch, most often, but impress and strike always, imply a mental or emotional effect. Impress usually stresses the depth and the lastingness of the effect, for that which impresses is commonly that which is remembered or remarked or is worth remembering or remarking; as, only one of the speeches that evening impressed him. "The men he wanted to impress were only amused" (S. Anderson). Strike is often felt to be more colloquial than impress and less rich in its suggestions; as, the sight struck him speechless with awe (or impressed him); a hat that struck her fancy. However, strike connotes suddenness or sharpness of response rather than depth of impression; it may even carry a hint of a swift passing; as, the remark struck him as extremely acute. "Such sweet neglect more taketh me Than all the adulteries of art: They strike mine eyes, but not my heart" (B. Jonson). Sway (as here compared: see also SWING), which basically means to influence, differs from the latter word in always implying both the pressure or control of some force that is either not resisted or is in itself irresistible, and resulting change or fluctuation in the character, the opinions, etc., of the person or persons concerned; as, "the notion . . . of capricious deities, swayed by human passions and desires, was incompatible with the idea of fixed law" (G. L. Dickinson); "Other conditions than those of classroom have swayed him [the pupil] for good or evil" (H. Suzzallo); "he is swayed by fashion, by suggestion, by transient moods" (Mencken).

Ana. *Move, actuate, drive, impel: pierce, penetrate (see ENTER): *thrill, electrify.

2 *Concern.

3 Affect, effect are often a source of difficulty because both verbs imply the production of an effect and take as their corresponding noun the same word, effect. Affect, the verb (see AFFECT, 1) distinctively implies the action or operation of an agency rather than of an agent: it, therefore, means to influence; as, moisture affects steel; high prices affect our pocketbooks; the climate has affected his health; he [that is, his personality] affects me unpleasantly. Effect, the verb (see PERFORM), implies the achievement of an end in view, and therefore requires as its subject in the active voice an intelligent agent or the means he uses to attain his end: it therefore means to bring about; as, the prisoners effected their escape; the new system of accounting will effect a reduction in costs. Since the noun effect may be applied to any result whether brought about unconsciously or consciously, it serves equally well whether it names that which results from the influence of one thing upon another or from directed effort.

affectation. *Pose, air, mannerism.

Ana. *Pretense, pretension: pretentiousness, ostentation, pompousness (see corresponding adjectives at SHOWY).

Ant. Artlessness. — Con. Naturalness, simplicity, ingenuousness, naiveté, unsophistication (see corresponding adjectives at NATURAL).

affecting, adj. Touching, *moving, pathetic, poignant, impressive.

Ana. Stirring, rousing, rallying (see STIR, v.): distressing, troubling (see TROUBLE, v.): *pitiful, piteous, pitiable.

affection.¹ 1 *Feeling, emotion, passion, sentiment.

Ana. Propensity, *leaning, penchant: *predilection, bias: inclination, disposition (see corresponding verbs at INCLINE).

Ant. Antipathy. — Con. Aversion (see ANIPATHY): *hate, hatred.

2 Love, *attachment

Ana. Devotion, piety, *fidelity. liking, doting on, enjoying (see LIKE, v.): tenderness, warmth, sympathy (see corresponding adjectives at TENDER).

Ant. Coldness. — Con. Coolness, frigidity (see corresponding adjectives at COLD): hate, detestation, hatred, abhorrence (see under HATE, v.).

affection.² *Disease, malady, complaint, distemper, ailment.

Ana. Attack, access, paroxysm (see FIT): sickness, illness (see corresponding adjectives at SICK): disorder, derangement (see corresponding verbs at DISORDER).

affectionate. *Loving, devoted, fond, doting.

Ana. Ardent, fervent, passionate (see IMPASSIONED): *tender, sympathetic, warm.

Ant. Cold: undemonstrative. — Con. Apathetic, *impassive, stolid.

affiance, n. *Engagement, betrothal, espousal, sponsalia.

affidavit. Deposition, testimony, *evidence.

affiliated. Allied, *related, kindred, cognate.

Ana. Dependent, succursal, *subordinate.

Ant. Unaffiliated. — Con. Independent, *free, autonomous.

affinity. 1 *Kinship, consanguinity, cognation, agnation, enation.

Ana. Relation or relationship, connection (see corresponding verbs at JOIN).

2 *Attraction, sympathy.

Ant. Diffinity. — Con. Repugnance, repellency or repulsion, abhorrence (see corresponding adjectives at REPUGNANT): *antipathy, aversion.

3 Resemblance, *likeness, similarity, similitude, analogy.

Ana. Agreement, conformity, correspondence, accord (see corresponding verbs at AGREE).

affirm. 1 Aver, avow, protest, avouch, declare, *assert, warrant, predicate.

Ana. Asseverate, *swear, depose: attest, *certify, vouch for, witness: state (see RELATE).

Ant. Deny. — Con. Contradict, negative, traverse, gainsay (see DENY): dispute, debate (see DISCUSS).

2 *Swear, asseverate, depose, depone, testify.

affirmative. Affirmative, positive cause difficulties in their extended use, since each term has negative for its opposite and since both words may qualify identical or similar nouns. The distinctions are not clearly fixed, but tendencies in good usage may be noted. In general, affirmative implies denial as its opposite, and positive, negation, or the absence of truth, reality, or actuality. That which is not affirmative may be destructive; that which is not positive may be null or nugatory. Hence, an affirmative philosophy either affirms accepted principles or establishes new ones, and so is opposed to negative philosophies such as skepticism and nihilism. A positive philosophy (this often equals positivism) deduces its principles from that which is evident to the senses or is from the common-sense point of view regarded as real and factual. Metaphysics is from the positivist's point of view a negative philosophy. An investigation has an affirmative result when it confirms the hypothesis of the investigator; it has a positive result if something definite is discovered, whether the result proves or disproves the hypothesis. A person may be said to exercise an affirmative influence when he strengthens or improves that which exists or develops something better to take its place; he may be said to exert a positive influence when he affects others in definite, concrete ways. A defeatist may exert a very positive influence which cannot be described as affirmative; an optimist's attitude is affirmative, but it often fails to exert a positive influence.

Ana. *Effective, effectual, efficacious.

Ant. Negative. — Con. Destroying, demolishing (see DESTROY): abolishing, annihilating, extinguishing (see ABOLISH).

affix, v. *Fasten, attach, fix.

Ana. Append, *add, subjoin, annex: *stick, adhere: glue, *cement.

Ant. Detach. — Con. Disengage (see DETACH): *remove, withdraw.

afflatus. *Inspiration, enthusiasm, fury, furor, frenzy.

afflict. Afflict, try, torment, torture, rack, grill agree in meaning to inflict upon a person something which he finds hard to bear. Anything or anyone that causes pain, disability, suffering, acute annoyance, irritation, or embarrassment, may be said to afflict a person; as, he is afflicted with heart disease; blindness afflicts many aged persons; she is afflicted with shyness. "O, how this discord doth afflict my soul" (Shak.). "He who afflicts me knows what I can bear" (Wordsworth). Any affliction or any person or thing that imposes a strain upon one's physical or spiritual powers of endurance or tests one's stamina or self-control may be said to try a person, his body, his soul, his character, or the like; as, a trying situation; his trying temper. "The great heat of the sun and the heat of hard labour . . . try the body and weaken the digestion" (R. Jefferies). Any affliction or any person or thing that persecutes and causes continued or repeated acute suffering or annoyance may be said to torment one; as, recurrent stomach pains torment him; he is tormented by his suspicions; bullies torment smaller boys; the horses are tormented by flies. "I wish you would not talk like this, papa. You are only tormenting me, and tormenting yourself" (Conrad). Any affliction or any person or thing that severely torments one physically or mentally and causes pain or suffering under which one writhes may be said to torture one; as, to torture prisoners of war. "An idea of what a pulsating sciatica can do in the way of tor-turing its victim" (Bennett). "The unseen grief That swells with silence in the tortured soul" (Shak.). Any person or, especially, any thing (often a painful emotion or disease) that pulls or seems to pull one this way and that beyond endurance and in a manner suggestive of the excruciating straining and wrenching of the body on the rack, an ancient instrument of torture, may be said to rack a person; as, racked with pain; he is racked by doubts of his friend's loyalty; to be racked by demands from every quarter; "Vaunting aloud, but racked with deep despair" (Millon); "How on earth can you rack and harry . . . a man for his losings, when you are fond of his wife, and live in the same station with him?" (Kipling). Any thing (especially intense heat) or any person (especially a severe cross-examiner) that causes one to suffer tortures suggestive of being broiled over a fire may be said to grill one; as, a grilling hot day; the sun grills one today; every witness for the defense left the stand exhausted after having been grilled by the prosecuting attorney; the detectives grilled the suspects.

Ana. *Worry, annoy, harass, harry, plague, pester: vex, bother, irk (see ANNOY): distress, *trouble, ail.

Ant. Comfort. — Con. Console, solace (see COMFORT): delight, gladden, rejoice, *please.

affliction. Visitation, *trial, tribulation, cross.

Ana. Adversity, *misfortune, mischance: *distress, suffering, misery, agony: anguish, *sorrow, grief, woe.

Ant. Solace, consolation. — Con. Relief, assuagement, alleviation (see corresponding verbs at RELIEVE): joy, delight, *pleasure.

affluent. Wealthy, *rich, opulent.

Ana. Possessing, owning, holding, having, enjoying (see HAVE): acquisitive (see COVETOUS).

Ant. Impecunious: straitened. — Con. Indigent, penurious, destitute, poor (see corresponding nouns at POVERTY): impoverished, bankrupt (see DEplete).

afford. 1 *Manage, contrive.

2 *Give, confer, bestow, present, donate.

Ana. *Offer, proffer: *furnish: *grant, accord.

Ant. Deny (something one wants, asks, hopes for, etc.). — Con. Withhold, hold back (see KEEP): refuse, *decline.

affranchise. Enfranchise, liberate, emancipate, manumit, *free, release, deliver, discharge.

Ant. Enslave.

affray, v. *Frighten, fright, affright, scare, alarm, terrify, terrorize, startle.

Ana., Ant., Con. See those at AFFRIGHT.

affray, n. Fray, fight, combat, conflict, *contest.

Ana. *Brawl, row, fracas, melee, rumpus: *encounter, skirmish, brush: dispute, *argument, controversy.

affright, v. *Frighten, fright, affray, scare, alarm, terrify, terrorize, startle.

Ana. Daunt, horrify, appall, *dismay: cow, *intimidate, bulldoze: confound, bewilder (see PUZZLE).

Ant. Nerve, embolden. — Con. Animate, fire, inspire (see INFORM).

affront, v. *Offend, outrage, insult.

Ana. Slight, ignore, *neglect: nettle, peeve, provoke, *irritate.

Ant. Gratify (by an attention). — Con. Humor, *indulge, pamper: flatter, compliment (see corresponding nouns at COMPLIMENT).

affront, n. Affront, insult, indignity agree in denoting a speech or an action having for its intention or effect the dishonoring of a person, a cause, an institution, or the like. An affront is a designed, usually an open, mark of disrespect; as, an affront to the flag. "An old affront will stir the heart Through years of rankling pain" (Ingelow). An insult is a personal attack, either by words or actions, meant to humiliate or degrade. "A gifted Labour member . . . says that it [a pensions bill] is the most brutal insult ever flung in the face of the poor" (C. E. Montague). An indignity is an outrage upon one's personal dignity. "Whom I beseech To give me ample satisfaction For these deep shames and great indignities" (Shak.).

Ana. Slighting, ignoring, overlooking, neglecting (see NEGLECT, v.): offending, outraging (see OFFEND, v.): impudence, brazenness (see corresponding adjectives at SHAMELESS).

Ant. Gratification. — Con. Deference, *honor, homage: adulation, *compliment, flattery.

afore. Forward, ahead, *before.

Ant. Aft. — Con. Aft, astern (see ABAFT).

afraid. 1 Afraid, afeard (or afeared), aghast agree in meaning manifestly or visibly frightened. Usually, but not necessarily, they are used without qualification; they are rarely, if ever correctly, found in the attributive position. Afraid, and its archaic form afeard, connote signs of fright such as shrinking, trembling, or shuddering. "And when the disciples heard it, they fell on their face, and were sore afraid" (Matthew xvii. 6). "Be not afraid; the isle is full of noises" (Shak.). Aghast always implies amazement and its signs, such as stupefaction or loss of power to speak or act; it usually also connotes horror, and then becomes a much stronger word than afraid. "'Afraid' was the word, wasn't it? . . . I should have said, aghast; you exhibited every symptom of one labouring under uncontrollable fear" (Borrow).

Ana. Shuddering, trembling, quaking (see SHAKE, v.): terrified, frightened, affrighted, alarmed (see FRIGHTEN): dismayed, horrified, appalled (see DISMAY).

Ant. Undaunted. — Con. Intrepid, dauntless (see BRAVE).

2 *Fearful, apprehensive.

Ana. Alarmed, scared (see FRIGHTEN): timorous, *timid.

Ant. Unafraid: sanguine — Con. *Cool, composed, imperturbable, collected: *confident, assured, sure.

afresh. Anew, *again, encore, anon.

aft. *Aft, astern.

Ana. *After, behind: rear, back, *posterior, hind.

Ant. Fore. — Con. *Before, afore, ahead, forward.

after, prep., adj., adv. After, behind are synonymous adverbs, prepositions, and adjectives when they mean following upon, especially in place or in time. They are rarely interchangeable, however, without a loss of precision. With reference to place, after usually implies order of movement or sequence, and characteristically goes with verbs or nouns implying motion; as, the faculty marched in pairs, one after another. So used, after not only conveys no suggestion of precedence in order of following, but it may, by stressing pursuit, even obscure its common implication of succession; thus, to run after a person is to attempt to overtake him. When, as often happens, after is used with verbs of rest, the implication of movement or sequence is rarely lost but, rather, is transferred to the object or is to be gathered from the context; thus, one stays after the others (who have left); one calls after a person (who is walking ahead); one looks after the children of a friend (who is away, ill, or the like). In the same connection, behind characteristically implies a position at the back of something at rest; as, the chair is behind the door; the men seated themselves behind the women; the garden is behind the house. When, however, the reference is to something moving, behind usually adds the implications of delay, lagging, or immobility; thus, to run behind another is to be outstripped; to be left behind is to be outstripped or to remain when others have departed.

With reference to time, after is in far more frequent use than behind and is the required choice when only subsequence is implied; as, who ruled after James I?; after one o'clock, no one may leave the room. When behind is used in this connection, it usually implies a time when someone or something is due according to a schedule, a system, a normal order of progression, or the like. Consequently it implies variously lateness, backwardness, falling in arrears, etc.; as, you are two hours behind; she is behind her years; to get behind financially.

Ana. *Abaft, aft, astern.

Ant. Before. — Con. Forward, ahead, afore (see BEFORE).

after, adj. Hinder, hind, rear, *posterior, back.

Con. *Preceding, antecedent, prior.

aftereffect. *Effect, consequence, result, aftermath, sequel, outcome, upshot, issue, event.

aftermath. Sequel, consequence, result, aftereffect, *effect, issue, outcome, upshot, event.

again. Again, anew, afresh, anon, encore agree in meaning once more or another time. In ordinary use, again adds nothing to this definition; as, tell him again. "I shall not look upon his like again" (Shak.). It so strongly implies repetition, however, that phrases such as "again and again," "over and again," mean repeatedly or continually, especially at intervals. Sometimes, again implies return, as in response or reaction; as, he is himself again. "No mystery at all: you loved, Were loved again" (Browning). Anew and afresh both imply repetition without loss of vitality, energy, freshness, or the like. Anew often suggests a new form or fashion; as, to begin life anew. "As one defeated batsman after another . . . sank into his deck-chair, I deplored anew the absence of national pride" (E. V. Lucas). Afresh usually connotes a revival of interest, energy, or the like. "In The Moonstone these devices succeed, every time, in stimulating our interest afresh" (T. S. Eliot). "Packed up her slender belongings and sought for employment afresh" (Kipling). Anon is a synonym of again only in certain collocations such as "ever and anon" (which approaches "again and again" but often suggests less regularity in repetition) or as the second in a pair of correlatives, such as now . . . anon, or sometimes . . . anon. "Came ever and anon a breath-like sound" (Wordsworth). "On hill sometimes, anon in shady vale" (Milton). Encore, which is French for again, is used in English as an interjection, especially as a call to a singer, an instrumentalist, or the like, to repeat his performance.

against. Against, versus, con agree in meaning in opposition to (something). Against is the most widely applicable of these terms, for it may indicate opposition of any sort, such as contrariety, incompatibility, conflict, hostility, competition, counteractivity, etc.; as, your conclusion is against reason; action against the law; man against nature; one's reason against one's desires; speakers for and against a proposal; to swim against a current; to play against a stronger team. Versus (often used in abbreviated form v. or vs.) usually implies personal opposition, as between parties to a lawsuit or teams in a match or contest; as, the suit of Brown versus Jones; the Cubs versus the Giants; it may, however, be used in reference to alternative policies, methods, solutions, etc., set up for consideration; as, preparedness versus disarmament. Con (which occurs chiefly as an adverb equaling a prepositional phrase of which the object is suppressed) is seldom, if ever, used without its correlative pro (in favor of). It implies opposition in argument, or support of the negative side; as, they argued the measure pro and con.

Ant. For.

age, n. 1 Age, senility, senescence, senilism, dotage are comparable when they denote the period in one's life when one is old in years and declining physically or mentally (or both). Age is now usually replaced by old age except in literary use. "Age cannot wither her" (Shak.). "A youth of labour with an age of ease" (Goldsmith). "Age, I make light of it, Fear not the sight of it" (T. W. Higginson). Senility adds to age the implication of decay, especially of mental decay. "A rheumy old man, crumpled together . . . his mind gone down the road to senility" (E. M. Roberts). Senescence designates the period or the process of the decline which results in senility or old age; it is in the life of the individual the antithesis of youth or adolescence; senilism is the medical term for premature senescence or senility. Dotage, even more than senility, implies childishness or imbecility and thus indirectly heightens the suggestion of extreme old age. "Old Daniel begins; he stops short—and his eye, Through the lost look of dotage, is cunning and sly" (Wordsworth).

Ant. Youth.

2 Age, majority are synonymous when they denote the time of life when one attains one's full civil rights and becomes independent of guardianship. Age, in this sense, is to be found chiefly in idiomatic expressions such as to come of age; he is under age (or, not yet of age). In other contexts, full age or legal age is the usual designation. In most English-speaking countries this age is fixed by common law for both men and women at twenty-one years, but in some States of the United States full age is fixed for women at eighteen years. In many other countries twenty-five years is the accepted full age. Majority is the customary legal term for the status of one who is of age; as, he will attain his majority next year.

Ant. Nonage. — Con. *Infancy, minority.

3 *Period, era, epoch, aeon.

age, v. *Mature, ripen, develop.

aged. Aged, old, elderly, superannuated, when applied to persons, agree in meaning far advanced in years. Aged implies extreme old age with signs of feebleness or, sometimes, senility. "The aged creature came, shuffling along with ivory-headed wand" (Keats). Old stresses the years of one's life, but in itself carries no connotations of marked decline. "A man, old, wrinkled, faded, wither'd" (Shak.). Elderly implies that the prime of life has been passed. "When you see me again I shall be an old man—that was a slip, I meant to say 'elderly'" (J. R. Lowell). Superannuated indicates that one has been retired or pensioned because of having reached a certain age (varying in different callings); as, superannuated teachers; superannuated judges. Sometimes the word implies merely that one has passed the years of usefulness, and so by extension it is applied to things as well as to persons.

Ana. *Senile, doting, doddering: infirm, feeble, decrepit (see WEAK).

Ant. Youthful. — Con. Juvenile, puerile, boyish, virgin, virginal, maiden (see YOUTHFUL).

agelong. *Secular, centuried, aeonian, diuturnal.

Ana. Perpetual, constant, *continual, continuous: enduring, abiding, lasting, persisting (see CONTINUE).

Ant. Short-lived: momentary. — Con. *Transient, ephemeral, fleeting, evanescent, transitory, passing: *brief, short: *temporary, temporal.

agency. *Means, agent, instrumentality, instrument, medium, vehicle, channel, organ.

Ana. *Cause, determinant, antecedent: operation, action, working (see corresponding verbs at ACT): activity (see corresponding adjective ACTIVE): machinery, apparatus, gear, *equipment.

agenda. *Program, schedule, timetable.

agent, n. 1 *Means, instrument, agency, instrumentality, medium, vehicle, organ, channel.

Ana. Actor, operator, worker (see corresponding verbs at ACT): activator, energizer (see corresponding verbs at VITALIZE): performer, executor or executive (see corresponding verbs at PERFORM).

Ant. Patient.

2 Agent, factor, attorney, deputy, proxy are here compared mainly in their general senses, in which they agree in meaning one who performs the duties of or transacts business for another, but with some reference to their differences in specific application. Agent is very general and may be used to express this idea in any context where a specific term is not required; distinctively, however, it often implies the activity of a go-between; as, ambassadors, ministers, emissaries, nuncios are diplomatic agents of their governments or sovereigns. "The heads of departments are the political or confidential agents of the executive" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "Let every eye negotiate for itself And trust no agent" (Shak.). Factor was once a near equivalent of agent, differing from it chiefly in implying delegated authority to act. "Some . . . of us . . . have mingled sums To buy a present for the emperor; Which I, the factor for the rest, have done In France" (Shak.). In present use factor is chiefly employed as a designation for a landlord's agent (see STEWARD) or for a commission merchant on a large scale who is delegated either to buy or to sell for his clients; as, a wool factor; a flour factor. It is also used specifically to name the official in charge of one of the Hudson's Bay Company's trading posts. Attorney, now chiefly used as a designation for a professional legal agent (see LAWYER), once was applied to one who performed the personal offices of another who was absent, incapacitated, or unqualified for the work "I will attend my husband, be his nurse . . . for it is my office, And will have no attorney but myself" (Shak.). This sense still survives in English but in a narrower application to a person legally delegated to transact certain specified business for another who is absent or otherwise disqualified. Such a person is often called (in distinction from an attorney at law) a "private attorney" or an "attorney in fact," and the power delegated him is called "power of attorney." Deputy always implies the delegation of some or all of the powers of a superior, such as a sovereign, a chief executive in a department of government, or the like. Almost always, also, it connotes responsibility to the person whose powers are deputed, rather than to the state, the people, or the like; thus, the governor general of Canada or Australia may appoint deputies to exercise his powers or functions locally or temporarily; a vicar general is a deputy of a bishop. Proxy implies a substitution of persons when a promise or pledge is solemnly made or a vote, as at a stockholders' meeting, is to be cast. In a marriage service, a proxy for the bride or groom, or in the baptismal service, a proxy for a godparent, merely utters the promises in the name of the absent person, the latter assuming the obligation of fulfilling them.

Ant. Principal: ordinary (in ecclesiastical use).

3 Oeconomus, factor, *steward, reeve, seneschal, majordomo.

Ant. Lord: master.

agglomerate or agglomeration. Conglomerate, conglomeration, *aggregate, aggregation.

Ana. Combination, association (see corresponding verbs at JOIN): accumulation (see corresponding verb ACCUMULATE): *heap, pile, mass.

agglutinate, v. *Cement, glue.

Ana. Cohere, *stick, adhere, cling.

Con. *Separate, part, divide.

aggrandize. *Exalt, magnify.

Ana. Heighten, enhance, aggravate, *intensify: elevate, raise, *lift, boost.

Ant. Belittle. — Con. Minimize, depreciate, disparage, *decry, detract from, derogate from.

aggravate. 1 Heighten, *intensify, enhance.

Ana. Magnify, aggrandize (see EXALT): augment, *increase, multiply, enlarge.

Ant. Alleviate. — Con. Lighten, mitigate, allay (see RELIEVE): *palliate, extenuate: lessen, reduce, diminish, abate (see DECREASE).

2 Exasperate, *irritate, provoke, rouse, peeve, nettle

Ana. Perturb, upset, disturb (see DISCOMPOSE): vex, irk, *annoy: *anger, incense, infuriate.

Ant. Appease. — Con. *Pacify, placate, mollify: tranquilize, calm (see corresponding adjectives at CALM).

aggregate, n. 1 *Sum, total, whole, number, amount, quantity.

Ant. Individual: particular.

2 Aggregate, aggregation, conglomerate, conglomeration, agglomerate, agglomeration agree in denoting a mass formed by parts or particles that are not merged into each other. Aggregate and aggregation always imply the formation of a whole but without the blending or the organic union of its constituents; thus, sandstone is a natural aggregate of several minerals such as quartz and feldspar; concrete is an artificial aggregate consisting of crushed rock, sand, and cement. "We have no communities Our villages even are apt, rather, to be aggregations" (Brownell). Conglomerate and conglomeration emphasize the heterogeneity of the components and often suggest their assemblage from a wide variety of sources; sometimes either is applied to a heap of things, sometimes to an aggregate in which the parts are clearly distinguishable. "Pantheism is generally a conglomerate of animism, poetical fancy, and mysticism" (Inge). "That conglomeration of men we call a nation" (H. P. Liddon). Agglomerate and agglomeration in general use seldom imply coherence of parts; they suggest either a huddling together or, more often, a fortuitous association. "A mere agglomeration of different races, without national unity, national aims" (W. H. Page). In geology, agglomerate designates a rock aggregate composed of irregularly shaped fragments scattered by volcanic explosions as distinguished from conglomerate, an aggregate composed of rounded, waterworn stones.

Ana. Union, *unity, integrity: unification, consolidation (see corresponding verbs at COMPACT): complex, *system, organism, network.

Ant. Constituent.

aggregation. *Aggregate, conglomerate, conglomeration, agglomerate, agglomeration.

aggression. *Attack, offense, offensive.

Ana. *Invasion, incursion, irruption, raid, inroad.

Ant. Resistance.

aggressive. 1 Attacking, offensive. See primitive nouns at ATTACK.

Ana. Invading, encroaching, trespassing. See IRESPASS, v.

Ant. Resisting: repelling.

2 Aggressive, militant, assertive, self-assertive, pushing are here compared as applied to persons, their dispositions, their acts, and the like, and as meaning conspicuously or obtrusively active or energetic. Aggressive implies a disposition to assume or maintain leadership or domination, sometimes by bullying, sometimes by indifference to others' rights, but more often, in current use, by self-confident and forceful prosecution of one's ends. "The captain [spoke] in . . . an aggressive tone" (Conrad). "To protect themselves against a too aggressive prosecution of the women's business" (Shaw). "If a man is wanted for any kind of job—mayor, floor-walker, professor, or secretary of a peace conference—he must be 'aggressive'" (Grandgent). Militant, like aggressive, implies a fighting disposition, but unlike it, seldom conveys a suggestion of self-seeking. In modern nontechnical use, militant usually implies extreme devotion to some cause, movement, or institution, and energetic and, often, self-sacrificing prosecution of its ends; as, militant feminists; a militant church or churchman. "The cause of reform slowly went on gaining adherents—most of them . . . of the acquiescent rather than the militant type" (Grandgent). Assertive stresses self-confidence and boldness in action or, especially, in the expression of one's opinions. It often implies a determined attempt to make oneself or one's influence felt. "Somewhat too diffident, not assertive enough" (Bennett). "The soap maker, an assertive positive man" (S. Anderson). Self-assertive usually adds to assertive the implication of bumpiness or undue forwardness; as, self-assertiveness is incompatible with co-operativeness. Pushing, when used without any intent to depreciate, comes very close to aggressive in the current sense of the latter; however, the word is more commonly a derogatory epithet and implies, variously, officiousness, social climbing, or offensive intrusiveness. "Mrs Erynnne, a pushing nobody" (Wilde). "An energetic, pushing youth, already intent on getting on in the world" (S. Anderson). Ana. Energetic, strenuous, *vigorous. *masterful, domineering, imperious: fighting, combating or combative (see corresponding nouns at CONTEST).

aggrieve. *Wrong, oppress, persecute.

Ana. *Afflict, try, torment: harass, harry, plague, annoy, *worry: *injure, hurt, harm.

Ant. Rejoice. — Con. Gladden, delight, *please: *benefit, profit.

aghost. *Afraid, afeard.

Ana. Appalled, horrified (see DISMAY, v): terrified, startled, frightened (see FRIGHTEN): astounded, amazed (see SURPRISE, v).

Ant. Unmoved: apathetic. — Con. *Impassive, stolid, phlegmatic.

agile. Agile, nimble, brisk, spry agree in meaning acting or moving with quickness and alacrity. Agile implies dexterity and ease in the management of one's limbs or, by extension, one's wits; as, agile as a monkey. "Managing their spears with incredible agility" (Evelyn). "A development . . . of thought which requires considerable agility on the part of the reader" (T. S. Eliot). Nimble suggests surpassing lightness and swiftness of movement or action, and often implies a darting here and there; as, nimble as a squirrel; "Madame Defarge knitted with nimble fingers" (Dickens). "She ran ahead of his thoughts like nimble fire" (Meredith). Brisk implies liveliness, animation, or vigor of movement; as, a brisk canter; a brisk walking pace. "To have brisk and intelligent talk" (A. C. Benson). "Brisk and lively rhythm" (A. Huxley). It is sometimes applied to things that do not move, but are invigorating, exhilarating, or the like; as, a brisk day; a brisk reply. "She walked briskly in the brisk air" (G. Eliot). Spry (more colloquial than the others) stresses alacrity arising from vigor or health; it, however, is frequently applied to those from whom alacrity or briskness of movement is not to be expected; as, the old lady is as spry as a cricket; she is down one day, and up and spry the next.

Ana. *Dexterous, adroit, deft, feat: quick, fleet, speedy (see FAST): limber, lithesome, *supple: *lively, sprightly.

Ant. Torpid. — Con. *Lethargic, sluggish, comatose, stuporous: inert, *inactive, passive, supine.

agitate. 1 *Shake, rock, convulse.

Ana. *Stir, rouse, arouse: *move, actuate, drive, impel.

Ant. Quiet, lull, still.

2 Perturb, *discompose, upset, fluster, flurry, disturb, disquiet.

Ana. *Irritate, provoke, roil, exasperate, peeve: *worry, harass, plague: *annoy, vex, irk, bother.

Ant. Calm, tranquilize. — Con. *Pacify, placate, appease, mollify.

3 Argue, dispute, debate, *discuss.

Ana. Controvert (see DISPROVE): assail, *attack: revolve, *consider: air, ventilate, broach (see EXPRESS).

agnation. Consanguinity, cognation, enation, *kinship, affinity.

agnostic, n. 1 *Atheist, deist, freethinker, unbeliever, infidel.

2 Skeptic (see corresponding adjective SKEPTIC).

agnosticism. Skepticism (see under SKEPTIC, adj).

ago. *Since.

agog. A-tiptoe, *eager, keen, anxious, avid, athirst.

Ana. Excited, galvanized, stimulated (see PROVOKE): roused, aroused, stirred (see STIR, v): *impatient, restive, feverish, hectic.

Ant. Aloof. — Con. *Indifferent, unconcerned, incurious, detached: uninterested, *disinterested.

agonize. *Writhe, squirm.

Ana. Suffer, endure, *bear: torment, rack, torture, *afflict.

agonizing. *Excruciating, racking.

Ana. Torturing, tormenting, racking (see AFFLICT): *intense, vehement.

Con. *Comfortable, easy, restful, reposeful: comforting, solacing, consoling (see COMFORT).

agony. Suffering, passion, *distress, misery, dolor.

Ana. Pang, throe, ache, *pain, twinge: *trial, tribulation, affliction, visitation.

Con. *Rest, repose, ease, comfort: solace, consolation (see corresponding verbs at COMFORT): relief, assuagement, mitigation (see corresponding verbs at RELIEVE).

agrarian. Agrarian, agricultural are sometimes confused because they carry common implications and are used to qualify like terms; as, an agrarian or an agricultural society; an agrarian or an agricultural crisis; an agrarian or an agricultural policy. Both terms have reference to land, the conditions under which it is held, and its profitable use. Agrarian, however, stresses the economic or political issues involved in the ownership of land, in the conditions of tenancy, and in the right of the individual to the profits of his labor on the land; agricultural stresses rather the successful and profitable use of land for the production of crops and the breeding of animals; thus, agrarian crises were frequent in Ireland in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries when the issue of tenant rights became acute; agricultural crises are likely to occur when overproduction and a restriction of markets coincide. When, however, agricultural interests are at stake and political action is held to be necessary, a party formed to promote these ends may be called an agrarian rather than an agricultural party, and a measure advocated an agrarian rather than an agricultural measure.

agree. 1 *Assent, accede, consent, acquiesce, subscribe.
Ana. *Grant, concede, allow: accept, *receive: admit, *acknowledge.

Ant. Protest (against): differ (with). — Con. *Object, kick, expostulate, remonstrate: *demur, balk, jib: *oppose, resist, withstand.

2 Agree, concur, coincide are comparable when they mean to come into, or to be in, harmony regarding a matter of opinion, a policy, or the like. Agree implies unison in thought or a complete accord: even if the context suggests previous discussion, the word usually indicates that argument is ended; as, this is a point upon which all persons agree. "If two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done" (Matthew xviii. 19). Concur usually implies reference to a specific or definite agreement, particularly one arrived at by a vote or expression of opinion and made the basis of future action, the starting point of a discussion, or the like. "I will presume that Mr. Murry and myself can agree that for our purpose these counters [terms] are adequate, and concur in disregarding [objections to them]" (T. S. Eliot). Coincide implies an agreement amounting to complete identity of opinion. Only occasionally, however, in current use do persons coincide; more frequently opinions, judgments, wishes, and the like coincide. "Whether we coincide or not in this doctrine" (Lyell). "I had hoped that our sentiments coincided" (Austen). More often, especially in current use, coincide implies an agreement in time of occurrence (far less often an agreement in place occupied) and therefore frequently stresses synchronousness of events; as, the fall of Granada and the discovery of America coincided (see coincident under CONTEMPORARY).

Ana. *Unite, co-operate: conspire, collude (see CONNIVE).

Ant. Differ: disagree. — Con. *Contend, fight, battle: dispute, argue, debate (see DISCUSS): quarrel, wrangle, squabble, bicker (see under QUARREL, n.).

3 Agree, square, conform, accord, comport, harmonize, correspond, tally, jibe (or gibe) come into comparison when they mean to exist or go together without conflict or incongruity. One thing agrees with another when their comparison or association reveals no discrepancy, no inequality, no untoward effects, or the like; as, the conclusion agrees with the evidence; the two accounts agree in every particular; pronouns must agree with their antecedents in person, number, and gender; the climate does not agree with him. One thing squares with another when there is exact, almost mathematically exact, agreement between the two; as, to force facts to square with one's theory. "No works shall find acceptance . . . That square not truly with the Scripture plan" (Cowper). One thing conforms to or with another when there is likeness or agreement in form, in nature, or in essential character. "A rule to which experience must conform" (Whewell). "My views of conduct . . . conform with what seem to me the implications of my beliefs" (T. S. Eliot). One thing accords with another when there is perfect fitness in the relation or association as in character, spirit, quality, or tone; as, the speaker's remarks did not accord with the sentiments of those who listened to him. "False tints [of rouged women] too well accorded with the glare" (Wordsworth). One thing comports with another when the former measures up to the standard set by the latter or when there is no obvious disparity between the two. In contrast with each other, accord usually stresses positive congruity; comport, lack of incongruity; as, manners that comport with one's social station. "How ill this dullness doth comport with greatness" (Beaumont & Fletcher). One thing harmonizes with another when, in spite of their real and, often, marked differences, their combination or juxtaposition produces an agreeable or aesthetic effect. "From the waves, sound . . . broke forth Harmonising with solitude" (Shelley). "With that luxuriant tropical nature, its green clouds and illusive aerial spaces . . . they [monkeys] harmonised well in language, appearance and motions" (Hudson). One thing corresponds to (or with) another when, however far apart or however close the two things may be, they belong together because they match each other, or complement each other, or answer to each other. Sometimes, correspond implies agreement; as, fulfillment seldom corresponds to anticipation. "I should never correspond to your pattern of a lady" (G. Eliot). Sometimes it implies an analogous relation; as, the bird's wing corresponds to the human arm. Sometimes it implies commensurateness. "Incomes do not always correspond with the efforts or skill that appear to be involved" (J. A. Hobson). One thing tallies with another when the correspondence is so close that they either, as in very discriminating use, complement each other or agree with each other. "Pain and pleasure no more tally in our sense than red and green" (Browning). Jibe is a colloquial word much used in the United States as equivalent to agree, or sometimes to harmonize, and sometimes to accord; as, his actions do not jibe with his words.

Ant. Differ (from). — Con. Negative, counteract, *neutralize: negate, *nullify.

agreeable. Grateful, pleasing, *pleasant, gratifying, welcome.

Ana. *Comfortable, easy, restful, reposeful: *delightful, delectable: attractive, charming, alluring (see under ATTRACT).

Ant. Disagreeable. — Con. *Repugnant, repellent, obnoxious, distasteful: *hateful, abhorrent, abominable, odious: *offensive, loathsome, repulsive.

agreement. Agreement, accord, understanding are here compared in their political and legal uses. They agree in designating a settlement reached by parties to a dispute or engaged in negotiations. All these terms imply concurrence as to what should be done or not done; all imply reconciliation of differences. Agreement is the most positive word; it usually implies a final settlement of terms. An agreement may or may not be put into writing, as in the form of a contract, concordat, or treaty; it may or may not be accompanied by a consideration. In English law, it is not legally binding until it is in writing or is accompanied by a consideration. An accord is, in controversies between governments, an informal agreement; use of this term often implies that all details have not yet been settled or that the terms of the agreement are not yet ready for publication, but that the conditions necessary to a final agreement have been fulfilled. In law, an accord is an agreement between the parties concerned in a case where satisfaction for an injury is demanded. The execution of such an accord bars further litigation. An understanding is the least binding of accepted settlements. If the term is used to denote the final stage in a negotiation or in settlement of a dispute, it implies the existence of definite engagements or the exchange of promises, and dependence on the honor of the parties to the agreement for the keeping of such engagements or promises.

Ana. Pact, entente, concordat, convention, cartel (see CONTRACT).

agrestic. Rustic, bucolic, geponic, georgic, *rural, pastoral, Arcadian.

agricultural. *Agrarian.

agriculture. Agriculture, farming, husbandry agree in meaning the science or the business of raising plants and animals useful to man. Agriculture is by far the most comprehensive of these terms; in common with farming and husbandry, it implies the cultivation of the soil, the production and harvesting of crops, the care and breeding of livestock; it includes in addition other pursuits that may or may not be connected with farming and husbandry, such as horticulture, forestry, dairying, sugar making, beekeeping, and the like; specifically it stresses knowledge of the chemical constituents of soils in relation to crop production (agrology), the scientific management of soil so as to promote crop production (agronomy), and the conversion of farm products such as milk, hides, etc., into manufactured products, on the farm or in close relation to it (agrotechny). Farming, the term in common use, has never lost its emphasis on land devoted to the production of crops or animals for the market; it may imply small or extensive holdings, but it usually suggests the inclusion of tilled land bearing crops, of pasture land for cattle, of meadowland for hay, and the like. Husbandry, an old English word seldom used in this sense outside of the British Isles except in a literary context, usually suggests small holdings, and production for the use of a household or community rather than for a distant market. It often suggests more varied employments than farming, such as dairying, beekeeping, etc., and it often, in general use, denotes management of one's affairs, especially with respect to thrift (as, good husbandry; bad husbandry).

Con. *Comfort, solace, console: *relieve, assuage, alleviate, mitigate.

ailment. Affection, malady, *disease, complaint, distemper.

aim, v. 1 Point, *direct, level, train, lay.

Ana. Turn, bend, *curve, twist.

2 Aim, aspire, pant often convey the same meaning, to have as a controlling desire something beyond one's present power of attainment. Aim stresses a clearly defined end toward which one's efforts are directed or which one holds before one as a goal to be reached through endeavor or striving. "Men aiming to advance in life with glory" (Hardy). "Christianity aims at nothing less than absolute truth" (Inge). "Get honour, and keep honour free from flaw, Aim at still higher honour" (Browning). Aspire, especially when followed by an infinitive, often adds little to aim except the suggestion of ambition. "Those who do not aspire to be scholars" (S. M. Crothers). "Aspiring to be the leader of a nation of third-rate men" (Mencken). However, when used with a sense of its distinctive values, it implies urgency of longing for something that is high, often too high for attainment. "Since first my thirsting soul aspired to know The secrets of their wondrous world" (Shelley). "What I aspired to be, And was not, comforts me: A brute I might have been, but would not sink i' the scale" (Browning). Pant comes into comparison with the other words only in its extended sense of Biblical origin. "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God" (Psalms xlii. 1). Even more than aspire it stresses the fervor of the desire and the remoteness of that which is desired. Sometimes it connotes urgent unsatisfied thirst. "More happy, happy love! For ever warm and still to be enjoy'd, For ever panting, and for ever young" (Keats). Sometimes, especially in modern use, it suggests not the gasps of one thirsting, but of one toiling upward. "[The] Brave, and Good, and Wise, For their high guerdon not in vain have panted!" (Wordsworth).

Ana. *Intend, purpose, propose, design: *attempt, essay, endeavor, try.

aim, n. End, goal, objective, purpose, *intention, object, intent, design.

Ana. Aspiration, *ambition: *effort, exertion, pains, trouble.

air, n. 1 Air, atmosphere, ether, ozone. Air, the ordinary term, designates the invisible mixture of gases which surrounds the earth. More narrowly, it denotes an impalpable respirable substance essential to life (as, the air we breathe), or that substance mixed with or contaminated by other substances (as, perfumed air; smoky air), or that substance regarded as the medium which transmits sound or through which birds and the like fly. Atmosphere designates the layers of air which form the envelope of the earth or a similar gaseous envelope of any celestial body; as, the atmosphere of Mars; more loosely, it is applied to the portion of air which permeates a particular place; as, the heated atmosphere of a room. Ether, except in its technical senses a rhetorical word, usually suggests either more rarefied air than that found in the earth's immediate atmosphere or an element like air, but far more delicate or subtle, which fills the upper regions or interstellar space. In physics, ether designates a hypothetical medium for the transmission of transverse waves which is characterized by continuity and extreme tenuity and which permeates all space, even intra-atomic space. Ozone is strictly a form of oxygen obtained not only from the upper levels of the air but from other sources, and used commercially as a sterilizer, a purifier, and a bleach. In popular use, it is applied to air that is markedly pure and has a pungent refreshing odor.

2 *Pose, affectation, mannerism.

Ana. Mien, manner, *bearing, port, presence, front: ostentation, pomp, pretentiousness, show (see corresponding adjectives at SHOWY): *art, artifice, craft.

3 *Melody, air, tune.

air, v. Ventilate, vent, utter, voice, *express, broach.

Ana. *Reveal, disclose, divulge, tell, discover: publish, proclaim, broadcast, *declare.

Con. *Hide, conceal: *suppress, repress.

airport. Airport, airdrome (or aerodrome, aërodrome), air field, flying field, landing field denote a place where aircraft may land in safety. Airport implies a well-marked and lighted place, either on land or water, providing facilities for sheltering passengers, handling cargo, supplying fuel, making repairs, and housing aircraft. Airdrome (or, Brit., aerodrome) is practically synonymous with airport and is being replaced by it. Air field in strict usage is applied only to the part of an airport where aircraft land or take off. A flying field is a field with a graded portion for taking off and landing, and an area free of tall trees and other obstructions, for flying operations, often involving the instruction of pilots. A landing field is merely one of the level fields suitable for landings, spaced at regular intervals along an airway and often provided with special lights.

airship. *Aerostat, dirigible, zeppelin, blimp, balloon.

airy. Airy, aerial (or aërial), ethereal are here compared in their figurative senses. Though all three mean as light and insubstantial as air, they are distinguishable in discriminating use. Airy seldom suggests a transcendent quality; in its widest sense it implies little more than immateriality. "The poet's pen . . . gives to airy nothing a local habitation and a name" (Shak.). When applied to persons, their words, their manners, it often, in colloquial use, implies affectation of grandeur, or "putting on airs"; as, as her airiness increased, her admirers decreased: in better established English it implies merely an affectation of nonchalance. " 'It is all the same,' said the spy, airily, but discomfited too" (Dickens). When applied to motion or to movements it suggests buoyancy. "E'en the slight harebell raised its head, Elastic from her airy tread" (Scott). Aerial, in its figurative sense, is now found chiefly in poetry. In discriminating use, it commonly connotes impalpability, extraordinary delicacy, or elusiveness, and is applied to things rather than to persons. "Mountains . . . fair of aspect, with aerial softness clad" (Wordsworth). "The aërial hue Of fountain-gazing roses" (Shelley). "Fine and aerial distinctions" (Milman). Ethereal, as in its primary sense, implies not the atmosphere surrounding the earth, but the rarefied air once believed to fill the heavenly regions. Hence, it almost invariably imputes a celestial or supramundane character to the person or thing it qualifies. Sometimes it suggests an unearthly translucency. "Fire . . . without heat, flickering a red gold flame . . . ethereal and insubstantial" (V. Woolf). "[hair] So . . . ethereal in appearance with its cloud colours, that . . . even . . . the most beautiful golden shades . . . seemed heavy and dull and dead-looking by comparison" (Hudson). Sometimes, especially when referred to persons, their words, or their thoughts, it suggests disembodied spirit or apartness from material interests; as, the ethereal quality of Shelley's poetry. "At times he [Joubert] tends to fall into excessive subtlety, to be too vaporous and ethereal" (Babbitt).

Ana. Tenuous, rare, *thin: delicate, dainty, exquisite (see CHOICE): light, volatile, frivolous (see corresponding nouns at LIGHTNESS).

Ant. Substantial. — Con. *Massive, massy, bulky, monumental: *material, corporeal, physical: solid, hard, *firm.

aisle. *Passage, passageway, ambulatory, corridor.

akin. *Similar, alike, like, analogous, comparable, parallel, homogeneous, uniform, identical.

Ana. *Related, kindred, cognate, allied: corresponding, agreeing, harmonizing, according, conforming (see AGREE).

Ant. Alien. — Con. Foreign, extraneous (see EXTRINSIC): divergent, disparate, *different.

alacrity. *Celerity, legerity.

Ana. Eagerness, avidity, anxiety (see corresponding adjectives at EAGER): quickness, promptness, readiness (see corresponding adjectives at QUICK): agility, nimbleness, briskness (see corresponding adjectives at AGILE): expedition, dispatch, *haste.

Ant. Languor. — Con. *Lethargy, torpidity, stupor: impassiveness, apathy, stolidity (see under IMPASSIVE):

indifference, unconcern, aloofness (see corresponding adjectives at INDIFFERENT).

alarm, n. 1 Alarm, alarum, tocsin, alert agree in meaning a signal that serves as a call to action or to be on guard, especially in a time of imminent danger. Alarm, once specifically a call to arms, is now used of any signal that arouses to activity not only troops, but firemen, policemen, workers, or the like; it always suggests a sound such as a cry or cries, a peal or pealing of a bell, a beating of drums, or a siren; as, to sound a fire alarm; the dog's barking gave the alarm. "Better dwell in the midst of alarms, Than reign in this horrible place" (Cowper). Alarum, a variant of alarm, is now chiefly archaic or poetic, except in its occasional application to the mechanism or apparatus that sounds an alarm. Tocsin is either an alarm sounded by bells, usually from the belfry of a church, or, more often, the bell or bells sounding an alarm. "The loud tocsin tolled their last alarm" (Campbell). Alert, a military term for a signal to be on guard and ready for an attack, is now chiefly used of a warning, as by a siren, of an imminent gas or bomb attack and serves as an order to equip oneself with a gas mask; as, to sound an alert.

2 *Fright, fear, panic, terror, horror, dismay, dread, consternation, trepidation.

Ana. Frightening, scaring, startling (see FRIGHTEN): agitation, perturbation, upset (see corresponding verbs at DISCOMPOSE).

Ant. Assurance: composure. — Con. Calmness, tranquillity, serenity (see corresponding adjectives at CALM): self-possession, self-assurance (see CONFIDENCE): *equanimity, sang-froid.

alarm, v. *Frighten, fright, scare, startle, terrify, affright, terrorize, affray.

Ana. Appall, daunt, horrify, *dismay: *surprise, astound, amaze, astonish.

Ant. Assure. relieve. — Con. *Comfort, solace, console.

alarum. *Alarm, tocsin, alert.

albeit. Although, *though.

alchemy. *Magic, thaumaturgy, wizardry, sorcery, witchery, witchcraft.

alcoholic, adj. Alcoholic, spirituous, ardent, hard, strong are comparable when they are used in reference to beverages and denote containing ethyl alcohol. Alcoholic, the most general of these terms, does not indicate the amount of alcohol present or whether it has been obtained by fermentation or by distillation; as, beer, wine, and whisky are alcoholic beverages. Spirituous signifies the presence of alcohol as the result of distillation and suggests a comparatively high proportion of it; as, brandy is a spirituous liquor distilled from wine. Ardent, now used only in the phrase ardent spirits, adds to spirituous the suggestion of the burning sensation experienced upon drinking beverages such as brandy, rum, whisky, having a high alcoholic content. Hard (in this meaning, an Americanism) also is very close to spirituous in meaning and is commonly used in the phrase hard liquor, which is distinguished from soft beverages and from light wines, beer, and other beverages of comparatively low alcoholic content. Hard cider is cider that has two to eight per cent of alcohol as the result of fermentation. Strong is sometimes equivalent to alcoholic; usually, however, it implies a comparatively high alcoholic content; as, strong beer, strong drink, strong liquor. Hard and strong are most suggestive of power to intoxicate.

alcoholic, n. *Drunkard, inebriate, dipsomaniac, sot, soak, toper, tosspot, tippler.

alcove. *Recess, nook, cubicle, carrel, carol, embrasure, bay, niche.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

ale. *Beer, stout, porter, lager, bock.

alert, adj. 1 *Watchful, wide-awake, vigilant.

Ana. *Agile, nimble, brisk: wary, circumspect, *cautious.

Ant. Supine. — Con. Heedless, *careless: unconcerned, aloof, detached, *indifferent.

2 Clever, *intelligent, smart, bright, quick-witted, brilliant, knowing.

Ana. *Sharp, keen, acute: *quick, ready, prompt, apt: *shrewd, perspicacious.

Ant. Slow (mentally). — Con. *Languid, lackadaisical, listless: *lethargic, sluggish: *stupid, dull, dense.

alert, n. *Alarm, alarum, tocsin.

alfresco. *Outdoor, open-air, plein-air.

alias, n. *Pseudonym, nom de guerre, allonym, incognito, nom de plume, pen name.

alibi, n. Excuse, pretext, plea, *apology, apologia.

Ana. Explanation, justification, rationalization (see corresponding verbs at EXPLAIN).

alien, adj. Foreign, extraneous, *extrinsic.

Ana. External, exterior, outside (see corresponding adjectives at OUTER): adventitious, incidental, *accidental: *repugnant, repellent, abhorrent: incompatible, incongruous, *inconsonant.

Ant. Akin: assimilable. — Con. *Relevant, material, pertinent, germane: compatible, *consonant, congruous, congenial: kindred, cognate, *related.

alien, v. Alienate, *transfer, convey, deed.

alien, n. Foreigner, *stranger, outlander, outsider, immigrant, émigré.

Ant. Citizen. — Con. Subject, national (see CITIZEN): native, aborigine (see under NATIVE, adj.).

alienate. 1 Alien, *transfer, convey, deed

2 *Estrange, disaffect, wean.

Ana. Convert, proselyte, proselytize (see corresponding nouns at CONVERT): *separate, part, sever, sunder, divorce.

Ant. Unite: reunite. — Con. Reconcile, conform, accommodate, adjust, *adapt: associate, link, *join.

alienation. Derangement, *aberration.

Ana. *Insanity, lunacy, mania, dementia: imbecility, idiocy, morosity (see primitive nouns at FOOL).

alienist. Psychiatrist, psychopathologist, *neurologist, psychotherapist, psychoanalyst.

alight, v. 1 *Descend, dismount.

Con. Mount, *ascend, scale, climb.

2 Alight, light, land, perch, roost come into comparison when they mean to come to rest after, or as after, a flight, a descent, or a fall. Alight suggests previous movement through the air or open space, as of a flying bird or a floating snowflake; as, skylarks alight on the ground. "The sun paused ere it should alight" (Shelley). Light, sometimes the equivalent of alight, more often presupposes a falling or jumping than flying or floating, and sometimes merely a wandering or roving; as, he sprang from the roof and lighted on his feet; her eyes finally lighted on the object of her search. Sometimes it implies random or chance hitting or meeting. "You could not light upon a sweeter thing" (Tennyson). Land, as here considered, derives its implications from its literal application to a boat docking or an airplane grounding. Though often used interchangeably with light, it is distinguishable in precise use, where it connotes arrival at a destination, and sometimes, though not invariably, driving force or power; as, the airplane landed in a swamp; he fell headlong and landed on his face; his blow landed in the spot he aimed at; he has landed where he hoped, in an executive position. Perch and roost, in literal use, imply alighting of birds, but perch suggests settling on something elevated to which the claws may cling, as a pole, a bar, or a twig; and roost, the settling for rest or sleep especially of domestic fowls on the perches and in the shelters prepared for them. Therefore, in extended use, perch often implies elevation of position and tenuousness of grasp or hold. "Twenty or more [rooks] perched aloft, cawing and conversing comfortably" (Jefferies). "A lofty perpendicular cliff . . . with a castle . . . perched on the distant top" (Lucas). Roost, when used of persons, often suggests a position like that of roosting fowls (as, boys roosting on the rail of a fence) or is a vulgar synonym for sleep or go to bed; as, it is time for all of us to roost (or go to roost).

Con. *Rise, arise, soar, ascend, rocket.

align or aline. *Line, range, array.

Ana. *Order, arrange, marshal: regulate, fix, *adjust.

Con. *Disorder, disarrange, derange, unsettle.

alike. Like, *similar, identical, homogeneous, uniform, akin, analogous, comparable, parallel.

Ana. *Same, selfsame, equivalent, identical.

Ant. Different. — Con. *Distinct, separate: *different, divergent, diverse, disparate, various.

aliment. *Food, pabulum, nutriment, nourishment, sustenance, pap.

Con. *Poison, venom, bane.

alive. 1 *Living, quick, animated, animate, vital.

Ana. *Active, dynamic, live, operative: *lively, vivacious, sprightly: being, existing (see BE).

Ant. Dead, defunct. — Con. Lifeless, inanimate, deceased (see DEAD): inert, *inactive: torpid, comatose (see LETHARGIC).

2 *Aware, awake, sensible, cognizant, conscious.

Ana. Alert, wideawake, vigilant, *watchful: *intelligent, knowing, quick-witted.

Ant. Blind (to): anesthetic (to). — Con. *Indifferent, unconcerned, aloof: insensitive, *insensible, impassible.

alkahest. *Solvent, dissolvent, resolvent, menstruum.

alkaline. Alkaline, basic are closely related but not synonymous terms that are often confused. Both terms are opposites or correlatives of the adjective acid, but alkaline suggests the characteristic properties of bases or alkalies, as neutralizing acids, turning litmus paper blue, etc.; as, alkaline taste, alkaline solution, alkaline earth. Basic pertains more directly to the bases themselves, implying their composition; as, basic salt, basic dye, basic rock. Sodium bicarbonate is an acid salt (the opposite of a basic salt) but it has an alkaline reaction because sodium hydroxide is a very strong base and carbonic acid is a very weak acid.

all, adj. 1 *Whole, entire, total, gross.

Ana. Complete, plenary, *full.

Ant. Part (of). — Con. *Some, any.

2 All, every, each, when applied to the individuals of a group, imply inclusion of the entire membership and admit no exceptions. All is applied to the aggregate of individuals and implies consideration of it as a unit without regard to the individuals as distinct persons or things; as, all men are mortal; all books are written to be read but not all books are worth reading. Every is applied to any of the individuals comprising the group, regarded not as a concrete person or thing, but as the type or representative of the entire membership; as, every man is mortal; every book that is published should be worth reading. Each is applied to any or every individual of the group, but unlike every it implies reference to him or to it as a distinct, recognizable, and, therefore, concrete person or thing; as, he knows each person in the society; each book on this shelf is worth reading; each person in this club must pay his share of the expense.

Ant. No.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

allay. *Relieve, alleviate, lighten, assuage, mitigate.

Ana. Abate, lessen, *decrease, diminish: mollify, *pacify, appease: *moderate, temper, attempter.

Ant. Intensify. — Con. *Provoke, excite, stimulate: *stir, rouse, arouse: aggravate, enhance (see INTENSIFY).

allée. Alley, mall, *avenue.

allege. *Adduce, cite, advance.

Ana. Affirm, *assert, declare, avouch, avow: *swear, asseverate, depose, depone: recite, recount, rehearse, state (see RELATE).

Ant. Contravene: (in law) traverse. — Con. *Deny, contradict, gainsay, negative, impugn: *disprove, refute, rebut, controvert.

allegiance. 1 Allegiance, homage, fealty are here compared primarily as terms referring to the relationship between a vassal and his lord. They are not synonymous words for they do not bear a common denotation. Allegiance originally denoted the duty or the obligation of a vassal to his lord or sovereign or the subject relationship which such an obligation entailed. It implied that in return for land and protection the vassal promised service in war and at court, obedience to the lord's will in certain matters, and fidelity. In modern use, allegiance has not changed its denotation except in regard to the status of the principals. Instead of "vassal" one now speaks of "subject" or "citizen," and instead of "lord" one speaks of "sovereign" or "government." Also, the subject or citizen, in general, owes obedience to the law and accepts the obligations to pay taxes and to render military service, when called upon, in return for the maintenance of order within the state and the protection of his rights as an individual at home and abroad. Homage (see also HONOR) designates the act or ceremony in which a vassal, on assuming tenancy, publicly declared his allegiance to his lord. Homage was done not only by the first to take possession but by each heir in his turn. Fealty (see also FIDELITY) primarily denotes the oath (sometimes called oath of fealty) taken by the vassal to be faithful to his lord. Like homage it was demanded not only of the first holder of a fief but of each succeeding one; the doing of homage was the first and the swearing of fealty was the second of the steps in the process of entering into the full possession of a fief.

2 Fealty, loyalty, *fidelity, devotion, piety.

Ana. Faithfulness, steadfastness, constancy, stanchness (see corresponding adjectives at FAITHFUL): obeisance, deference, homage, *honor: obedience (see corresponding adjective OBEY): *obligation, duty.

Ant. Treachery: treason. — Con. Traitorousness, perfidy, faithlessness, disloyalty (see corresponding adjectives at FAITHLESS): disaffection, alienation (see corresponding verbs at ESTRANGE).

allegorical. Allegorical, allegoristic tend to be clearly distinguished in modern scholarly use. Allegorical is preferable when the intent is to describe something as being (or as belonging to something that is) an allegory obviously and intentionally; as, an allegorical poem; allegorical characters; the allegorical meaning of Pilgrim's Progress. Allegoristic is preferable when the intent is to imply allegorizing, or the turning of a work into an allegory or the regarding of a thing as having allegorical significance but not allegorical intention; as, allegoristic interpretation of Scriptures; allegoristic criticism of Vergil's Aeneid; the allegoristic method of studying poetry; the allegoristic treatment of animals in the medieval bestiaries.

allegoristic. *Allegorical.

allegory. 1 Allegory, symbolism are here compared as designating methods of representation in art. Both characteristically aim to represent concretely that which is abstract or for some other reason unrepresentable. Alle- gory is applied to a form of representation found not only in literature but also in painting and sculpture, especially decorative painting and sculpture. It evokes a dual interest, one in the story, scene, or characters presented, and the other in the ideas they convey or the significance they bear; it demands not only aesthetic enjoyment but intellectual interpretation. The incidents, scenes, or characters may be historical or fictitious or fabulous, but if the artist has given that which is historical an added meaning or has invented his material to convey an idea or truth, he has employed allegory. Symbolism is applied to a form of representation used not only in literature, painting and sculpture but also in music, architecture, ceremonial, pageantry, and the like. It implies an attempt to represent that which by its very nature is incapable of representation because immaterial, ideal, or spiritual. Originally, symbolism denoted representation by an accepted sign or symbol (see SYMBOL, 2); thus, in painting and sculpture, the divinity of Jesus was represented by a nimbus enclosing a cross, and sainthood by a simple nimbus usually enclosing rays. In modern use, symbolism also implies artistic imitation and invention, not as an end in itself, but as a means of suggesting that which eludes representation or, sometimes, that which is not directly representable for some reason, such as defiance of the generally accepted moral code. Thus, a poet employs symbolism when his images, his rhythms, his words, evoke ideas or emotions that escape analysis; a painter employs symbolism when he uses arrangements of colors and of lines not to represent definite objects but to suggest something that is impalpable or intangible; a novelist or dramatist employs symbolism when his novel or play carries more than its surface meaning or offers hints of an underlying significance. Especially in literature, symbolism is not always clearly distinguishable from allegory. The latter term, however, implies organization and a pattern in which the characters, incidents, and setting serve as symbols.

2 Allegory, parable, myth, fable, apologue are here compared only as literary forms that typically tell a story for the sake of presenting a truth or of enforcing a moral. An allegory always veils its true meaning (its underlying, or allegorical, sense) by leaving that to be deduced from the story it tells (the outward, or literal, sense). Its characters and incidents are therefore either figurative or typical; they serve as a bait to the consideration of dull or unpleasant truths, as in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, or as a graded approach to the apprehension of ideas too difficult for the ordinary man, as in Dante's Divine Comedy, or as a cloak for an attack on persons or for an exposure of vices and follies, as in parts of Spenser's Faerie Queene. When the allegory is very short and simple and narrates or describes a familiar occurrence in nature or life that by analogy conveys a spiritual truth, it is called a parable. The term is specifically applied to the brief allegories used by Jesus in his sermons, such as the one likening the kingdom of heaven to the growth of a mustard seed. Myth (sometimes for the sake of distinction called Platonic myth) is applied to a type of brief allegory used especially by Plato in expounding a difficult philosophical conception. Such myths are, as a rule, invented and their characters and incidents are purely imaginary. In a fable or apologue (the latter the more bookish term) the moral is usually clearly stated at the end. Its characters are animals or inanimate things that by talking and acting as human beings reflect the weaknesses and follies of men.

allergy. *Susceptibility, hypersensitivity, anaphylaxis.

Ant. Immunity: anergy (in technical use).

alleviate. *Relieve, lighten, assuage, mitigate, allay.

A colon (:): groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ana. *Moderate, temper, attemper: lessen, reduce, diminish, *decrease: remedy, *cure.

Ant. Aggravate. — Con. *Intensify, heighten: *provoke, excite, stimulate: arouse, awaken, rouse, *stir.

alley. 1 Allée, mall, *avenue.

2 Alleyway, byway, lane, roadway, *road, street, thoroughfare.

alleyway. Alley, byway, lane, roadway, *road, street, thoroughfare.

alliance. Alliance, league, coalition, fusion, confederacy, confederation, federation agree in the idea of combination, chiefly political, for a common object. Alliance applies particularly to a joining of interests on the part of families (by marriage) or of states (by compact or treaty): it is also less formally used of a connection, for mutual benefit, between other bodies, organized or not; as, an alliance between two royal houses; a defensive alliance; the alliance between Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Rumania; an alliance between producers and consumers. League, often used without distinction from alliance, commonly suggests a more formal compact or more definite object, and may frequently (unlike alliance) be taken in a bad sense; as, the Solemn League and Covenant; to be in league with the powers of darkness. Coalition refers to a temporary alliance of otherwise opposing interests, parties, or factions; as, "Mr. Fox, and his famous coalition with Lord North" (Gibbon); a coalition ministry. Fusion is a coalition of political parties for the purpose of defeating another party in an election; as, a fusion of Republicans and independent Democrats in New York City opposed the Tammany Democratic ticket. Confederacy and confederation, in their political sense, apply specif. to a union by compact or treaty of independent states under a government to which powers are delegated for dealing primarily with common external relations; as, the Southern Confederacy; the Articles of Confederation; the German Confederation. Federation in its broad sense includes any union under the terms of a league or covenant; but specif. it designates a sovereign state, a city, etc., especially one formed by the union of other states, etc., with a central general government and several local governments; as, the Federation of Labor or of the British Empire; in the strictest sense, the United States of America constitutes a federation. "Federation was the name given to the scheme for blending the Five Towns into one town" (Bennett).

allied. *Related, cognate, kindred, affiliated.

Ana. Akin, homogeneous, parallel, *similar: linked, associated, united, connected (see JOIN): co-operating, uniting, conjoining (see UNITE).

Ant. Unallied. — Con. Alien, foreign, extraneous (see EXTRINSIC): *different, divergent, diverse, various, disparate.

alligator. *Crocodile, cayman.

allocate. *Allot, assign, apportion.

Ana. *Distribute, dispense, divide, deal, dole: *grant, accord, award.

Con. Withhold, detain, retain, hold back, *keep.

allocation. *Speech, address, sermon, oration, homily, talk, lecture, harangue, prelection.

allonym. *Pseudonym, alias, nom de guerre, pen name, nom de plume, incognito.

allot. Allot, assign, apportion, allocate agree in meaning to give as one's share, portion, or the like. Allot implies more or less arbitrary or haphazard selection and, unless qualified, conveys no suggestion of a fair or equal distribution; as, to allot oneself an hour a day for exercise; to allot 500 square feet to an exhibitor. "He had been allotted a small sitting-room" (C. Mackenzie). "Brutus and Cassius . . . were allotted the minor governments of Crete and Cyrene" (Buchan). Assign stresses authoritative and, usually, fixed allotment; it too carries no hint of an even division. "This original and supreme will [that of the people] organizes the government, and assigns to different departments their respective powers" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "In the beginning, Father Jove . . . assigned [the day] to work, the night to rest . . . But little by little business began to encroach on the time allotted to rest" (S. M. Crothers). Apportion, on the other hand, implies a principle of fair division, sometimes of equivalence in sharing, but more often of a proportionate distribution; as, after each decennial census, Congress apportions the number of representatives to be elected by each state. "His guardians had apportioned to him an allowance . . . adequate to his position" (Disraeli). Allocate is used chiefly in reference to money, property, territory, powers, and the like, and suggests definite appropriation to a particular person or group or dedication to a particular use; as, to allocate a sum of money for the construction of a bridge; the districts of Czechoslovakia allocated to Germany by the Munich Agreement. "The whole subtle question of the allocation of powers under the Constitution" (North American Review).

Ana. Divide, dispense, *distribute, deal, dole: *give, bestow.

Con. *Keep, retain, withhold, detain, hold back: confiscate, appropriate, *arrogate.

allow. 1 Permit, suffer, *let, leave.

Ana. Tolerate, endure, stand, brook (see BEAR): accede, acquiesce (see ASSENT): *yield, submit, defer.

Ant. Inhibit. — Con. *Forbid, prohibit, enjoin: *prevent, avert, ward off.

2 *Grant, concede.

Ana. Admit, *acknowledge, confess: acquiesce (in), accede (to), *assent (to).

Ant. Disallow. — Con. Reject, refuse (see DECLINE): *disapprove, deprecate: *deny, gainsay, contradict, traverse.

allowance. 1 *Ration, dole, pittance.

Ana. Allotment, apportionment, assignment (see corresponding verbs at ALLOT): share (see corresponding verb SHARE): grant, *appropriation, subsidy.

2 Allowance, concession come into comparison when they signify a change made by way of compromise or adjustment. Allowance usually implies a modification or variation of a requirement, a standard, etc., made for a good reason, such as probable contingencies or mitigating circumstances; as, to make allowance for the current in steering; to make allowance for a person's inexperience; to make allowance for wear through friction in designing the parts of a machine. "If business imposes its restraints and its silences and impediments, Mr. Darnay as a young gentleman of generosity knows how to make allowance for that circumstance" (Dickens). Concession implies that the change has been made reluctantly and usually as a favor or indulgence; as, they would make no concession to a candidate's youth and inexperience. "The sole concession to leisure allowed me out of the year was one month on a farm" (V. Heiser). "Any concession to fashion was, they felt, unbecoming to their age" (V. Sackville-West).

Ana. *Charity, philanthropy: dole, pittance, allowance, *ration.

alone, adj. 1 Alone, solitary, lonely, lonesome, lone, forlorn, lorn, desolate agree in denoting apart from others; by oneself or itself. Alone lays stress upon the objective fact of being entirely by oneself; solitary connotes a sense of isolation or remoteness. "Alone, alone, all, all alone, Alone on a wide wide sea" (Coleridge). "A mind forever voyaging through strange seas of thought, alone" (Wordsworth). "The notice . . . has been delayed . . . till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it" (Johnson). "I am to be left . . . with Dora only. That will be rather solitary. However, I never am and never can be alone" (T. E. Brown). "All is bright, and clear, and still, Round the solitary hill" (Shelley). One is lonely who feels oneself alone and longs for companionship; the word also applies to places which are unfrequented; lonesome heightens the implication of dreariness; lone is chiefly poetical. "I wandered lonely as a cloud" (Wordsworth). "This soul hath been Alone on a wide wide sea: So lonely 'twas, that God himself Scarce seemed there to be" (Coleridge). "Like one that on a lonesome road Doth walk in fear and dread" (Coleridge). "A dismal and lonesome old woman" (N. Hawthorne). "Her life is lone; he sits apart" (Tennyson). One is forlorn who is woebegone and listless because of separation from what is dear to him (usually from persons or a person); a place is forlorn that is remote, uninhabited, uncultivated, and dreary. "There is nothing so bad as parting with one's friends. One seems so forlorn without them" (Austen). "Repair me with thy presence, Silvia; Thou gentle nymph, cherish thy forlorn swain!" (Shak.). "The fascination of the Polar continent . . . is the fascination of the unknown, the limitlessly rigorous, the terrible and the forlorn" (Times Lit. Sup.). Lorn differs from forlorn in that it is chiefly literary, is not often used of places, and often specifically implies lovelorn. "I weep as I wander, lorn and lone, Through the coral caves where the mermaids roam, And all but me have the comforts of home"

(N. Y. Sun). "Where was lorn Urania When Adonais died?" (Shelley). Desolate intensifies the implications of forlorn, implying a more irreparable loss, a more poignant grief, as disconsolateness because of desertion or bereavement (as, a widow forlorn because her only child is away at school; a widow desolate on the death of an only child). As applied to places, desolate often implies barrenness, dilapidation, ruination, etc. "I cry in my sleep where is he! I demand of Heaven, will he not come to deliver me! No answer. Ah Monsieur . . . I send my desolate cry across the sea" (Dickens). "Little town, thy streets for evermore Will silent be; and not a soul to tell Why thou art desolate, can e'er return" (Keats).

Ana. *Single, sole, lone, unique: deserted, abandoned, forsaken (see ABANDON): isolated, secluded (see corresponding nouns at SOLITUDE).

Ant. Accompanied. — Con. Attended, escorted, convoyed, chaperoned (see ACCOMPANY): aided, assisted, helped (see HELP).

2 Alone, adj. & adv. *Only.

aloof. *Indifferent, detached, disinterested, unconcerned, incurious.

Ana. Disdainful, haughty, arrogant, *proud: uninterested, *disinterested: cool, *cold: reserved, reticent, *silent.

Ant. Familiar, close. — Con. Friendly, neighborly (see AMICABLE): intimate, confidential, chummy (see FAMILIAR).

alp. Peak, *mountain, mount.

alphabetize. Classify, pigeonhole, *assort, sort.

Ana. *Order, arrange, systematize, methodize.

also. Also, too, likewise, besides, moreover, furthermore agree in meaning in addition, and are used when joining (not necessarily in the same sentence) one proposition or consideration to another. Also adds to a statement something that may be affirmed equally with what precedes. "That where I am, there ye may be also" (John xiv. 3). "Every simile ought not only to be well adapted to the subject, but also to include every excellence of description" (Goldsmith). Too is less formal than also, and adds with a lighter touch. "Like Twilight's, too, her dusky hair" (Wordsworth). "I can like now, and admire you too, sir" (Thackeray). Likewise is more formal and slightly more explicit than also; it sometimes, but no longer necessarily, implies specific likeness or connection between the ideas which it unites. "Have I not seen—ye likewise may have seen" (Wordsworth). "Greek, was your ambition likewise doomed to failure?" (Browning). The last three words introduce a statement which must be taken into consideration along with that which precedes. Besides usually introduces a statement that strengthens what has been said; as, his project is an excellent one; besides, it is likely to help a great many persons. Moreover is more emphatic than besides, and often serves as a transitional word between sentences: it often implies that the stronger of two considerations is yet to be presented; as, the mountain was steep and rugged; moreover, its sides were coated with ice. Furthermore is sometimes the most formal of these words; its chief use, however, is in a chain of additions where either besides or moreover has (or where both have) already been used; as, he is well-liked; moreover, he is absolutely dependable; furthermore, there is no one who can take his place.

altar. Altar, shrine, tabernacle, chantry are sometimes confused when applied to structures used in Christian ceremonies. An altar is a tablelike structure used in celebrating the Eucharist. It is indispensable to the celebration of Mass, or, in the Eastern churches, to the celebration of the Divine Liturgy. It is also found in many Protestant churches. A shrine is a structure before which devotions to a saint or sacred personage are carried on. Originally, a shrine was a cofferlike or tomblike structure containing the relics of the saint; now it is more often a statue in a niche or on a pedestal, or an altar surmounted by a statue. As an altar, the latter may be used in the celebration of the Eucharist; as a shrine of a particular saint, the term implies that prayers said before it invoke his intercession. A tabernacle, as here compared, is a boxlike structure placed at the center of an altar to receive the unconsumed consecrated bread and wine. Chantry, originally applied to an endowment for masses for the soul of a dead person or persons, is also applied to an altar endowed for the same purpose.

alter. *Change, vary, modify.

Ana. Adjust, accommodate, *adapt: qualify, temper, attempt (see MODERATE): *transform, metamorphose, convert.

Ant. Fix. — Con. *Set, settle, establish: preserve, conserve (see SAVE): *continue, last, endure, abide, persist.

alteration. Change, variation, modification. See under CHANGE, v.

Ana. Adjustment, adaptation, accommodation (see corresponding verbs at ADAPT): transformation, metamorphosis, conversion (see under TRANSFORM).

Ant. Fixation: fixity. — Con. Permanence, stability, perdurability (see corresponding adjectives at LASTING): continuance, endurance, persistence (see corresponding verbs at CONTINUE).

alterative. *Restorative.

altercate, v. Quarrel, wrangle, squabble, bicker, spat, tiff. See under QUARREL, n.

Ana. Fight, *contend, battle, war: dispute, debate, agitate (see DISCUSS).

Ant. Concur. — Con. *Agree, coincide: conform, reconcile, accommodate, *adapt.

altercation. *Quarrel, wrangle, squabble, bickering, spat, tiff.

Ana. Fight, conflict, combat, *contest: *discord, dissension, contention, variance, strife: controversy, dispute, *argument.

Ant. Concurrence: accord. — Con. Agreement, coincidence (see corresponding verbs at AGREE): *harmony, concord, consonance.

alternate, adj. *Intermittent, recurrent, periodic.

Ana. Alternating, rotating (see ALTERNATE, v): *reciprocal, correspondent, complementary.

Ant. Consecutive. — Con. Successive, sequent (see CONSECUTIVE).

alternately, n. *Substitute, supply, understudy, double, stand-in, pinch hitter, locum tenens.

alternate, v. *Rotate.

Ana. Recur, *return, revert: oscillate, fluctuate, sway, waver (see SWING).

Con. *Follow, succeed.

alternation. Vicissitude, *change, mutation, permutation.

Ana. Rotation (see corresponding verb ROTATE): oscillation, fluctuation, wavering (see corresponding verbs at SWING): turning, revolving, rotating, wheeling (see TURN, v): recurrence, return, reversion (see under RETURN, v).

alternative. Option, *choice, preference, selection, election.

although. *Though, albeit.

altitude. *Height, elevation, stature.

Ana. Highness, tallness, loftiness (see corresponding adjectives at HIGH): *summit, peak, apex.

Con. Depth, profundity (see corresponding adjectives at DEEP).

altruistic. Benevolent, *charitable, humanitarian, philanthropic.

Ana. Self-abnegating, self-denying (see corresponding nouns at RENUNCIATION): generous, bountiful, *liberal.

Ant. Egoistic. — Con. Egotistic, self-loving, self esteeming, conceited (see corresponding nouns at CONCERT): self-indulging, self-pampering (see primitive verbs at INDULGE).

always. *Forever, ever, aye, evermore, forevermore.

amalgam. *Mixture, admixture, compound, blend, composite.

amalgamate. Blend, commingle, merge, coalesce, fuse, *mix, mingle.

Ana. Combine, unite, link, associate, *join: consolidate, unify, *compact.

Con. Disintegrate, crumble, decompose (see DECAY): disperse, dissipate, *scatter: *separate, part, divide.

amalgamation. *Consolidation, merger.

amanuensis. Scrivener, scribe, *secretary, stenographer, typist.

amaranthine. Fadeless, deathless, unfading, *immortal, undying.

Ana. *Everlasting, endless, never-ending: eternal (see INFINITE): *lasting, perdurable, perpetual.

amass. *Accumulate, hoard.

Ana. Collect, *gather, assemble: *heap, pile, mass, stack.

Ant. Distribute. — Con. Dissipate, *scatter, disperse: dispend, divide, deal, dole (see DISTRIBUTE).

amateur. Amateur, dilettante, dabbler, tyro (or tiro) come into comparison when they denote a person who follows a pursuit without showing proficiency or a professional purpose. Originally, amateur denoted (and still occasionally denotes) one who has a taste or liking for something rather than an expert knowledge of it: in this sense it is distinguished from connoisseur; as, an amateur of cameos; "[speaking] in his quality of an amateur of dogs" (Bennett). In current use, amateur is commonly applied to a person whose participation in an activity requiring skill is due to a personal rather than a professional interest. It usually, but not invariably, also implies a lack of mastery. This latter implication is not found in sports, where a technical distinction between an amateur (one who competes without remuneration) and a professional (one who competes for reward) prevails. In other use the word is opposed to expert and adept, as well as professional. Sometimes it suggests lack of experience or apprenticeship; as, "every artist was first an amateur" (Emerson): sometimes it connotes indulgence in a particular pursuit as a pastime or as an avocation. "How could an amateur venture out and make an exhibition of himself after such splendid rowing!" (Jefferies). Very often, especially in contrast to expert or adept, it connotes superficiality, bungling, indifference to professional standards, or the like. "It is beginning to be hinted that we are a nation of amateurs" (Rosebery). "The third Earl of Shaftesbury . . . illustrated this unsystematic method of thinking. He was an amateur, an aristocratic amateur, careless of consistency" (H. Ellis). Dilettante was originally and is now again applied to an amateur (in the early derogatory sense of that word) in the fine arts (see AESTHETE). Like amateur it acquired depreciatory connotations, but its original implication of a genuine liking and taste for the pursuit has not been lost. It stresses enjoyment rather than effort, a frittering rather than a concentration of one's energies, and, sometimes, the point of view of the aesthete. "The dilettante lives an easy, butterfly life, knowing nothing of . . . toil and labor" (Osler). "We continue to respect the erudite mind, and to decry the appreciative spirit as amateurish and dilettante" (A. C. Benson). Dabbler also implies a lack of serious purpose, but it suggests desultory habits of work and lack of persistence. "Your dabblers in metaphysics are the most dangerous creatures breathing" (A. Tucker). "The certainty of touch which marks the difference between an artist and the dabbler . . . can come only after patient study" (B. Wendell). Tyro, though originally applied to a young soldier just recruited, and later to a beginner, especially a young one, now does not necessarily imply youth; it does, however, suggest comparable inexperience or audacity with resulting incompetence or crudeness. "It may be fancy on the part of a tyro in music to suggest that a change from poetry to prose occurs when Beethoven introduces in the last movement of the Choral Symphony . . . a subject in words" (S. Alexander). "'A noble theme!' the tyro cried, And straightway scribbled off a sonnet. 'A noble theme,' the poet sighed, 'I am not fit to write upon it'" (C. Wells).

Ana. *Novice, apprentice, probationer.

Ant. Professional; expert. — Con. Adept, wizard, dab, dabster, virtuoso (see EXPERT).

amative. Amorous, amatory, *erotic.

amatory. *Erotic, aphrodisiac, amative, amorous.

amaze, v. Astound, flabbergast, astonish, *surprise.

Ana. Dumfound, bewilder, confound, nonplus (see PUZZLE): impress, touch, strike, *affect.

Ana. Bewilderment, dumfounding, confounding, mystification (see corresponding verbs at PUZZLE).

amazement. Amaze, *wonder, wonderment, admiration.

Ana. See those at AMAZE, n.

amazon. *Virago, termagant.

ambassador or ambassador. Ambassador (or embassador), legate, nuncio, minister, envoy, internuncio are here compared only in their technical senses with reference to their order of precedence as fixed by international regulations. All designate a diplomatic agent serving his sovereign or government in a foreign country. Ambassador, legate, and nuncio designate a diplomatic agent of the first rank who, as the official representative of his sovereign or chief executive, has access to the sovereign or chief executive of the country in which he serves and is entitled to the same honors as would be accorded to the head of the government were he present in person. An ambassador is almost always a resident agent, though sometimes the term is applied to one who goes on a special mission as the chief executive's diplomatic agent. In this case he may be called an ambassador-at-large. The comparable diplomatic agents of the pope are called legate and nuncio, the difference between them being that a legate goes on a special mission and is clothed with authority to act in the name of the pope, and a nuncio serves as the accredited resident ambassador of the Holy See at a foreign court or seat of government. Minister is applicable to a diplomatic agent of the second and of the third rank. As an agent of the second rank, he may also be called an envoy, for his full title is envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. Though he also carries letters (letters of credence) to the sovereign or chief magistrate of the state to which he is sent, asking credit for what he says or does in the name of the head of his own government, he is not entitled to the same honors as an ambassador. Internuncio is the designation of the papal diplomatic agent of the second rank equivalent to an envoy extraordinary or minister plenipotentiary. An agent of the third rank, called more fully minister resident, transacts diplomatic business for his government in a foreign country but is not empowered to represent its sovereign or chief executive.

ambiguity. Ambiguity, equivocation, tergiversation, amphibology, amphibologism, double-entendre (or double entente), are comparable when they denote expression or, usually, an expression, that is capable of more than one interpretation. Ambiguity is referable to any expression that admits of two (sometimes more) interpretations; commonly, however, it suggests the use of a word or phrase, rather than a construction, that may be taken in either of two senses. "Where no ambiguity arises, the word polygon may be used to refer either to the broken line, or to the part of the plane inclosed by it" (R. R. Smith, "Beginners' Geometry," 1931). Ambiguity does not in itself suggest intentional lack of explicitness; when that idea is to be conveyed or when an attempt to mislead or (less often) an indifference to accuracy in statement is to be suggested, equivocation is the preferable word. "The first cardinal sin from the logician's standpoint is equivocation. Thus Hobbes has declared that 'in all discourses wherein one man pretends to instruct or convince another, he should use the same word constantly in the same sense'" (The Kenyon Review). "Equivocation is half-way to lying" (Penn). But equivocation often specifically implies the use of a word that is important to the argument or thought in another sense than that one in which it has been already employed, either because the writer or speaker is himself confused or because he wishes to confuse those whom he is addressing. Tergiversation, a less common word, stresses a shifting of senses, especially of a word or words important to one's argument. It always implies evasion and looseness of thought; sometimes it connotes intentional subterfuge, and often, in current use, a low standard of intellectual honesty. "Humanism depends very heavily, I believe, upon the tergiversations of the word 'human'; and in general, upon implying clear and distinct philosophic ideas which are never there" (T. S. Eliot). Amphibology and amphibologism, terms used chiefly (though now rarely) in logic, imply ambiguity arising from a grammatical construction which can be made to say two divergent things; thus, in "there is no army in existence that our army can overcome" there is an amphibology, or amphibologism, for "that" and "our army" may be construed respectively as subject and as object of "can overcome" or vice versa. Double-entendre (literally, double meaning), a French phrase used more often in an English context than its idiomatic French equivalent double entente (literally, double manner of being understood), designates an intentional ambiguity where an expression is used because of its twofold meaning, its obvious sense being a cover for a subtle implication, especially a stinging or an indelicate implication. "Sometimes with these Parliamentary comedies, the humour lay in a kind of double entendre, using the phrase in an innocent sense" (Manchester Guardian).

ambiguous. Equivocal, cryptic, enigmatic, vague, *obscure, dark.

Ana. Dubious, *doubtful, questionable.

Ant. Explicit. — Con. Lucid, perspicuous, *clear: express, definite, specific, categorical (see EXPLICIT).

ambit. Compass, *circumference, perimeter, periphery, circuit.

ambition. Ambition, aspiration, pretension agree in meaning strong desire for advancement. Ambition has personal advancement or preferment as its end: it may be praiseworthy: it is sometimes inordinate; as, ambition for fame; ambition to hold office; ambition to acquire wealth; "Vaulting ambition, which o'erleaps itself" (Shak.). Aspiration implies as its object something felt to be above one, the striving after which is uplifting or ennobling; as, aspiration after knowledge, excellence, holiness; "That spirit of his In aspiration lifts him from the earth" (Shak.). Aspiration, however, is sometimes used (esp. in the plural) in a derogatory sense of ambition which is felt to be unwarranted or presumptuous; as, his aspirations must be nipped in the bud. Pretension (see also CLAIM, PRETENSE) was once preferred to aspiration in this latter sense, for it etymologically carries a hint of presumptuousness and, therefore, of lack of real claim to the powers which fulfillment of the ambition or aspiration requires. "They are always looked upon, either as neglected, or discontented because their pretensions have failed" (Lady M. W. Montagu). In current use, the term is rare in this sense (see also CLAIM) but it does occur, and usually implies less driving power than ambition or aspiration and, often, the guidance of mere desire rather than the possession of the necessary gifts. "It was the undergraduate literary club, whose membership included all nice boys with literary pretensions" (J. P. Marquand). Ana. Urge, yen, lust, *desire: eagerness, avidity, keenness, anxiety (see corresponding adjectives at EAGER): spur, goad, incentive, *motive. Con. Contentment, satisfaction (see corresponding verbs at SATISFY): resignation, *patience: indolence, faincance, sloth (see corresponding adjectives at LAZY).

ambitious. 1 Ambitious, emulous agree in meaning extremely desirous of something that will give one power, fame, success, riches, or the like. Ambitious usually implies inordinate, sometimes presumptuous, eagerness to advance oneself or to attain something beyond one's present reach; it often, in addition, connotes aggressiveness in the pursuit of one's ends. "The noble Brutus Hath told you Caesar was ambitious: If it were so, it was a grievous fault" (Shak.). Emulous stresses the desire to equal or surpass another or all others; in older use, it often implied envy or covetousness, but in modern use it suggests rivalry or the spirit of competition. "Men of pedigree . . . Emulous always of the nearest place To any throne, except the throne of grace" (Cowper).

Ana. *Eager, avid, anxious, keen: aspiring, panting, aiming (see AIM, v.): daring, venturesome, *adventurous.

Ant. Unambitious. — Con. Apathetic, phlegmatic, stolid (see IMPASSIVE): indolent, faintant, slothful, *lazy.

2 Ambitious, pretentious, utopian come into comparison when they are applied to plans, designs, programs, policies, and the like, and mean straining or exceeding the capacity of their authors or executors. That is ambitious which is either so far beyond what can with certainty be accomplished that its realization or execution is doubtful or which, if realized, is accomplished only by excessive effort or by testing one's powers to the utmost; as, "The philosopher has the ambitious aim of unifying, or harmonising, these points of view" (Inge); his last novel was his most ambitious and, possibly, his best. That is pretentious which so far exceeds one's powers or resources that any attempt to carry it out reveals one's inadequacy, inexperience, lack of sufficient skill, or the like; in this sense it often, but not necessarily, implies ostentation; as, the program was too pretentious for so young a violinist. That is utopian which is utterly impracticable or unattainable under present (or sometimes, any) conditions. Utopian, if it does not suggest an idealistic approach, invariably implies indifference to actualities; as, utopian schemes for the eradication of poverty; the reformers started out with an ambitious program which its critics called utopian; time has shown that it was too pretentious.

Ana. Audacious, bold (see BRAVE): daring, venturesome, temerarious (see ADVENTUROUS): ostentatious, *showy. Ant. Modest. — Con. Lowly, *humble: *moderate, temperate.

amble, v. 1 Rack, single-foot, pace, walk, canter, lope, trot. See under TROT, n.
2 *Saunter, stroll.

Ana. Loiter, dawdle (see DELAY): meander, ramble, roam (see WANDER).

amble, n. Rack, single-foot, pace, walk, canter, lope, *trot, gallop.

ambrosia. Ambrosia, nectar, manna, amrita (or amreeta) are sometimes confused in their metaphorical senses because their literal meanings are not definitely understood. In general, each denotes a divine or miraculous food or drink. Ambrosia, literally the food of the Olympian gods, has come to mean food fit for the gods; it and its derivative ambrosial are applicable chiefly to foods that give exquisite pleasure and are delectable not only to the palate but to the eye and the nostrils; as, "divine ambrosial fruits" (Milton); "but he upon ambrosia daily fed, That grew in Eden" (G. Fletcher). Nectar, on the other hand, is literally the drink of the Olympian gods; in precise use, it and its derivatives nectared, nectarean, nectareous are applicable only to that which is, literally or figuratively sipped, sucked, or imbibed with ecstatic enjoyment because of its surpassing sweetness and bouquet. "I [am] as rich in having such a jewel As twenty seas, if all their sand were pearl, The water nectar and the rocks pure gold" (Shak.). "The juice nectareous" (Pope). "That gall-drop we require lest nectar cloy" (Browning). Manna, literally the food rained from Heaven in the form of flakes for the sustenance of the Children of Israel during their journey through the wilderness, is metaphorically applied to that which is given to nourish or refresh body, mind, or spirit. "Fair ladies, you drop manna in the way Of starved people" (Shak.). Amrita, a Hindu word akin to ambrosia, in its figurative use in English poetry is often equivalent to nectar. However, in either use, it suggests a revivifying or immortalizing power more often than delectableness. "The divine Amrita tree, That blesses heaven's inhabitants With fruits of immortality" (T. Moore). "Wide-petaled plants that boldly drink Th' Amreeta of the sky" (E. B. Browning).

ambrosial. Nectared, nectarean, nectareous. See under AMBROSIA.

Ana. Delectable, delicious, luscious, *delightful.

ambulant. Ambulatory, peripatetic, *itinerant, nomadic, vagrant.

Ant. Bed-ridden (of patients).

ambulatory, adj. Ambulant, peripatetic, *itinerant, nomadic, vagrant.

ambulatory, n. *Passage, passageway, aisle, gallery, cloister, arcade, hall, hallway.

ambuscade. Ambuscado, *ambush.

ambuscado. Ambuscade, *ambush.

ambush, n. Ambush, ambuscade, ambuscado agree in meaning a device to entrap the enemy by lying in wait under cover for an opportune moment to make a surprise attack. Ambush, however, is also used to designate any act of lying in wait or in concealment as for spying, frightening, obtaining an advantage, or the like; it sometimes connotes unfairness or cowardliness; as, "ambushes of cutthroats" (Thackeray). "When he was a boy he had

... once, at their festival time ... spied on the Pecos men ... He had lain in ambush for two nights on the mountain" (Cather). Ambuscade usually implies the legitimate strategic disposition of troops in concealment, but in military use is more often applied to the body of troops or to their position than to the trap. "The knights and gentlemen volunteered for an ambuscade to cut off the convoy" (Froude). "Fear'd In every wavering brake an ambuscade" (Tennyson). Ambuscado was once more common in English than ambuscade, but is now distinctly archaic. "Then dreams he of cutting foreign throats, Of breaches, ambuscadoes, Spanish blades" (Shak.).

Ana. Trap, snare, *lure: *attack, onset, onslaught, assault.

ambush, v. *Surprise, waylay.

Ana. *Attack, assault, assail: trap, entrap, snare, ensnare, nab, capture, *catch.

ameliorate. *Improve, better, help.

Ana. Amend, remedy, reform, rectify, *correct: mitigate, alleviate, *relieve, lighten.

Ant. Worsen: deteriorate (v.l.). — Con. *Injure, harm, hurt, damage, impair, mar, spoil: *intensify, aggravate.

amenable. 1 Answerable, liable, accountable, *responsible.

Ana. Open, subject, *liable: *subordinate, dependent, subject.

Ant. Independent (of): autonomous. — Con. Autocratic, arbitrary, *absolute: *free, autonomic, autarchic.

2 Tractable, *obedient, docile, biddable.

Ana. Pliant, adaptable, pliable (see PLASTIC): responsive (see TENDER): sensitive, open (see LIABLE): submissive, *tame, subdued.

Ant. Recalcitrant, refractory. — Con. Intractable, *unruly, ungovernable, headstrong: truculent, *fierce. *obstinate, stubborn, mulish.

amend. Reform, *correct, rectify, revise, emend, remedy, redress.

Ana. *Improve, better, ameliorate: *mend, repair: elevate, raise, *lift.

Ant. Debase: impair. — Con. Corrupt, vitiate, deprave, debauch, pervert (see DEBASE): *injure, mar, spoil, damage, harm, hurt.

amends. Redress, *reparation, indemnity, restitution.

Ana. Compensation, recompense, requital (see corresponding verbs at PAY): atonement, expiation (see under EXPIATE).

amenity. 1 Amenity, luxury, pleasance are synonymous when they agree in denoting a thing (an object, a feature, a quality, an experience) that gives refined or exquisite pleasure or is exceedingly grateful to the mind or senses. Amenity, in precise use, implies a delightful mildness, gentleness, or softness, especially in contrast to an uncomfortable or distressing harshness, roughness, crudeness, or the like; thus, many English go to the Riviera in the winter because of the amenity of its climate; amenities of modern automobile travel such as broad, smooth highways and scenic routes. "The amenity of a fine day in its decline surrounded me with a beneficent, a calming influence" (Conrad). Luxury, as here compared, stresses keen, often voluptuous, enjoyment and unalloyed gratification of the mind or senses, usually, even if not always, without any hint of opulence in the thing enjoyed or sensuality in the pleasure. "And learn the luxury of doing good" (Goldsmith). "Mark decided to walk back by the road ... instead of indulging himself in the luxury of once more rejoicing in the solitude of the green lanes" (C. Mackenzie). "A dressing-room with a marble bath that made cleanliness a luxury instead of one of the sternest of the virtues" (Shaw). Pleasance is now chiefly poetic; it often emphasizes delight in beauty, especially in the beauty of nature, but it invariably implies enjoyable sensations. "With pleasance of the breathing fields yfed" (Spenser). "Thence thro' the garden I was drawn— A realm of pleasance" (Tennyson). "And searched the garden's little length Some new pleasance to find; And there some yellow daffodils, and jasmine hanging high, Did rest the tired eye" (E. W. Tennant).

Ana. *Pleasure, delight, joy, enjoyment: ease, comfort, relaxation (see REST): mildness, softness, blandness, lenity or leniency, gentleness (see corresponding adjectives at SOFT).

Ant. Rigor. — Con. Harshness, roughness, ruggedness (see corresponding adjectives at ROUGH): disagreeableness, unpleasantness (see affirmative adjectives at PLEASANT): hardship, *difficulty, vicissitude.

2 *Courtesy, comity, attention, gallantry.

Ana. Civility, politeness, courteousness (see corresponding adjectives at CIVIL): graciousness, affability, cordiality, geniality, sociability (see corresponding adjectives at GRACIOUS): *form, convention, convenience: ceremony, formality (see FORM).

Ant. Acerbity, asperity: rudeness. — Con. Glumness, moroseness, crabbedness, surliness (see corresponding adjectives at SULLEN): *acrimony: *affront, insult, indignity: discourtesy, incivility, impoliteness (see corresponding adjectives at RUDE).

amerce. Fine, mulct, scone, *penalize.

amercement. Fine (see under PENALIZE).

amiable. 1 *Lovable.

Ana. Attractive, alluring, charming, taking (see under ATTRACT): *pleasant, pleasing, agreeable.

Ant. Unpleasant, displeasing. — Con. Distasteful, repellent, obnoxious, *repugnant: *offensive, loathsome.

2 Amiable, good-natured, obliging, complaisant bear in common the meaning having or manifesting the desire or disposition to please. All may refer either to moods or to temperaments. Amiable usually implies friendliness, affability, kindness, and other qualities that inspire liking. "From what he said of Miss Darcy, I was thoroughly prepared to see a proud, reserved, disagreeable girl. Yet he ... must know that she was as amiable and unpretending as we have found her" (Austen). Often, however, the word suggests little more than a sweet temper. "She lacked amiability; as her mother said, she was 'touchy'" (Bennett). Occasionally it additionally connotes lack of firmness or strength. "She suddenly married a poor, good-for-nothing, amiable fellow, an artist" (Deland). Good-natured not only implies a disposition to please but to be pleased; consequently it often connotes undue compliance or indifference to imposition. "He was too goodnatured a man to behave harshly" (Macaulay). "When he [a child's natural father] is good-natured and not too poor he will often pay her [the mother] more than he is legally obliged to" (Shaw). Obliging stresses a readiness to be helpful, sometimes, but far from frequently, as a sign of amiability. "Keppel had a sweet and obliging temper" (Macaulay). "Perfect civility and obligingness I certainly did receive from the Virginian, only not a word of fellowship" (O. Wister). Complaisant, because of its frequent confusion with complacent, has either lost or obscured some of its leading implications in indiscriminating modern use. When employed with a feeling for its historic values, it implies a courteous, or sometimes, a merely amiable, desire to please or to be agreeable. "We mustn't forget the Ring ... Mrs. Berry! ... [She] was only prevented by natural complaisance from shouting: 'Oh, drat yel And your Ring'" (Meredith).

Ana. *Gracious, cordial, affable, genial: warmhearted, warm, responsive, *tender: kindly, *kind, benignant, benign.

Ant. Unamiable: surly. — Con. Ungracious, *rude, ill-mannered, discourteous, impolite: *sullen, glum, morose, crabbed, dour.

amicable. Amicable, neighborly (or neighbourly), friendly come into comparison when they are applied to the attitudes, acts, words, etc., of persons, communities, and states that have intercourse with each other, and when they mean marked by or exhibiting good will or absence of antagonism. Amicable frequently implies little more than that the parties concerned are not disposed to quarrel or are at peace with each other; as, an amicable adjustment; an amicable suit. "The boys parted amicably" (Meredith). "The sometimes amicable processes of bargaining between a federation of employers and a trade union" (J. A. Hobson). Neighborly sometimes suggests good will and kindness, and a disposition to live on good terms with those with whom one must associate because of their proximity; as, she is a neighborly soul; Jones thought it was not neighborly of Mrs. White to refuse to lend him her lawn mower. Very often, however, because of connotations acquired from scriptural uses of neighbor, especially in the parable of the Good Samaritan ("Which now of these three . . . was neighbor unto him that fell among the thieves?"—Luke x. 36) it implies the duty of helpfulness and the spirit of fellowship. "He hath a neighborly charity in him" (Shak.). "He in a very neighborly manner admonished me" (Swift). Friendly is more positive in its implications of cordiality than either of the others and, also, often suggests warmth of feeling; as, a friendly nod; a friendly (cf. a neighborly) call; a friendly state; their relations are friendly.

Ana. Peaceful, *pacific, peaceable: harmonious, concordant, accordant (see corresponding nouns at HARMONY): *social, gregarious, co-operative, hospitable.

Ant. Antagonistic. — Con. Quarrelsome, contentious, *belligerent, bellicose, pugnacious: hostile, antipathetic (see corresponding nouns at ENMITY).

amidst or amid. *Among.

amiss. Amiss, astray are not often used interchangeably but they carry in common the meaning wrong, or otherwise than intended. Amiss, which etymologically implies failure, as of an arrow, to reach the mark aimed at, now frequently suggests a shortcoming or defect, as by failure to reach a standard, an expectation, a definite conclusion, the point of being useful, or the like; as, his shafts of wit went amiss; she seemed unconcerned, as though nothing had happened amiss; no information came amiss to him. Sometimes, amiss suggests a divergence from the normal or usual order. "Whether his general health had been previously at all amiss" (Dickens). "What's amiss in the Square?" . . . "Just now I saw a man running along Wedgewood Street" (Bennett). Astray emphasizes wandering from a predetermined path or the right way or course; it usually suggests moral or intellectual errancy. "Lest in temptation's path ye gang astray" (Burns). "In many an hour when judgment goes astray" (Wordsworth).

Ana. *Wrong or wrongly, bad or badly.

Ant. Aright, right.

amity. *Friendship, comity, good will.

Ana. *Harmony, concord, accord: amicableness, neighborliness, friendliness (see corresponding adjectives at AMICABLE).

Ant. Enmity. — Con. Hostility, animosity, antipathy, antagonism (see ENMITY): *discord, strife, contention, dissension, conflict, variance.

ammunition. Artillery, munitions, *armament, ordnance, arms.

amnesty. *Pardon, absolution, indulgence.

among or amongst. 1 Among (or amongst), amidst (or amid) agree in denoting surrounded or encompassed by. Among, however, implies a mingling or intermixture with distinct or separable objects; as, "A certain man . . . fell among thieves" (Luke x. 30); a minister should live among the people he serves. Hence it is regularly followed by a plural or a collective noun. Amidst literally means in the midst or middle of, hence that which surrounds may or may not consist of distinct or separable objects; as, "to the lonely inn, mid the rocks" (Arnold); "She stood in tears amid the alien corn" (Keats); "amidst the splendor and festivity of a court" (Macaulay). When both among and amidst are applicable to the same objects, among regards them in their individual, amidst in their collective, aspect. Thus Milton describes the seraph Abdiel as "among the faithless, faithful only he," having in mind the other angels as individual rebels; but when he adds, "From amidst them forth he passed," he is thinking of the angels rather as a collective body.

2 *Between, betwixt.

amoral. Nonmoral, unmoral, *immoral.

amorous. Amative, *erotic, amatory.

Ana. Passionate, fervid, ardent, *impassioned: *enamored, infatuated: lustful, lascivious (see LICENTIOUS).

Ant. Frigid. — Con. *Indifferent, aloof, detached: *cold, cool: *impassive, apathetic.

amorphous. Shapeless, unformed, inchoate, *formless, chaotic.

Ana. Unorganized, unordered, unsystematized (see affirmative verbs at ORDER): unshaped, unformed (see affirmative verbs at MAKE).

Ant. Morphous.

amount, n. *Sum, total, quantity, number, aggregate, whole.

amour, liaison, intrigue, affair, affaire are synonyms when they denote an instance of illicit love. Amour is particularly applied to the illicit attachment of persons in high life; it stresses passion as the motivating force and therefore often connotes transience. Liaison implies duration, but not necessarily permanence, in the attachment; it is commonly used to designate the relation between a man and his mistress. Intrigue emphasizes the clandestine element in the relation and is often closer to amour than to liaison in its other implications. Affair and its French equivalent affaire often suggest equivocal, even if not definitely illicit, relations; however, the English word is often used without any imputation of evil.

amour-propre. Self-esteem, self-love, egoism, egotism, *conceit.

Ana. *Pride, vanity, vainglory: complacency, self-complacency, smugness, self-satisfaction (see corresponding adjectives at COMPLACENT).

amphibologism. Amphibology, *ambiguity, equivocation, tergiversation, double-entendre, double entente.

amphibology. Amphibologism, *ambiguity, equivocation, tergiversation, double-entendre, double entente.

ample. 1 *Spacious, capacious, commodious.

Ana. Expanded, distended, swelled or swollen, inflated (see EXPAND): *large, big, great.

Ant. Meager: circumscribed. — Con. Limited, restricted, confined (see LIMIT, v.): contracted, compressed, condensed, shrunk (see CONTRACT, v.): scant, skimpy, exiguous, spare (see MEAGER).

2 Abundant, *plentiful, plenteous, copious.

Ana. *Liberal, generous, handsome, bountiful: *profuse, lavish, prodigal: *sufficient, enough, adequate.

Ant. Scanty, meager. — Con. Skimpy, scrimpy (see MEAGER): insufficient, inadequate (see affirmative adjectives at SUFFICIENT): *stingy, niggardly.

amplify. *Expand, swell, distend, dilate, inflate.

Ana. Develop (see MATURE): enlarge, augment (see INCREASE).

Ant. Abridge, condense. — Con. *Shorten, abbreviate: *contract, compress.

amplitude. *Expanse, spread, stretch.

Ana. Largeness, bigness, greatness (see corresponding adjectives at LARGE): spaciousness, commodiousness, capaciousness (see corresponding adjectives at SPACIOUS): magnitude, extent, *size: *bulk, mass, volume.

Ant. Straitness: limitation. — Con. Narrowness (see corresponding adjective at NARROW): restriction, circumscription (see corresponding verbs at LIMIT).

amrita or amreeta. *Ambrosia, nectar, manna.

amulet. Periapt, charm, talisman, *fetish.

amuse. Amuse, divert, entertain, recreate are synonyms when they mean to cause or enable one to pass one's time in pleasant or agreeable occupations. Their corresponding derivative nouns amusement, diversion, entertainment, recreation are also synonyms denoting such an occupation or its effect. Although these words are used more or less interchangeably they are fundamentally different in implications. Amuse and amusement stress the engagement of one's attention, especially during hours of leisure, in that which keeps one interested or engrossed. They do not necessarily imply play or sport; nevertheless, especially apart from a context, the words often suggest light, purposeless, trivial, or laughter-provoking pastimes. "What he wanted was to be amused, to get through the twenty-four hours pleasantly, without sitting down to dry business" (Macaulay). "I don't write because I've got things to say . . . I write because it amuses me" (R. Macaulay). "We may speculate, for amusement, whether it would not have been beneficial . . . to Britain in particular, to have had a more continuous religious history" (T. S. Eliot). Divert and diversion, on the other hand, stress the distraction of the attention from that which is occupying it, as routine interests, worry, or the like, and its capture by something different, especially by something that enlivens or promotes gaiety. "After the novelty of their surroundings had ceased to attract and divert the lepers, they often became homesick" (V. Heiser). "'It is all very well to reduce the drama to 'amusement.' . . . I believe that the drama has something else to do except to divert us'" (T. S. Eliot). Entertain and entertainment, because of their etymological implications of receiving and holding, commonly imply the activities of others to provide amusement or diversion. The words therefore suggest more or less formal expedients or more or less formal circumstances, which are usually implied in the context; as, Mrs. Brown will entertain the Burtons over the weekend; radio entertainers; a church entertainment. "Entertainment is what schoolboys are now led to expect . . . ; they are disappointed if the school is not a hall of unbroken amusement" (Grandgent). Recreate and the far more common recreation usually imply a change of occupation or an indulgence in diversions for the sake of relaxation or refreshment of body or mind. "The Lord Chancellor was recreating himself, after a long stretch of arduous business, with a journey in Scotland" (H. Martineau). "Just to sit in the Sun, to bask like an animal in its heat—this is one of my country recreations" (L. P. Smith).

Ana. Engross, absorb (see MONOPOLIZE): beguile, *while, wile: enliven, *quicken, animate: *thrill, electrify.

Ant. Bore. — Con. *Tire, weary, fatigue: *depress, oppress: irk, vex, *annoy.

amusement. Diversion, entertainment, recreation. See under AMUSE, v.

Ana. Engrossment, absorption (see corresponding verbs at MONOPOLIZE): play, sport, *fun, jest: disporting, frolicking, rollicking, romping (see PLAY, v.): jollity, *mirth.

Ant. Boredom. — Con. *Tedium, ennui: languidness, listlessness, spiritlessness (see corresponding adjectives at LANGUID): languor, *lethargy.

anachronism. 1 Anachronism, metachronism, parachronism, prochronism denote an error in timing an event or detail, especially in historical writing. Anachronism, which is the most common of these words, implies a misplacing of an event or detail that belongs to an earlier or a later time than the one under consideration (see article 2, below). Sometimes it specifically implies antedating, but more often it is used in reference to any mistake in chronology. Metachronism (which is now rare and often ambiguous) and parachronism designate an anachronism that involves giving a later than the true date; prochronism, an anachronism in which an earlier than the true date is indicated.

2 Anachronism, solecism are occasionally used interchangeably as meaning something that does not properly belong to the setting or background in which it is placed and that is incongruous with it. Anachronism, in precise use, always implies a mistake in associating things which do not belong to the same time or age; thus, an automobile in a story of American Civil War times would be an anachronism because automobiles did not come into use until late in the nineteenth century; a Chippendale chair is an anachronism in a Jacobean room because the Jacobean style of furniture belongs to the seventeenth century and the Chippendale style was originated at the end of the eighteenth century. When applied to something that does exist at the time under consideration, anachronism implies that the thing is behind the times or antiquated and useless. "It [the Roman Senate] became more and more a dignified anachronism . . . with no inherent power of initiation or resistance" (Buchan). Solecism, on the other hand, implies lack of concord or consonance in the association of things that do not properly (that is, according to the proprieties, the decencies, the conventions, or the like) belong together; thus, one who in affectation introduces foreign words into English speech commits a solecism in language; a curtsy is a solecism (or an anachronism) in a modern American drawing room; by eighteenth-century standards, Shakespeare was guilty of a solecism when he introduced the comic porter scene into the tragedy of Macbeth. "I feel certain that a solecism of this kind—the introduction into a particular rite of features not sanctioned by the texts—would have seemed a shocking thing to . . . so accurate a scholar" (L. P. Smith).

anaesthetic. Variant of ANESTHETIC.

anagogical or anagogic. *Mystical, mystic, cabalistic.

Ana. Allegorical, symbolical (see corresponding nouns at ALLEGORY): *allegorical, allegoristic: occult, esoteric, *recondite.

analgesic. *Anodyne, anesthetic.

Ant. Irritant.

analogous. Comparable, parallel, *similar, like, alike, akin, identical, uniform, homogeneous.

Ana. Correspondent, convertible (see RECIPROCAL): kindred, *related, allied, cognate.

analogue. Counterpart, *parallel, correlate.

analogy. 1 *Likeness, similitude, resemblance, similarity, affinity.

2 Analogy, simile, metaphor agree in designating a comparison between things essentially or generically different, but strikingly alike in one or more pertinent aspects.

Analogy, in nontechnical use, is the general term, since the simile and the metaphor are kinds of analogies: it is, however, usually restricted in its application to a comparison which brings out the analogy (for this sense see LIKENESS) between two things for the sake of elucidating something hard to understand; thus, God cannot be described except by analogy; the socialist, arguing for a co-operative economy, used as an analogy a colony of ants. A simile is an imaginative analogy, used largely for the sake of literary effect, as by carrying over the emotion aroused by one image or idea to the other with which it is compared. A simile is often brief but it characteristically indicates, as by the use of like, as, so, etc., that comparison is intended. Good examples of similes are: "As cold waters to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country" (Proverbs xxv. 25); "The feeling of unhappiness . . . covered him as water covers a log" (Kipling). A metaphor differs from a simile in not stating explicitly that it is an analogy: it therefore imaginatively identifies one object with another, and ascribes to the first one or more of the qualities of the second, or invests the former with emotional or imaginative associations attached to the latter. Good examples of metaphor are: "The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord" (Proverbs xx. 27); "Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player That struts and frets his hour upon the stage And then is heard no more" (Shak.).

analysis. Resolution, dissection, anatomy, breakdown. See under ANALYZE.

Ana. Separation, division (see corresponding verbs at SEPARATE): disintegration, decomposition (see corresponding verbs at DECAY).

Ant. Synthesis. — Con. Uniting or union, combining or combination (see corresponding verbs at JOIN): integration, concatenation (see under INTEGRATE).

analytical or analytic. Subtle, *logical.

Ana. Acute, keen, *sharp: profound, *deep: penetrating, piercing (see ENTER): organizing, ordering, marshaling (see ORDER, v.).

Ant. Creative, inventive, constructive.

analyze or analyse. Analyze (or analyse), resolve, dissect, anatomize, break down come into comparison when they mean to divide a complex whole or unit into its component parts or constituent elements. When their corresponding nouns (analysis, resolution, dissection, anatomy, breakdown) denote such a division, they are similarly applied and are distinguishable by the same implications. Analyze and analysis, as a rule, presuppose a personal agent and stress division for the sake of determining a thing's true nature or the inner relationship of its parts; as, to analyze a sentence, or the plot of a novel, or a sound, or a sensation, or a motive, or a situation; Liebig, by analyzing foodstuffs of every kind, came to the conclusion that the principal elements of food are proteins, fats, and carbohydrates; "the final analysis of material objects into electrons and protons" (Inge). Sometimes these words specifically suggest an intent to discover or uncover qualities, causes, effects, motives, possibilities, or the like, often as a basis for action or for a judgment; as, to analyze a mental complex; to analyze a person's behavior; to analyze the condition of a business; to analyze the potential market for cotton. "I could not then so far analyse all that is roughly lumped together as 'religion' as to disentangle the essential from the accidental" (H. Ellis). Often, especially in chemistry and its allied sciences, the words imply close examination as for detecting impurities or the quantity or quality of each of the constituent elements; as, to analyze a city's water supply; to analyze an ore; to analyze a hypothesis. Resolve and resolution may, but commonly do not, imply a personal agent; they therefore seldom suggest more than the actual division or separation into elements or parts. "Star-clusters . . . so distant that even in telescopes of great power they could not be resolved" (J. N. Lockyer). "Oxygen and hydrogen, into which the water is being resolved by the [electric] current" (Karl K. Darwin). "When each one of them [gusts] raced past, the sound of its progress resolved [that is, resolved itself] into . . . treble, tenor, and bass notes" (Hardy). Sometimes, especially in medicine, resolve implies a breaking up or disintegration, and usually, as a consequence, a dissipation or scattering; as, to resolve a tumor; "crystallised beyond change, not to be disintegrated by time . . . nor resolved by any alchemy" (Hudson). Dissect and dissection stress the actual and visible separation of parts; literally, one dissects, or cuts into sections, an animal or a plant so that its physical structure can be studied; in extended or figurative use, one dissects something when one takes it to pieces and offers it for examination from every angle and in every detail, pleasant or unpleasant. "We dissect The senseless body, and why not the mind? . . . the mind of man, upturned, Is in all natures a strange spectacle; In some a hideous one" (Wordsworth). "The student who is willing . . . to discipline his mind by the patient correlation of facts and the fearless dissection of theories" (H. Baerlein). "When you . . . dissect the Odyssey, what amazing artifice is found under that apparently straightforward tale!" (Quiller-Couch). Anatomize and anatomy are close synonyms of dissect and dissection but are now comparatively infrequent in use. They usually emphasize critical study of minute detail or the laying bare of that which is hidden from sight. "Then let them anatomize Regan; see what breeds about her heart. Is there any cause in nature that makes these hard hearts?" (Shak.). "Such an unripping, such an Anatomie of the shiest, and tenderest particular truths" (Milton). Break down and breakdown are used chiefly with reference to financial reports, statements, estimates, and the like, or to substances separated by chemical agents. In both fields, these words imply reduction to simpler parts or divisions. Thus, the annual report of a company's financial position, giving a general statement of assets and liabilities, with yearly income and profit and loss account, may be followed by a breakdown showing the status, earnings, etc., of each of the several departments of the business; a consolidated balance sheet is often accompanied by a breakdown giving a detailed statement for each of the main items involved. In chemistry, division into simpler substances (rather than division into elements) is implied; thus, proteins are broken down by enzymes into amino acids.

Ana. *Separate, divide, part: classify, pigeonhole, *assort.

Ant. Compose, compound: construct. — Con. *Integrate, concatenate, articulate.

anaphylaxis. Hypersensitivity, hypersensitiveness, *susceptibility, allergy.

anarchic or anarchical. Anarchistic, anarchist. See under ANARCHY, 1.

anarchism. *Anarchy.

anarchist. Nihilist (see COLLECTIVIST).

anarchistic or anarchist. Anarchic, anarchical. See under ANARCHY, 1.

Ant. Authoritarian.

anarchy. 1 Anarchy, anarchism overlap in their implications but are not synonyms because of differing denotations. Anarchy denotes a state or condition of society where there is no law or order or, by extension, where there is complete disorder: anarchism denotes a theory that government is an evil because it imposes limitations upon the freedom of the individual; as, when the city fell, anarchy prevailed; nihilism is a form of anarchism. The same distinctions extend to their respective adjectives anarchic (or anarchical) and anarchistic (or anarchist); as, anarchic influences; anarchic conditions; anarchistic influences; anarchistic doctrines.

2 Anarchy, chaos, lawlessness denote in common absence, suspension, breakdown, or widespread defiance of, government, law, and order. Anarchy is the total absence or suspension of government. "Beginning . . . with an energy that inspired without shattering the forms of discipline and law, it [the Athenian democracy] dissolved by degrees this coherent whole into an anarchy of individual wills" (G. L. Dickinson). Chaos is the utter negation of order; as, "a process calculated to reduce the orderly life of our complicated societies to chaos" (A. Huxley). Lawlessness signifies rather a prevalent or habitual disregard of law and order than their absence or suspension. When anarchy and lawlessness (or their adjectives) are used of actions rather than of a state of things, there is often little distinction of meaning. "The hydrogen atom was not conforming to the canons of the classical music of physics, and yet it was not anarchic in the least, for . . . it was flawlessly obeying the laws of a different music" (Karl K. Darrow). "Illusion is not lawless. It is a world apart, if you please, but within it are its own necessities, which exact inexorable adherence to their mandates" (Lowes). Cf. CONFUSION, REBELLION.

Ant. Order: discipline.

anathema. 1 *Excommunication, interdict.

2 *Abomination, bête noire, bugbear.

3 *Curse, malediction, malison, imprecation.

Ana. Denunciation, condemnation, reprobation, censure (see corresponding verbs at CRITICIZE).

anathematize. Ban, curse, damn, *execrate, objugate.

Ana. Denounce, condemn, censure, reprobate (see CRITICIZE): proscribe, *sentence.

anatomize. Dissect, *analyze, resolve, break down.

Ana. Divide, *separate, part.

anatomy. 1 Dissection, analysis, resolution, breakdown. See under ANALYZE.

2 *Structure, skeleton, framework.

ancestor. Ancestor, progenitor, forefather, forebear (or forbear) are close synonyms meaning a person from whom one is descended. Ancestor, especially in genealogical and in historical use, implies lineal descent through one's father or mother; as, he had three ancestors who were judges. It is, however, seldom applied to a grandparent except humorously. In less precise use, ancestor (especially in the plural) may imply kinship through collaterals or through race. "The gentleman will please remember that when his half-civilized ancestors were hunting the wild boar in Silesia, mine were princes of the earth" (J. Benjamin). Ancestor often, but not invariably, suggests knowledge of identities and family pride in them as persons; as, ancestor worship; they had plenty of money, but apparently no ancestors. Progenitor differs from ancestor chiefly in its connotations rather than in its implications. It does not exclude parents or grandparents; in itself, as apart from its context, it carries no hint of family or racial feeling, and it often suggests a reference to heredity or the transmission of characters. "Do as your great progenitors have done, And, by their virtues, prove yourself their son" (Dryden). "Men resemble their contemporaries even more than their progenitors" (Emerson). Whenever an evolution is suggested, ancestor and progenitor may be used of living things (plants and animals) or of developing things (such as races, social castes, literary or artistic forms); they then often denote a species or group from which a later or a presently existing species or group has been derived; thus, the dinosaur has been mistakenly regarded as the ancestor of the bird.

Progenitor, even more than ancestor, names that which is believed to be the ultimate source or root; as, "he sang of the nuptials of Janus and Comesena, progenitors of the Italian people" (Quiller-Couch). Forefather is used less often than ancestor in historical writing but is probably more common in poetic and in colloquial use, especially when simplicity of life, or strength of family feeling, or persistence of a family in one locality is connoted. "Each in his narrow cell for ever laid, The rude Forefathers of the hamlet sleep" (Gray). "Think of your forefathers! Think of your posterity!" (J. Q. Adams). Forebear is not only less rich in its implications than forefather, but it is also less connotative of sentiment; as, the land had been owned by his forebears for generations; his forebears came from Scotland around 1800.

Ant. Descendant.

ancestry. Ancestry, lineage, pedigree are often used interchangeably as meaning either one's progenitors collectively or their quality or character as a whole. The words, however, are clearly distinguishable. Ancestry, in its most precise use, evokes the image of a family tree with its increase in branchings and ramifications by geometrical progression the further it ascends; as, only brothers and sisters have a common ancestry. However, in looser but still good use ancestry often suggests one's progenitors in general, known or unknown, a cause of pride often, but sometimes of indifference or of shame; as, no one is responsible for his ancestry, but one's ancestors are (or one's ancestry is) to a certain extent responsible for one's qualities; a snob judges a person by his ancestry. Lineage stresses descent in a line; it evokes therefore the image of a list of the persons who in order of generation are descended from a single ancestor; thus, the evangelist Matthew traced the lineage of Jesus by each step from Abraham down (see Matthew i. 1 ff.); any group of persons who can trace their derivation from (or back to) a common ancestor are of the same lineage, although their ancestry may be widely different. For this reason, lineage is often used as the equivalent of race. "Though of a lineage once abhorred" (Wordsworth). Pedigree is even more definite in its suggestions, for it implies a known and recorded ancestry. In commonest usage, to have a pedigree is to have a distinguished or notable ancestry, and to have a long pedigree is to have an ancient as well as distinguished ancestry; as, "Who proud of Pedigree, is poor of Purse" (Pope); "The deference due To a man of pedigree" (W. S. Gilbert). The term is applied to the ancestry of persons, and to that of animals and plants propagated under controlled conditions.

Ant. Descendants: posterity.

anchor, v. 1 Anchor, moor, in nautical use, agree in meaning to fix a boat or ship securely in place. In general, anchor stresses the means by which a boat is held in position; moor, the effect, or the securing. Therefore, anchor commonly implies the use of a weight, especially one with flukes or hooks, which is attached to the boat by a chain or rope and dropped overboard until it is firmly grounded in the soil beneath; as, "Whilst our pinnace anchors in the Downs" (Shak.). Moor, on the other hand, except in technical use as applied to a vessel secured offshore or in open water, does not suggest a specific means of holding the boat in place. A vessel may be moored by anchoring it or by attaching it to a wharf or jetty or to an anchored buoy by means of cables. In its restricted nautical sense, however, it implies the use of two anchors (usually connected by a swivel to prevent interlocking of their cables) which fix the vessel so securely that it cannot ride as freely as a vessel held by a single anchor. Often, but not necessarily, anchor suggests a brief stop, and moor a comparatively lengthy one; as, battleships from all countries were moored in the Hudson during the tercentenary celebration.

2 Moor. *secure, rivet.

Ana. *Fasten, attach, fix, affix.

anchorite or anchoret. Hermit, eremite, *recluse, cenobite.

Ana. *Ascetic, mystic: *religious, monk, friar.

ancient. *Old, venerable, antediluvian. antique, antiquated, archaic, obsolete.

Ana. *Secular, centuried, agelong, aeonian, diuturnal, primeval, pristine, primal, primordial (see PRIMARY).

Ant. Modern. — Con. *New, newfashioned, newfangled, fresh, novel, neoteric, modernistic: current, *prevailing.

ancillary. *Auxiliary, contributory, subsidiary, adjunct, subservient, accessory.

Ana. Assisting, aiding, helping (see HELP, v.): secondary, *subordinate, succursal: supplementary, complementary (see corresponding nouns at COMPLEMENT).

androgynous. *Bisexual, hermaphrodite, hermaphroditic, epicene.

anecdote. *Story, tale, yarn, narrative.

Ana. Incident, episode, event, *occurrence: narration, relation, recital (see corresponding verbs at RELATE).

anele. *Anoint, chrism.

anemic or anaemic. Bloodless, *pale.

Ant. Full-blooded: florid.

anent. Concerning, regarding, respecting, *about.

anesthetic or anaesthetic, adj. Insensitive, *insensible, impassible.

Ana. *Dull, obtuse: *impassive, apathetic, stolid: impervious, impermeable, impenetrable, *impassable.

Ant. Alive — Con. *Aware, awake, conscious, cognizant: responsive (see TENDER).

anesthetic or anaesthetic, n. *Anodyne, analgesic.

Ant. Stimulant.

anew. *afresh, *again, anon, encore.

anfractuons. Tortuous, *winding, serpentine, sinuous, flexuous.

Ana. Complicated, intricate, involved, *complex: circuitous, roundabout, *indirect.

Ant. Undeviating. — Con. Simple, *easy, smooth: straightforward, forthright.

angel. 1 Angel, archangel, cherub, seraph are here compared as denoting, literally or figuratively, one of a category of celestial beings whose existence is interred mainly from various Biblical references to them as attendants on the Supreme Being or as intermediaries between him and men. The applications and connotations of these words have been greatly affected by the representations of these beings in art and literature, by additions mainly from apocryphal and cabalistic sources, and by the notion of a celestial hierarchy, or of nine orders of celestial beings, developed in the early Middle Ages. In this hierarchic arrangement, angels stand lowest, archangels next; above them in ascending order are thrones, dominations, virtues, powers, principalities (names gleaned from Scriptures), cherubim, and seraphim. In ordinary use, angel is the inclusive term, though it calls up a distinctive image (always more or less dependent on the individual's religious and cultural background), most commonly that of a radiant, winged youth. "O, speak again, bright angel! for thou art As glorious . . . As is a winged messenger of heaven . . . When he . . . sails upon the bosom of the air" (Shak.). Very often, the word suggests a disembodied spirit, an ethereal being akin to man but far surpassing him in intuitive power, in refinement of feeling, and in delicacy of perception; as, "Thou hast made him [man] a little lower than the angels"

(Psalms viii. 5); "Tears, such as angels weep" (Milton). "Unless you can love, as the angels may, with the breadth of heaven betwixt you . . . Oh, never call it loving" (E. B. Browning). Sometimes the emphasis is on function, particularly that of guiding or guarding (the guardian angel) or of ministering in time of sorrow or need. "Some angel guide my pencil, while I draw, What nothing less than angel can exceed" (Young). "O woman! . . . When pain and anguish wring the brow, A ministering angel thou!" (Scott). Archangel seldom, if ever, carries the homelier, human connotations which are so often attached to angel; the word commonly evokes the image of a knightly or princely being of unrivaled splendor and brilliance (often indicated in art by raiment or armor). Archangels are the warriors or ambassadors of heaven. They are usually known by name: Michael, who contended with the devil (Jude 9); Gabriel, the angel of the Annunciation; Raphael, the companion of Tobias; and several others from apocryphal sources. In Milton, who is responsible for many of the connotations of this term in English use, the word is also a designation of Lucifer and other leaders of the fallen angels. "His [Lucifer's] form had not yet lost All her original brightness, nor appeared Less than Archangel ruined, and the excess Of glory obscured" (Milton). "[Coleridge] an archangel a little damaged" (Lamb). In modern use, cherub evokes an image of a head with a child's face, intent eyes, and shoulder wings; this figure is common in ecclesiastical decoration and in paintings, especially of the Madonna, where the cherubs' eyes are fixed on the infant Jesus. Though the word is often used in the Bible (frequently, in the Authorized Version, in a corrupt plural cherubims), it is in most passages definitely not applied to an angel; in those where it has been interpreted as so applying, the emphasis is upon nearness to the throne of God (or mercy seat) and upon the face and wings. Consequently, in the celestial hierarchy, the cherub whose gaze is fixed on God excels all other celestial beings in knowledge. Cherub, therefore, as applied to an angel, stresses watching and contemplation; cherubs may soar, but they do so within range of the beatific vision. "Him that yon soars on golden wing . . . The Cherub Contemplation" (Milton). "He [a dead child] seemed a cherub who had lost his way And wandered hither . . . 'twas most meet . . . That he should . . . stand before his God" (J. R. Lowell). Seraph derives its implications from its one Biblical source (Isaiah vi.) and from its being the designation in the celestial hierarchy of the spirit closest to God and excelling all others in love. In the vision of Isaiah (verse 2), each seraph "had six wings; with twain he covered his face, and with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly." It also was a seraph who took a coal of fire from the altar and touched the lips of Isaiah, a symbol of divine inspiration. In literary use, the word lacks the concrete implications of the other terms, for no clear image seems to have become associated with it. It is not wanting in connotations, however, of transcendent glory, ecstatic love, and mystical aspiration. "As the rapt Seraph that adores and burns" (Pope). "We loved . . . With a love that the winged seraphs of Heaven Coveted her and me" (Poe). "The Seraph's face . . . All radiant with the glory and the calm Of having looked upon the front of God" (J. R. Lowell).

2 Backer. *sponsor, patron, surety, guarantor.

anger, n. Anger, ire, rage, fury, indignation, wrath agree in denoting the emotional excitement induced by intense displeasure. Anger, the generic term of this group, names merely the emotional reaction; the word in itself suggests no definite degree of intensity and carries no necessary implication of outward manifestation; as, to conceal one's anger; easily aroused to anger; self-destroying anger. "He saw the calf, and the dancing: and Moses' anger waxed hot" (Exodus xxxii. 19). Ire, which is now regarded as literary or affected, suggests greater intensity than anger unqualified, and usually, but not necessarily, a display of that feeling in looks, acts, or words. "Belinda burns with more than mortal ire" (Pope). "Then, my lad, ye've come to tall [tell] me a lie! Farmer Blaize looked straight at the boy, undismayed by the dark flush of ire he had kindled" (Meredith). Rage adds to anger the implications of lost self-control and of violent boiling over of feeling; it often connotes variously a sense of frustration, or temporary derangement of the mind, or determination to get revenge; as, "terrible and impotent rage" (Wilde); "blind with rage she miss'd the plank" (Tennyson). "His first hot anger against the beast had changed into a cold rage: at all costs now he must get it" (S. Claude). Fury is overmastering destructive rage verging on madness. "What fury drove us into saying the stupid, intolerant, denunciatory things we said?" (L. P. Smith). "The war against physical evil, like every other war, must not be conducted with such fury as to render men incapable of the arts of peace" (B. Russell). Indignation implies depth and intensity of anger, often righteous or generous anger, aroused by that which one considers mean, shameful, or otherwise unworthy of a man or men. "Whose souls No honest indignation ever urged To elevated daring" (Shelley). "The question now placed before society . . . is this: Is man an ape or an angel? I, my lord, I am on the side of the angels. I repudiate with indignation and abhorrence those new fangled theories" (Disraeli). Wrath may imply either rage or indignation as its emotional basis, but in addition to either of these, it also often implies a grievance and a desire or intent to avenge or punish, or to get revenge. "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath" (Ephesians iv. 26). "Nursing her wrath to keep it warm" (Burns). "In describing external effects, which seem like those produced by anger, the word 'wrath' is always used. We should not speak of the 'anger' but of the 'wrath' of the elements. We therefore speak of 'the wrath of God,' more correctly than of his anger. We cannot attribute to Him passions like those of men: we can only describe the external effects which in men would be produced by those passions" (E. J. Whately).

Ana. *Acrimony, asperity: exasperation, irritation, provocation (see corresponding verbs at IRRITATE).

Ant. Pleasure, gratification: forbearance. — Con. *Patience, longanimity, long-suffering: forgiveness, condonation, pardon (see corresponding verbs at EXCUSE): indulgence, clemency, leniency (see under FORBEARING).

anger, v. Anger, incense, enrage, infuriate, madden. All these verbs carry in common with anger, their general term, the denotation to make angry (see ANGRY) or to rouse to anger (see ANGER, n.). "Laugh then at any, but at Fools or Foes; These you but anger, and you mend not those" (Pope). Incense implies hotness of anger, especially as provoked by that which is excessively irritating and offensive. "Mr. Critchlow, aged and unaccustomed to interference, had to render accounts of his trusteeship to this young man, and was incensed" (Bennett). "Magistrates and populace were incensed at a refusal of customary marks of courtesy and respect for the laws" (Inge). Enrage suggests a violent display of wrath or fury. "I pray you, speak not . . . Question enrages him" (Shak.). Infuriate implies a sense of being outraged, or, in weaker use, of being exasperated beyond endurance. "How it infuriates a bigot, when he is forced to drag into the light his dark convictions!" (L. P.

Smith). "His colleagues and his subordinates had been alternately delighted and infuriated by his assumed reluctance to deal with any practical question" (V. Sackville-West). Madden is often not distinguishable from infuriate. "Can it be fancied that Deity ever vindictively Made in his image a mannikin merely to madden it?" (Poe). At other times it implies merely excessive annoyance or vexation; as, maddening delays.

Ana. *Offend, outrage, affront: exasperate, provoke, irritate, nettle, rouse: vex, annoy, irk.

Ant. Please, gratify: pacify. — Con. Placate, mollify, appease, propitiate (see PACIFY): rejoice, delight, gladden, tickle (see PLEASE).

angle, v. *Fish.

angle, n. 1 *Corner.

2 *Point of view, viewpoint, standpoint, slant.

Ana. Attitude, *position, stand.

3 Aspect, facet, side, *phase.

Ana. *Item, detail, particular.

Anglican. *English, British, Anglo-Saxon.

Anglo-Saxon. *English, Anglican, British.

angry. Angry, irate, indignant, wrathful, acrimonious, mad agree in meaning feeling or showing displeasure with passion or in a bad temper. Angry is applied to persons or their moods, acts, looks, or words; it is also applied to animals (as, an angry bull) and by extension, because of some of its implications, to things (as, an angry boil; an angry sky). In reference to persons, it implies both emotional and physical excitement, usually, but not necessarily, exhibited as by an inflamed countenance or inflamed words or by threatening looks or speeches. "The king is angry: see, he bites the lip" (Shak.). "The adulteress! What a theme for angry verse!" (Cowper). Irate is applied only to persons or their looks, acts, or words; it often suggests greater exhibition of feeling than angry and, as a rule, implies loss of self-control. "Ah, Sir, none the less, contain you, nor wax irate!" (Browning). Sometimes it is used half humorously to suggest the disparity between the emotion and its exciting cause. "Refractory children, over whom Mr. Spratt . . . exercised an irate surveillance" (G. Eliot). Indignant, in contrast with irate, suggests righteousness in the anger and sufficiency of provocation. Often, its use imputes injustice or indignity to that which arouses anger. "Let the sword speak what the indignant tongue Disdains to brand thee with" (Shelley). Wrathful is capable of being used where irate or indignant would be more explicit. However, it usually connotes more justification of the anger than irate and more vehemence in its expression than indignant. "Why did they lie to me?" the young man wrathfully exclaimed" (Meredith). Acrimonious, though sometimes still applied to a person's temper or mood, is chiefly used to characterize intercourse and utterances. It invariably adds to angry the implication of irreconcilable difference of opinion and consequent bitterness of feeling that may or may not be shown in criminations and recriminations. "The dispute [over the Maine-New Brunswick boundaries] dragged on, becoming progressively more acrimonious, for another eleven years" (A. Huxley). Mad (see INSANE), though once in good use, is now colloquial or dialectal for angry.

Ana. *Impassioned, passionate: angered, incensed, enraged, infuriated, maddened (see corresponding verbs at ANGER): offended, outraged, affronted (see corresponding verbs at OFFEND).

Ant. Good-tempered. — Con. *Amiable, good-natured, complaisant, obliging: *pleasant, agreeable.

anguish. Woe, heartache, grief, *sorrow, dole, regret.

Ana. *Distress, suffering, dolor, misery, agony: worry, anxiety (see CARE): *pain, pang, throe, ache: torture, torment, affliction (see corresponding verbs at AFFLICT).

Ant. Relief. — Con. Comfort, solace, consolation (see corresponding verbs at COMFORT): assuagement, alleviation, mitigation (see corresponding verbs at RELIEVE): *ecstasy, rapture, transport.

angular. Gaunt, rawboned, lank, lanky, *lean, spare, scrawny, skinny.

Ana. *Thin, slender, slim: *awkward, clumsy: cadaverous, *haggard.

Ant. Rotund. — Con. Plump, chubby, *fleshy, stout, portly.

anile. *Senile, doting, doted, doddering, doddered.

Ana. *Aged, old, superannuated: ancient, venerable (see OLD): effeminate, womanish (see FEMALE): decadent, declining, deteriorating (see corresponding nouns at DETERIORATION).

Ant. Virginal, virgin. — Con. Maiden, *youthful, juvenile.

animadversion. Animadversion, stricture, aspersion, reflection are comparable when they denote a remark or statement that is an adverse criticism. Animadversion, as here narrowly considered (see animadvert at REMARK) implies as its motive deep-seated prejudice or ill will or a tendency to carp or cavil; as, given to animadversions on the clergy. "Maty's animadversions hurt me more. In part they appeared to me unjust, and in part ill-natured" (Cowper). Stricture always implies censure, which may be either ill-natured or judicious; as, "foreign strictures on the dress, looks, and behavior of the English abroad" (Arnold). "The lash of the merciless Porson . . . [whose] strictures are founded in argument, enriched with learning, and enlivened with wit" (Gibbon). Aspersion imputes a slanderous character to the criticism. "Who by aspersions throw a stone At th' head of others, hit their own" (Herbert). "At Cambridge (they tell me) while you speak very well, you write less expertly . . . you will not set the aspersion down to me" (Quiller-Couch). Reflection often, but not invariably, implies indirect aspersion or a defamatory imputation which may be inferred from what has been said. "He cannot restrain himself from reflections on kings and priests when he is most contending for them" (Hallam).

Ana. Criticism, reprehension, censure (see corresponding verbs at CRITICIZE): observation, comment, *remark: captiousness, faultfinding, caviling, carping, censoriousness (see corresponding adjectives at CRITICAL).

Ant. Commendation. — Con. Praise, laudation, exaltation, acclaim (see corresponding verbs at PRAISE): *approbation, approval.

animadvert. Comment, commentate, *remark.

Ana. *Criticize, reprehend, censure, reprobate: depreciate, *disapprove: depreciate, disparage, *decry.

Con. Ignore, disregard, overlook (see NEGLECT): *commend, applaud, compliment.

animal, n. Animal, brute, beast are synonyms only when they denote a creature lower than man but like him in possessing senses, instincts, and appetites. Animal sometimes carries no further implications. "Physiological experiment on animals is justifiable for real investigation, but not for mere damnable and detestable curiosity" (Darwin). Very often, however, the word specifically implies a difference from, rather than a likeness to, man; it may be the lack of reasoning powers, or it may be the control of instincts and appetites by biological laws rather than by a will. "No animal . . . Obeys its like: with strength all rule began. The stoutest awes the pasture . . . nicer power Man needs To rule him than is bred of bone and thew" (Browning). Brute stresses the absence of faculties or powers that are distinctive marks of a human being's superiority, such as speech, intellect, self-control, sensibility, and the like. It is therefore especially effective in ironical use. "Below my window goes the cattle train, And stands for hours along the river park, Fear, cold, exhaustion, hunger, thirst, and pain; Dumb brutes we call them" (C. P. Gilman). Beast is applied chiefly to quadrupeds; except for this distinction, it is often not clearly distinguishable from animal; as, painters of beasts; the beasts of the field; "like the bat, they are neither bird nor beast" (Marryat). Beast, however, when used in distinction to man, may imply a closer likeness than brute (which stresses the difference), because it is applied to animals just below man in the scale of creatures. "When he is best, he is a little worse than a man, and when he is worst, he is little better than a beast" (Shak.).

When applied figuratively to human beings, animal either throws the emphasis on purely physical qualities or implies the ascendancy of the physical nature over the rational and spiritual nature; brute implies extreme dullness, or insensibility to others' pain or suffering, or uncontrollable passion; beast suggests surrender to one's lower nature or sensual indulgence unworthy of a man; thus, one may speak of a prize fighter as a superb animal, of an imbecile as a mere animal, of a cruel husband as a brute, of a stupid powerful athlete as a great hulking brute, and of a drunkard as making a beast of himself. Both animal and beast are also, in modern usage, applied to man's lower nature, often regarded as a relic from an earlier stage in the evolution of the species. "His fleshly desires were strong, and he was unmerciful to the animal in himself" (M. K. Bradby). "Man . . . The herald of a higher race . . . Move upward, working out the beast, And let the ape and tiger die" (Tennyson).

animal, adj. *Carnal, fleshly, animalistic, sensual.

Ana. Physical, corporeal, *bodily: bestial, brutal (see corresponding nouns at ANIMAL).

Ant. Rational. — Con. Intellectual, *mental, psychic: spiritual (see HOLY).

animalism. *Animality.

Ana. Sensualism, voluptuousness (see corresponding adjectives at SENSUOUS): lustfulness, lasciviousness, lecherousness (see corresponding adjectives at LICENTIOUS).

animalistic. Sensual, *carnal, fleshly, animal.

Ana. Sensual, voluptuous, *sensual: lustful, lascivious, libidinous, lecherous (see LICENTIOUS).

animality. Animality, animalism are not always clearly distinguished when they are used to denote animal nature, character, or springs of action on a man or in men. Good writers, however, tend to prefer animality when they wish a word that suggests likenesses between men and animals rather than differences, and animalism when they wish one which carries in addition all the derogatory implications of sensuality or sensualism. "He disliked union with a woman whom he had never seen; moreover, when he did see her, she disappointed him, and he begat his first child in mere animality" (E. M. Forster). "Puritanism was a natural and necessary revolt . . . against that Naturalism which threatened to end in sheer animalism" (Kingsley).

Ana. Virility, maleness, masculinity (see corresponding adjectives at MALE).

animate, v. 1 *Quicken, vivify, enliven.

Ana. *Vitalize, activate, energize.

2 *Inform, inspire, fire.

Ana. Motivate, actuate, *activate: *move, drive, impel, actuate: *stir, rouse, arouse.

Ant. Inhibit. — Con. *Restrain, curb, check: *frustrate, thwart.

animate, adj. *Living, quick, alive, animated, vital.

Ana. Physical, corporeal, *bodily: animal, *carnal, fleshly.

Ant. Inanimate. — Con. Lifeless, *dead.

animated. 1 Alive, *living, animate, quick, vital.

Ana. *Active, live, dynamic: vitalized, energized, activated (see VITALIZE).

Ant. Inert. — Con. *Inactive, passive: lifeless, inanimate, *dead.

2 *Lively, vivacious, sprightly, gay.

Ana. Buoyant, volatile, effervescent (see ELASTIC): *agile, brisk, spry, nimble: *spirited, high-spirited.

Ant. Depressed, dejected. — Con. *Languid, listless, spiritless, enervated: *lethargic, torpid, comatose.

animosity. Animus, rancor, *enmity, hostility, antipathy, antagonism.

Ana. Hatred, hate, detestation, abhorrence (see under HATE, v.): vindictiveness, revengefulness, vengefulness (see corresponding adjectives at VINDICTIVE): *malice, malevolence, ill will, spite.

Ant. Good will. — Con. *Friendship, amity, comity: friendliness, neighborliness, amicableness (see corresponding adjectives at AMICABLE).

animus. Animosity, rancor, *enmity, hostility, antipathy, antagonism.

Ana. Ill will, spite, spleen, grudge (see MALICE): prejudice, bias (see PREDILECTION).

Ant. Favor. — Con. Good will, countenance (see FAVOR): *predilection, partiality: sympathy, empathy (see PITY).

annals. Chronicle, *history.

anneal. *Temper.

annex, v. *Add, append, subjoin, superadd.

Ana. *Join, unite, connect, link, associate: attach, affix, *fasten.

Con. *Detach, disengage, abstract: divorce, *separate, part.

annex, n. Annex, dependence, extension, wing, ell designate an addition to the main (and, often, the original) building. An annex may or may not be attached to the main building; it may even not be adjacent to it. When used of an addition to a hotel, an office building, or the like, it usually implies a provision for expanded business and, therefore, the same management. Dependence is rare in English, but is sometimes found as a translation of dependance, which is the French term covering a hotel annex. An extension is always attached to the main or central building; when it projects from the central building and is connected with it at only one point it is called a wing; when it extends at right angles from one end of the building it is called an ell.

Ana. *Addition, increment, accretion.

annihilate. Extinguish, *abolish, abate.

Ana. Obliterate, efface, expunge, blot out, cancel, *erase: extirpate, *exterminate, eradicate, wipe out.

Con. Create, *invent, discover: *make, form, fashion, forge, shape: *renew, restore.

anniversary, adj. *Annual, yearly.

annotate. Annotate, gloss (or, Obs., gloze or glose) and their corresponding nouns annotation, gloss, agree in meaning, as verbs, to add or append comment, or as nouns, an added or appended comment, intended to be helpful in interpreting a passage or text. One annotates a text, a literary work, or the like, when one furnishes it with critical, historical, or explanatory notes (as footnotes, marginal notes, or notes in an appendix); as, to annotate the works of Milton; an annotated edition of Shakespeare's sonnets. The subject of an annotation may be any word, passage, or detail which is capable of being explained to the advantage of the reader or student. In its strict sense, one glosses a word or phrase which is obscure in meaning because foreign, obsolete, rare, or the like, by providing its definition, as in a marginal or interlinear note (see glossary under DICTIONARY), or one glosses a text when one supplies definitions of its difficult words and phrases. "Hereunto have I added a certain glosse . . . for the exposition of old wordes, and harder phrases; which maner of glosing . . . wil seeme straunge and rare in our tongue" (E. K. in Epistle prefacing Spenser's Shepherd's Calendar). The word acquired (possibly by confusion with gloss, to give a luster to) a derogatory implication of perversion or sophistication of meaning which is still sometimes found. "Preaching the people for profit of the belly, And glosing the Gospel as them good liked" (Piers Plowman).

Ana. Elucidate, interpret, construe, *explain, expound: comment, commentate, *remark.

annotation. Gloss (see under ANNOTATE).

Ana. Commentary, comment, observation, note, *remark.

announce. Publish, proclaim, *declare, promulgate, advertise, broadcast.

Ana. Disclose, *reveal, divulge, tell: *communicate, impart.

Con. *Suppress, repress: conceal, *hide, bury: withhold, hold back, reserve (see KEEP).

announcement. Publication, proclamation, declaration, promulgation, advertisement, broadcasting. See under DECLARE.

annoy, v. 1 Annoy, vex, irk, bother agree in meaning to disturb and nervously upset a person. Annoy stresses loss of equanimity or patience, as a result of being forced to endure that which one finds obnoxious or offensive, or merely displeasing. It seldom implies more than a temporary disturbance or display of nerves. "Richard's absence annoyed him. The youth was vivacious, and his enthusiasm good fun" (Meredith). "It was . . . his lack of the ghost of a notion what any one else was feeling that annoyed her, had always annoyed her" (V. Woolf). Vex usually implies greater provocation and a stronger disturbance than annoy; it often connotes a degree of anger but at other times it suggests deep perplexity or some worry; as, "faulty translation that so vexes teachers" (Grandgent); to vex one's mind with insoluble problems. "Mr. Darcy's behaviour astonished and vexed her. 'Why, if he came only to be silent, grave, and indifferent,' said she, 'did he come at all?'" (Austen). "Such petty details as now vexed the brooding soul of the old gentlewoman" (N. Hawthorne). Irk emphasizes difficulty in enduring and resulting weariness of spirit; it is most often used in reference to that which persists or recurs annoyingly; as, "The speed and the clatter irk me" (Kipling); "the over-iterated becomes the monotonous, and the monotonous irks and bores" (Loves). Bother stresses interference with one's comfort or peace of mind; sometimes in addition it implies bewilderment or mystification or, on the other hand, worry and anxiety. "I can't be bothered to consider Jane any more" (R. Macaulay). "They were a good, stupid, earnest couple and very much bothered [by something]" (Conrad).

Ana. *Irritate, nettle, aggravate, exasperate, roil: perturb, disturb, upset, agitate (see DISCOMPOSE).

Ant. Soothe. — Con. *Comfort, solace, console: *please, gratify, tickle.

2 *Worry, pester, plague, tantalize, tease, harass, harry.

Ana. Fret, chafe (see ABRASE): badger, hector, heckle, chevy (or chivy, chivvy), *bait: trouble, molest (see INCONVENIENCE).

Con. *Neglect, ignore, overlook: mollify, appease (see PACIFY).

annual, adj. Annual, yearly, anniversary are synonyms only when they mean occurring or recurring once a year; as, annual, yearly, or anniversary celebrations; an annual, yearly, or anniversary periodical. Annual and yearly may mean also, as anniversary does not, covering or taking a whole year; as, the annual, or yearly, output, supply, income, cost; the annual, or yearly, revolution of the sun. Annual may, however, as yearly does not, mean lasting one year only; as, an annual plant; an annual Parliament. Anniversary, the most restricted of these terms, always implies a connection with a definite day of the year, which is annually commemorated because the date is associated with a significant event in the life of a person (such as a birth or a wedding) or in the history of a nation (such as a liberation or a victory) or of an organization, or the like; thus, an anniversary celebration is an annual celebration on (or near) the date of a memorable occurrence; an anniversary periodical is one that comes out annually to commemorate a significant event and the date of its occurrence.

Ant. Perennial (especially of plants).

annul. 1 *Nullify, negate, invalidate, abrogate.

Ana. *Neutralize, negative, counteract; cancel, efface, obliterate, blot out, *erase: annihilate, *abolish, extinguish.

2 Annul, abrogate, void, avoid, vacate, quash are terms chiefly in legal (but not always in technical) use meaning to deprive of validity, force, or authority. Though varying little in denotation, these words are not always interchangeable, their proper selection being dependent on the character or status of the invalidating agent and on the character of the thing invalidated. Annul is the most general term, applicable to anything that may be adjudged invalid or void, as a right, a marriage, a charter, a statute. It implies the exercise of competent legal authority. "Had parliament, immediately after the emanation of this charter . . . annulled the instrument . . . the perfidy of the transaction would have been universally acknowledged" (Ch. Just. Marshall). To abrogate is the act of one having force and authority, and often, but far from always, legal jurisdiction. A ruler, an arbiter, as well as a court, may abrogate something previously effective, as a law, a treaty, or a convention, and in effect or in intent abolish it. "We are not . . . called upon to abrogate the standards of values that are fixed, not by you and not by me, but by . . . time" (Lowe). Void, the verb, is not a technical term in law, but the adjective void is. That is void which has no legal validity; a will is void (or incapable of confirmation or ratification) when made by an insane person; a contract that is void is no contract in the view of the law. It is the insanity of the testator that voids his will, not the act of a court. To avoid is to adjudge invalid. Thus, a will with defects in the instrument is not necessarily void, but it may be voidable, or capable of being either confirmed or avoided by legal decision. Only competent legal authority can vacate, or make ineffectual or invalid, something that previously was effectual or valid; as, to vacate proceedings after the discovery of fraud; to vacate a grant of crown property. Quash is a strictly legal term applied chiefly to indictments thrown out of court as defective.

annular. *Round, circular, orbicular.

anodyne. 1 Anodyne, analgesic, anesthetic are not often interchangeable, although they agree in denoting something used to relieve pain. Anodyne, the oldest, most inclusive, and least scientific of these terms, is also the most widely applicable. It covers drugs (as paregoric), medicinal preparations used internally or externally (as a narcotic, a liniment, a plaster) and various therapeutic measures such as hot or cold applications and electricity, which relieve pain by lessening the sensibility of the nerves or by dulling the brain. Analgesic is a more scientific term than anodyne and is narrower in its application, usually being applied to any substance the chief clinical use of which is to induce a loss of sensibility to pain. Analgesics relieve either by interfering with the conduction of impulses in nerves or by dulling the brain. They may, like aspirin, be taken internally, or like a salve for burns, be applied externally. Anesthetic is applied to any substance or agent that produces total insensibility not only to pain but also to all other sensations in either a part (a local anesthetic) or in the whole body (general anesthetic). Local anesthetics include cold applications and injections of drugs. General anesthetics include substances to be inhaled, such as ether and chloroform, as well as drugs to be injected. Anesthetics are used not only to destroy suffering from pain but also to prevent suffering during surgical procedures.

2 Anodyne, opiate, narcotic, nepenthe come into comparison in their figurative senses when they mean something used to dull or deaden one's senses or one's sensibility. Anodyne is frequently used as the opposite of stimulant; it suggests something that allays excitement or mitigates mental distress by inducing forgetfulness or oblivion. "This kind of religion cannot be anything better than an anodyne; but an anodyne is unfortunately just what many people want from their religion" (Inge). "I used to imagine reading was meant to be a stimulant. Out here [at the front during the World War] it has to be an anodyne" (H. G. Wells). Opiate usually is applied to something that induces a dream state and a delusion of happiness; it also commonly suggests indifference to actual evils and a false sense of security, well-being, or the like, with consequent stiling of all disturbing thoughts. "[The delights of harmony] lenient as soft opiates to the mind, Leave vice and folly unsubdued behind" (Cowper). "No military swagger of my mind, Can smother from myself the wrong I've done him,— Without design, indeed,—yet it is so,— And opiate for the conscience have I none" (Keats). Narcotic implies a putting to sleep or into a stupor; in figurative use, it suggests merely a pleasant drowsiness which overcomes one and has a lulling effect on mind and body. "But, for the quiet heart and brain, A use in measured language lies; The sad mechanic exercise, Like dull narcotics, numbing pain" (Tennyson). Nepenthe, the designation of a legendary opiate (possibly narcotic) of the ancient Greeks, is used by English poets variously and without a clear conception of whether it was a potion or a drug or whether it induced complete insensibility to pain and sorrow or a forgetfulness of them. Usually, however, it implies a substitution of something sweet and pleasurable for something painful. "After the fiery stimulants, compounded of brimstone and bigotry, offered by the polemic theologians, the gentle sedative of Montaigne's conversation comes like a draft of nepenthe" (Preserved Smith).

Ana. Emollient, demulcent, *balm, salve.

Ant. Stimulant; irritant.

anoint. 1 *Oil, inunct, cream, grease, pomade, pomatum, lubricate.

2 Anoint, chrism, anele agree in meaning to smear ceremonially, especially in the administration of a sacrament, with oil or with chrism (a consecrated oil mixed usually with balm, or with balm and spices). Anoint is now the only one of these words in general use. Anointing is a part of the ritual of baptism, confirmation, holy orders, and extreme unction, and of the coronation of sovereigns. When used colloquially without qualification (as, he was anointed today) it implies the administration of the sacrament of extreme unction to a dying person.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

The phrase "one of the Lord's anointed" is commonly applied to a king, especially to one who has been anointed at his coronation; it is also occasionally used of a priest who has been anointed with chrism in the sacrament of holy orders. Chrism, which denotes to anoint with chrism (that is, consecrated oil), is now rarely found; as, a chrismed child (that is, a baptized or confirmed child). Anele is archaic; though etymologically it is the equivalent of anoint, it is used chiefly (now exclusively) in reference to the sacrament of extreme unction. "Cut off even in . . . my sin, Unhouse'd, disappointed, unaneled" (Shak.).

answer, n. Reply, replication, response, rejoinder, retort. See under ANSWER, v., 1.

Ana. Defense, vindication, justification (see corresponding verbs at MAINTAIN): refutation, rebuttal (see corresponding verbs at DISPROVE).

Con. Question, query, inquiry, interrogation (see corresponding verbs at ASK): summoning or summons, call (see corresponding verbs at SUMMON).

answer, v. 1 Answer, respond, reply, rejoin, retort and their corresponding nouns answer, response, reply (or, in law, replication), rejoinder, retort agree in meaning to say or write, or sometimes, to do, something (or that which is said, written, or done) in return, as to a question, a call, a request, a charge, or the like. One answers, or makes an answer to, the question, call, etc., or the person or thing questioning, calling, etc., when one gives the attention or service demanded by one's situation or office or required by courtesy; as, to answer a query, a letter; to answer the telephone, the doorbell. In specific collocations, the words carry more definite implications; thus, to answer an accusation is to give a detailed, and sometimes, by suggestion, a successful, defense; to have the answers to all the problems is to have their correct solutions. "Hobart . . . could talk; he could assert; produce opinions and information, but he couldn't meet or answer arguments" (R. Macaulay). One responds, or makes a response, to a person who endeavors to elicit an answer or to a thing which serves as a stimulus, when one reacts, often spontaneously and usually without resistance, to the influence; as, to respond immediately to an appeal for help; an unsatisfactory response to a call for recruits; when she smiled, even strangers responded. "Is it true that antiquated legal ideas prevent government from responding effectively to the demands which modern society makes upon it?" (Frankfurter). "A trustful affectionate disposition . . . creates the response which it expects" (B. Russell). Respond and response are used in preference to answer and reply when they refer to the set answers to supplications, as in a litany, or to questions, as in a catechism. "He answered by a deep, gravely accented: 'Thanks, I will,' as though it were a response in church" (Conrad). One replies, or makes a reply, as to a question, charge, argument, or salute (or to a questioner, an accuser, etc.) when one answers so as to cover the same ground (etymologically, reply means "fold back") as the question, charge, etc.; thus, one may answer a letter by merely acknowledging its receipt, but one replies to it (in precise usage) only when one answers all its questions or touches on all points requiring attention;

an answer to a salute is uncertain in its nature if no details are given; a reply to a salute usually indicates that the salute has been returned in kind and spirit. Often, reply is equivalent to answer back, as by echoing, protesting, or, when the question is rhetorical, by agreeing. "The nymph exulting fills with shouts the sky; The walls, the woods, and long canals reply" (Pope). "Theirs not to make reply Theirs not to reason why, Theirs but to do and die" (Tennyson). " 'Who is here so vile that will not love his country? If any, speak; for him have I offended. I pause for a reply.' 'None, Brutus, none' " (Shak.). One rejoins, or makes a rejoinder, in the original senses of these words, when one answers a reply. "The assembly took the governor's reply . . . into consideration, and prepared a suitable rejoinder" (Franklin). In current English, the words are chiefly used in literary dialogue to indicate the speaker and often serve to vary the expression; however, in discriminating use, they often indicate an answer to an unspoken question or to an objection. " 'What are you writing?' the Baronet inquired testily of Adrian, after a pause. . . . 'Do I disturb you, Sir?' rejoined Adrian" (Meredith). "To an abstract objection an abstract rejoinder suffices" (W. James). One retorts, or makes a retort, to an explicit or implicit charge, criticism, attack, or the like, when one responds with an answer that is in effect a retaliation, or a counter charge, criticism, or attack. "It amused me . . . to read the interview and learn that I had . . . uttered a number of trenchant sayings upon female novelists. But the amusement changed to dismay when the ladies began to retort" (Quiller-Couch).

In law, especially in pleading, answer, replication (or reply), and rejoinder are technical terms. Answer is not uniformly used in all English-speaking countries, but in general it is applied to the plea (often including a demurrer) of the defendant in response to the plaintiff's or complainant's allegation; thus, where there is a statute covering the situation, a judgment by default may be entered if no answer is filed. Replication, or in Scots law, reply, is applied to the plaintiff's or complainant's response to the defendant's answer. Rejoinder designates the defendant's response to a replication.

Ana. Primordial, primeval, primal, pristine (see PRIMARY); early.

antenna. Antenna, aerial (or aërial). Antenna is used in radio to designate that part (consisting of conductive material in the form of wire, a rod, ball, tower, or the like) of an apparatus used for radiating radio waves into, or for receiving radio waves from, space. Since the most conspicuous part of an antenna was an elevated (aerial) horizontal wire or wires, aerial has come to be used interchangeably with antenna. In strict scientific usage, however, aerial is restricted to the elevated portion of the conductors used for the reception or transmission of radio waves; as, the aerial and the lead-in of an antenna system. Formerly, antenna was used to designate the part used for reception and aerial the part for transmitting, but today antenna is used for either one; as, transmitting antenna, receiving antenna.

anthem. Hymn, laud, psalm, canticle, antiphon, canon.

anthology. Anthology, garland, florilegium, treasury, thesaurus, corpus, chrestomathy, chapbook are here compared only as designating a literary miscellany, especially one published in book form. Anthology, literally a "gathering of flowers," was originally applied to a collection of epigrams, choice passages, and the like; now it is the usual designation of any collection of literary works, poems or prose writings, or both, representative of an age, a national literature, a literary type, or the like; as, an anthology of contemporary American essays; an anthology of sonnets. Garland and florilegium are more or less poetic equivalents of anthology, though they sometimes suggest selection of choice passages rather than of complete works, and reference to a particular theme, occasion, or the like. "In the reign of James I. they [ballads] began to be collected into little Miscellanies, under the name of Garlands" (Percy). "We have made but a small florilegium from Mr. Hazlitt's remarkable volumes" (J. R. Lowell). Both words are found chiefly in titles of old collections of poetic passages or works. Treasury is more common in modern titles of poetic anthologies, but it distinctively suggests selection of complete poems that are the treasures, or the poems worth preserving, rather than representative specimens, of their age or literature; as, Francis T. Palgrave's "Golden Treasury of English Songs and Lyrics." Thesaurus is more often used, especially in titles, of a collection, or storehouse, of words (as, Roget's "The-saurus of English Words and Phrases") than of writings, but it is occasionally employed in the latter sense by writers and speakers to denote an omnium gatherum, where the principle of selection plays no part and the assemblage of all the writings is the aim; as, Child's "English and Scottish Popular Ballads" is a thesaurus, not an anthology. The technical term, however, for a collection including all the writings on a subject, or by a given author, school, or the like, is corpus. "Though we have a few [early English lyrics], they have not been collected . . . into a corpus, and the total does not appear to be very large" (Saintsbury). A chrestomathy is a collection, usually of extracts from the work of a representative author or group of authors; its purpose is not so much to give pleasure as to provide material for study, as in learning a language. "A general course in Russian Literature in connection with the reading of a historical chrestomathy" (Yale Univ. Catalogue, 1900). Chapbook is mainly a collector's designation of a type of literary miscellany, containing a collection of ballads, tracts, popular tales, or the like, sold by peddlers (or "chapmen").

anthropoid. Anthropoid, anthropomorphous, anthropomorphic agree in meaning like man or a human being. They are, however, not interchangeable. Anthropoid is exclusively applied to animals that bear close physical likenesses to man; as, the anthropoid apes. Anthropomorphous is applicable to anything that may be likened to man in form, appearance, qualities, or characters; as, anthropomorphous natural formations; anthropomorphous idols or deities. Anthropomorphic, the adjectival form of anthropomorphism, or the ascription of human characters to beings not human, especially to the Supreme Being, is applied not only to beings so conceived, but to the conceptions, and the like; as, the anthropomorphic God of Milton's "Paradise Lost"; anthropomorphic religions.

anthropology. Anthropology, ethnology, archaeology (or archeology) are clearly distinguishable sciences, but they are often confused by laymen because the investigations of scholars in these fields are largely (though in the case of the first two far from exclusively) concerned with ancient or primitive races. Anthropology (in the modern sense of that word) is a general term covering many sciences which deal with the physical and cultural evolution of the human species from prehistoric times to the present. One very important branch of anthropology is ethnology, which is concerned with the origin, development, geographical distribution, and distinguishing characters of the human races. Archaeology is rather a branch of history than of anthropology but since its field is the investigation of prehistoric and ancient cultures and civilizations and a study of their remains (fossil human relics, implements, artifacts, monuments, etc.), it supplies the material evidence which gives anthropologists and ethnologists some of the data from which they may draw their conclusions.

antipasto. *Appetizer, hors d'oeuvre, smörgåsbord.

antipathetic. Antipathetic, unsympathetic, averse are often used as if they were synonyms. They are, however, not interchangeable if employed in the senses sanctioned by the best usage. In very discriminating use, antipathetic is applied only to things (or to persons objectively considered) which are disagreeable, distasteful, uncongenial, abhorrent, or repellent. "The whole place and everything about it was antipathetic to her" (Trollope). "Settlers to whom this formula was antipathetic were asked to go elsewhere" (A. Repplier). "Ushering in the year with a series of calls on the most remote and the most personally antipathetic of our innumerable relations" (A. Huxley). In loose and dubiously correct use, the word is applied to persons (or groups of persons) as though it were the antonym of sympathetic; in the attributive position, it is definitely objectionable (as, an antipathetic doctor), but in the predicate position it is, at least, countenanced, especially when it implies animosity and not merely the absence of sympathy; as, "these nations are antipathetic and cannot unite" (Harper's Mag.). In this illustration, however, the addition of "to each other" after antipathetic would (probably) not alter the writer's meaning but would both clarify it and improve his English. Unsympathetic, on the other hand, is with rare exceptions applied to persons (or to things personified or thought of as expressing personal feeling) and suggests an attitude of indifference or insensitiveness or the absence of a response to an appeal to one's interest or emotions; as, an unsympathetic nurse; an unsympathetic review of a new book. Averse (for synonyms in this sense see DISINCLINED) is closer to unsympathetic than to antipathetic in that it suggests the spirit in which a person meets something objective rather than the effect of a thing upon a person. However, averse implies not merely a lack of response, but a definite turning away, and consequently either avoidance or rejection; as, to be averse to a suggestion; to be averse from exercise on a hot day. Thus, a man may be unsympathetic by nature yet not be averse to helping the worthy poor; the undeserving he would confine to institutions, for shiftlessness is utterly antipathetic to him. In general, it may be said that one is averse to (or from) anything which is antipathetic to one.

Ana. Repellent, *repugnant, distasteful, abhorrent, obnoxious: *offensive, loathsome, repulsive, revolting.

Ant. Congenial. — Con. Attractive, alluring, charming (see under ATTRACT): sympathetic, compatible, *consonant: agreeable, grateful, gratifying, pleasing, *pleasant.

antipathy. 1 Antagonism, *enmity, hostility, animosity, rancor, animus.

Ana. Repugnance, abhorrence, repellency, distaste (see corresponding adjectives at REPUGNANT): avoidance, evasion, eschewal, escape (see corresponding verbs at ESCAPE).

Ant. Taste (for): affection (for). — Con. *Attraction, sympathy: *predilection, partiality, prepossession: *attachment, love.

2 Antipathy, aversion are closer synonyms than their corresponding adjectives when they denote the state of mind created by that which is antipathetic to one. Antipathy distinctively implies an emotional state, often a settled emotion, which prevents reconciliation or contact, or which, more often, definitely implies hostility (see ENMITY). Aversion, on the other hand, suggests a predisposition, or an unwillingness to meet, encounter, or entertain, which shows itself in avoidance or rejection rather than in hatred; thus, one has an antipathy to cats who is violently repelled by them and drives them from one's presence; one has an aversion to cats who merely avoids contact with them.

antisepsis. See under STERILE.

2 *Sterile, aseptic.

antiseptic, n. Antiseptic, germicide, bactericide, disinfectant, bacteriophage, phage, antitoxin agree in denoting an agent that interferes with the growth and activity of microorganisms. An antiseptic is an agent that prevents or arrests the growth and activity of microorganisms, especially disease germs, without necessarily killing them. The word is most commonly applied to substances, such as solutions of alcohol, bichloride of mercury, boric acid, or iodine, that are mild enough to be used on living tissue. The word germicide is used of an agent that kills microorganisms, or, in its specific sense, disease germs. It is commonly applied to strong chemicals which cannot safely be used on living tissues, and to heat, sunlight, and the like. A bactericide is a germicide that destroys all kinds of bacteria (but does not necessarily kill bacterial spores). A disinfectant is a germicide, usually a chemical, used to kill disease germs and other harmful microorganisms in sources of infection, such as drains, sick rooms, clothing, bedding, laboratories, and stables. Disinfectant is sometimes applied to any of certain substances, such as chloride of lime, which destroy disagreeable odors by interfering with the activity of the bacteria causing putrefaction. The same distinctions hold for the corresponding adjectives antiseptic, germicidal, bactericidal, disinfectant. Bacteriophage (or its shortened form phage) and antitoxin differ from the preceding terms in applying to substances produced in a living body and effective in destroying disease germs or in counteracting the poison or toxin they create. Bacteriophage applies specifically to a bacteria-destroying agent normally found in the intestinal tract of those recovering from a bacterial disease, and in blood, urine, pus, and the like. Antitoxin applies specifically to a substance produced in the body of a human being or animal which is effective in counteracting the toxin developed by an infectious disease. In ordinary use, however, the term designates a substance produced in the body of an animal, such as a horse, by the injection of the toxin of diphtheria and used in the treatment of persons suffering from that disease.

Ana. Epitome, brief, abstract, *abridgment.

aperient, aperitive. *Physic, laxative, purgative, cathartic, purge.

apéritif. *Appetizer.

aperture. Aperture, interstice, orifice are general terms denoting an opening allowing passage through or in and out. Aperture is applied especially to any opening in a thing that otherwise presents a solid or closed surface or structure; it may be applied to an opening that is a flaw, such as a crack or cleft, or to one that is structurally essential; as, daylight filtered through small apertures in the dungeon's outside wall; windows are apertures to admit light and air; the aperture of a camera; pores are minute apertures in the skin through which moisture is exuded and absorbed. Interstice is applied to any unfilled space, or gap, or interval, especially in a fabric (in its widest sense), or in a mass. It is especially applicable to any of the openings in something that is loose in texture, coarse-grained, layered, piled up, and the like; as, the interstices between the stones of the wall were not filled with mortar; a mesh is one of the interstices in a fish net, a wire screen or sieve, or the like. Interstice is also used of time, in the sense of an empty interval; as, "What . . . do they do . . . in all the mysterious interstices of their lives?" (L. P. Smith). Orifice (now chiefly in technical or literary use) is applied to any opening that serves chiefly as a mouth or as a vent; as, the orifice of the bladder; the orifice of a chimney; the orifice of a wound. "Horror . . . when Mongibello belches forth from all its orifices its sulphureous fires" (Borrow).

Ana. Perforation, puncture, bore, prick (see corresponding verbs at PERFORATE): *hole, hollow, cavity: slit, slash, cut (see corresponding verbs at CUT).

apex. 1 Apex, vertex are so often used interchangeably with reference to the tip or top point of a cone, a pyramid, a conic section, or the like, that a fundamental difference in implications is often ignored. Apex has particular reference to the sharpness or angularity of the point or tip; it may or may not in its literal application to things imply that this is the highest point; thus, the apex of the heart is its lower and pointed end; the apex of a lung is its upper cone-shaped end. Apex may also refer to the converging point of two lines whether they extend in a vertical plane or not; as, the apex of a leaf; the apex, or crest, of a vein in a mine. Vertex, as a rule and apart from some technical senses in mathematics, implies a base (real or assumed) and therefore a top or highest point. This implication is retained when the word is applied to concrete things; thus, the vertex of the head or of the skull is the highest point, or the upper end of its axis; vertex in astronomy is the zenith either with reference to the observer or to the particular body under observation.

2 Peak, *summit, culmination, pinnacle, climax, acme, meridian, zenith, apogee.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

aphorism. Apothegm, epigram, *saying, saw, maxim, adage, proverb, motto.

aphrodisiac or aphrodisiacal. *Erotic, amatory, amorous.

Ant. Anaphrodisiac.

apiece. *Each, severally, individually, respectively.

aplomb. Assurance, self-assurance, self-possession, *confidence, self-confidence.

Ana. Coolness, collectedness, nonchalance, imperturbability (see corresponding adjectives at COOL): *equanimity, composure, sang-froid: poise, savoir-faire (see TACT).

Ant. Shyness. — Con. Embarrassment, discomfiture (see corresponding verbs at EMBARRASS): confusion, befuddlement (see corresponding verbs at CONFUSE): perplexity, bewilderment, distraction (see corresponding verbs at PUZZLE).

apocalypse. Vision, *revelation, prophecy.

⚠ Do not confuse apocalypse with apocrypha.

apocalyptic or apocalyptical. See under REVELATION.

Ana. Visionary, *imaginary, chimerical, quixotic: *mysterious, arcane, inscrutable: mystic, *mystical, anagogical: grandiose, magnificent, august, *grand.

apocrypha. Apocrypha, pseudepigrapha denote certain Jewish and early Christian writings of doubtful authenticity or authority. Apocrypha is the general term for all such writings, especially for those which have not been admitted into the canons of the Old and New Testaments. The term, however, in general and in specifically Protestant use, is applied narrowly (written with a capital letter) to a group of books or of parts of books which belong to the Old Testament in the Vulgate (the standard Latin version of the Roman Catholic Church) and were rejected by the Protestant reformers because not found in the Hebrew. These books had been and still are admitted as canonical books in the Roman Catholic versions on the ground that they are found in the Septuagint, the Greek version of the Old Testament, and quoted in the New Testament. They are, however, distinguished in Roman Catholic use from the books found in the Hebrew by the designation deuterocanonical books (that is, books of a second, or later, canon). Pseudepigrapha, in its more common meaning, designates as a group a large number of Jewish and Christian writings attributed to various Biblical characters but held to be spurious or of doubtful authenticity. Protestants, as a rule, use this term in preference to apocrypha for Jewish writings of this description which Roman Catholics, also as a rule, call the "Old Testament apocrypha." All Christian works of this character are called New Testament apocrypha by both Protestants and Catholics.

apocryphal. Mythical, *fictitious, legendary, fabulous.

Ana. Questionable, dubious, *doubtful.

Con. Genuine, *authentic, veritable, bona fide.

apodictic or apodeictic, apodictical or apodeictical. Necessary, inevitable, *certain.

Ana. Proved, demonstrated, tried, tested (see PROVE).

Ant. Indemonstrable.

apogee. Climax, peak, culmination, apex, acme, meridian, zenith, *summit, pinnacle.

Ant. Perigee.

apologetic or apologetical. *Controversial, polemic, polemical.

Ana. Explanatory or explaining, expounding, interpretative or interpreting, elucidating (see corresponding verbs at EXPLAIN): defending, justifying, vindicating (see MAINTAIN).

apologia. *Apology, excuse, plea, alibi, pretext.

Ana. Defense, justification, vindication (see corresponding verbs at MAINTAIN): interpretation, elucidation, explanation (see corresponding verbs at EXPLAIN).

apologue. Fable, *allegory, parable, myth.

apology. Apology, apologia, excuse, plea, pretext, alibi come into comparison when they denote the reason or reasons offered in explanation or defense of an act, a policy, a view, or the like. In modern, especially popular, use apology implies that one has been, at least apparently, in the wrong; it suggests either a defense that brings forward palliating circumstances, or a frank acknowledgment of error, with an expression of regret, by way of reparation. "Pardon us the interruption of thy devotion . . . '—My lord, there needs no such apology'" (Shak.). In its older sense, still used by discriminating writers, it implies no admission of guilt or error but a desire to make clear the grounds for some course, belief, or the like, that appears wrong to others; as, Sidney's "Apologie for Poetrie"; "Apologies for various . . . doctrines of the faith" (Newman). Apologia is now often used in English in place of apology in this latter sense. "Basil de Selincourt's apologia for Ruskin in the Contemporary Review" (The Nation). "Viscount Grey of Fallodon . . . the other day delivered an apologia for democracy" (N. Y. Times). Excuse always implies an intent to remove or avoid blame, as for a neglect of duty, a failure to accomplish an end, or a violation of a rule, a law, a custom. "Achilles will not to the field tomorrow" — "What's his excuse?" (Shak.). "We have forty million reasons for failure, but not a single excuse!" (Kipling). "His pride . . . does not offend me so much as pride often does, because there is an excuse for it" (Austen). Plea stresses argument or appeal to others for understanding or sympathy. "Old Hepzibah's scowl could no longer vindicate itself entirely on the plea of nearsightedness" (N. Hawthorne). "He mumbled something about not having a license [for hunting], and was putting that in for a plea against the expedition" (Meredith). Pretext invariably suggests subterfuge and the offering of one reason or motive in place of the true one. "He made my health a pretext for taking all the heavy chores, long after I was as well as he was" (Cather). Alibi (literally, elsewhere) in law designates a plea of having been in another place at the time a crime was committed. In its broader colloquial use, it implies a desire to shift blame or to evade punishment. It commonly connotes plausibility rather than truth in the excuse offered. "We lie to ourselves, in order that we may still have the excuse of ignorance, the alibi of stupidity and incomprehension, possessing which we can continue with a good conscience to commit and tolerate . . . crimes" (A. Huxley).

Ana. Defense, justification, vindication (see corresponding verbs at MAINTAIN): extenuation, palliation, glozing, whitewashing (see corresponding verbs at PALLIATE): amends, *reparation.

apoplexy. Stroke, shock. See PARALYSIS.

apostasy. Desertion, *defection.

apostate, n. *Renegade, pervert, turncoat, recreant, backslider.

Ana. Deserter, forsaker, abandoner (see corresponding verbs at ABANDON): *heretic, schismatic, dissenter, non-conformist.

Con. *Convert, proselyte.

apostle. 1 *Disciple, evangelist.

2 *Missionary, evangelist, revivalist.

apothecary. Pharmacist, pharmaceutist, *druggist, chemist.

apothegm. Aphorism, epigram, *saying, saw, maxim, adage, proverb, motto.

apotheosis. Sublimation, *paragon, phoenix, nonpareil, onesuch.

appall or appal. Horrify, *dismay, daunt.

Ana. Terrify, affright, *frighten: confound, dumfound, bewilder (see PUZZLE).

Ant. Nerve, embolden. — Con. Energize, *vitalize, activate: *comfort, solace, console.

appalling. *Fearful, dreadful, terrible, horrible, frightful, shocking, awful, terrific, horrific.

Ana. Dismaying, horrifying, daunting (see DISMAY, v.): bewildering, dumfounding, confounding (see PUZZLE, v.).

Ant. Reassuring.

appanage or apanage. Prerogative, perquisite, birthright, *right.

apparatus. 1 *Equipment, gear, tackle, outfit, paraphernalia, machinery, matériel.

Ana. Tool, *implement, utensil, instrument: network, *system, scheme.

2 *Machine, appliance, engine.

Ana. *Device, contrivance, contraption, gadget.

apparel, v. *Clothe, attire, tire, dress, array, robe, vest, invest.

Ana. Outfit, accouter, appoint, equip (see FURNISH).

Ant. Divest. — Con. *Strip, bare, dismantle, denude.

apparel, n. *Clothes, clothing, dress, attire, tire, raiment, vesture, array.

apparent. 1 *Evident, manifest, patent, distinct, obvious, palpable, plain, clear.

Ana. Discernible, noticeable (see corresponding verbs at SEE): *perceptible, ponderable, tangible, appreciable.

Ant. Unintelligible. — Con. *Obscure, dark, enigmatic, vague, ambiguous, cryptic.

2 Apparent, illusory, seeming, ostensible agree in meaning not really or actually that which it appears to be. That is apparent which, however evident it may be from the point of view of the unaided senses, is not borne out by scientific investigation or by a knowledge of all the facts or circumstances; as, the apparent size of the sun; "the apparent loss of weight of a body immersed in water" (Karl K. Darrow). "I am anxious to leave you apparent, for it is really more apparent than real, our apparent worldliness" (C. Mackenzie). That is illusory which is the result of a false impression and acquires a character or appearance other than that found in the real thing, or which seems to exist when it is actually non-existent. The deception may be the result of one's sense limitations, as in an optical illusion, or of a misleading appearance assumed by something else, as in certain natural phenomena (a mirage or will o' the wisp), or of one's own state of mind which colors or alters the objective reality, or of the strong stimulation of the imagination, as by a work of art, that causes one to accept as real that which is purely imaginary; as, lengthwise stripes give an illusory height to the figure; illusory pools of water on a highway; a lover often attributes an illusory beauty to his beloved. "The beautiful is in a certain sense illusory, or rather contains an element of illusion" (S. Alexander). That is seeming which is so like the reality in appearance that it may be mistaken for it. Seeming usually implies a character in the thing observed rather than, as the two preceding words, a defect of observation. Often, but not invariably, it suggests an intent to deceive or delude. "Miss Wilmot's reception [of him] was mixed with seeming neglect, and yet I could perceive she acted a studied part" (Goldsmith). "The whole of Burns's song has an air of straight dealing . . . but these seeming simplicities are craftily charged . . . with secondary purposes, ulterior intimations" (C. E. Montague). That is ostensible which is explicitly declared, professed, or avowed (as an aim or motive), or which has the outward marks of the character ascribed to it, yet which, by implication, may not be its true aim, or motive, or character; thus, when one says that the ostensible purpose of a naval review is the celebration of a national holiday, one implies that there may be another, deeper, and more significant purpose not revealed, such as mobilization for war. "Natives from independent and feudatory courts whose ostensible business was the repair of broken necklaces . . . but whose real end seemed to be to raise money for angry Maharanees or young Rajahs" (Kipling).

Ana. *False, wrong: deceptive, delusory, delusive, *misleading: specious, credible, *plausible.

Ant. Real. — Con. Actual, true (see REAL): intrinsic, *inherent, essential.

apparition. Apparition, phantasm, phantom, wraith, fetch, ghost, spirit, specter, shade, revenant, spook, haunt (or hant) agree in meaning a visible but immaterial appearance of a person or thing, especially a likeness of a dead person or of a person or thing that is not physically present. Apparition, phantasm, phantom all stress the illusory character of that which appears to the sight, but apparition often connotes suddenness or unexpectedness of coming, phantasm the workings of a disordered or overexcited imagination, and phantom a dreamlike character and form without substance, or shape without body or mass. "[Enter the ghost of Caesar] . . . I think it is the weakness of mine eyes That shapes this monstrous apparition" (Shak.). "Horrible forms, What and who are ye? Never yet there came Phantasms so foul thro' monster-teeming Hell" (Shelley). "So live and laugh, nor be dismayed As one by one the phantoms go" (E. A. Robinson). Wraith and fetch specifically denote an apparition of a living person that appears to a friend or relative and portends the former's death, but both are also used of an apparition of a dead person. "She was uncertain if it were the gypsy or her wraith" (Scott). "The Earl of Cornwall met the fetch of his friend William Rufus" (E. B. Tylor). Wraith, especially in extended use, stresses the insubstantial and evanescent character of the apparition. "O hollow wraith of dying fame, Fade wholly, while the soul exults" (Tennyson). The remaining words in their literal senses all denote an apparition of a dead person. Ghost and spirit are the familiar and general terms for a disembodied soul; specter (not necessarily human) connotes more of the mysterious or terrifying. "Ghosts, wandering here and there, Troop home to churchyards" (Shak.). "I am thy father's spirit, Doom'd for a certain term to walk the night" (Shak.). "Grisly spectres, which the Fiend had raised" (Milton). "Lo! when the service was ended, a form appeared on the threshold . . . Why does the bridegroom start and stare at the strange apparition? . . . Is it a phantom of air . . . ? Is it a ghost from the grave . . . ?" (Longfellow). Shade (a somewhat literary word, commonly with classical reference) usually connotes impalpability but it stresses personality rather than mode of appearance; as, "mighty heroes' more majestic shades" (Dryden); "How once we lov'd, remember still, Till you are dust like me" (Dear Shade! I will" (Pope). Revenant, when it denotes a ghost, carries none of the implications of the other terms for a disembodied spirit except the return from the grave; it is therefore used often in straight prose or where a term without emotional connotations is desirable. "Thus, our revenant from a hundred years ago would find us occupied yet with measuring intensities of force" (Karl K. Darrow). "I felt for a queer moment of hallucination more of a ghost than the ghost I had come to visit—a revenant out of a rowdy present into the more stately epoch" (L. P. Smith). Spook is now a humorous and colloquial term something like specter in its suggestion of a terrifying character. Haunt or hant is a dialectal term common in some parts of the United States for ghost, especially for one that frequently revisits a spot or house.

Ana. Illusion, *delusion, hallucination.

appeal, v. Plead, pray, sue, petition. See under PRAYER.

Ana. Implore, *beg, beseech, entreat, supplicate: solicit, request, *ask.

Con. *Demand, exact, claim: protest, kick, *object.

appeal, n. Plea, *prayer, petition, suit.

Ana. Entreating or entreaty, beseeching, supplicating or supplication, imploring (see corresponding verbs at BEG): soliciting or solicitation, requesting or request, asking (see corresponding verbs at ASK).

Con. Demanding or demand, exacting or exaction, claim (see corresponding verbs at DEMAND): protesting or protest, objecting or objection, kicking (see corresponding verbs at OBJECT).

appear. 1 Appear, loom, emerge carry basically the same meaning: to come out into view. Actually, however, they are only rarely interchangeable. Appear is weakest in its implication of a definite, physical background or a source; consequently it sometimes means merely to become visible or to become apparent (see EVIDENT); as, one by one the stars appeared in the sky; nothing appears in the testimony to cause suspicion of another's guilt. Sometimes it means to present oneself in public in a particular capacity or to be presented or given out to the public; as, Lawyer Blank appeared as counsel for the defendant; Booth appeared nightly as Hamlet for the last two weeks of his run; the new biography of Lincoln will appear next month; weeklies usually appear on Thursday or Friday. Loom seems to have been used originally of ships appearing on the horizon, but later acquired the meaning of appearing as through a mist or haze. "A smear of . . . lead-coloured paint had been laid on to obliterate Henchard's name, though its letters dimly loomed through like ships in a fog" (Hardy). "Between the bed and the ottoman . . . the cot loomed in the shadows" (Bennett). Because things seen in a fog are often magnified by their indistinct outlines, loom, especially when followed in figurative use by large, great, etc., or when followed by up, suggests apparent, and sometimes appalling, magnitude. "Some mornings it [a mesa] would loom up above the dark river like a blazing volcanic mountain" (Cather). "That which loomed immense to fancy low before my reason lies" (Browning). Emerge definitely implies a coming out into the open from something that envelops: the word therefore presupposes a period or condition of concealment, obscurity, gestation, insignificance, or the like; as, the sun emerged from the clouds; after a long hunt for him, we saw him emerging from the crowd. "That part of northern Ohio where the Bentley farms lay had begun to emerge from pioneer life" (S. Anderson). "Lord Sligo emerges from this account as an able and conscientious administrator" (Times Lit. Sup.).

Ana. *Come, arrive: issue, emanate, rise, arise, *spring.

Ant. Disappear: vanish. — Con. Depart, retire, withdraw, *go, leave.

2 *Seem, look.

appearance. Appearance, look, aspect, semblance are here considered primarily as general terms denoting the outward show presented by a person or thing. Appearance often carries no additional implications; as, "Judge not according to the appearance" (John vii. 24); "In drawing, represent the appearances of things, never what you know the things to be" (Ruskin). The word, however, frequently implies an apparent, as opposed to an actual or genuine, character and therefore often connotes hypocrisy, dissembling, pretense, or the like, when used of persons or of their acts and works. "To be able to tyrannize effectively they needed the title and appearance of constitutional authority" (A. Huxley). "They spent their lives trying to keep up appearances, and to make his salary do more than it could" (Cather). In its general application, look is often indistinguishable from appearance, except that it more often occurs in the plural; as, never judge a thing merely by its looks. They are not interchangeable, however, in all instances. When a personal impression or a judgment is implied, appearance is the precise word. "Aristotle . . . while admitting that Plato's scheme has a plausible appearance of philanthropy, maintains that it is inapplicable to the facts of human nature" (G. L. Dickinson). When the emphasis is upon concrete details, such as of color, shape, expression, observable to everybody, look is the proper choice; as, he had the look of a man who works indoors and takes little exercise. "I choose my friends for their good looks, my acquaintances for their good characters, and my enemies for their good intellects" (Wilde). Specifically look is often applied to a person's expression, as manifest in one's face or posture. "She had a look about her That I wish I could forget— The look of a scared thing Sitting in a net!" (Millay). Aspect, like look, stresses the features of a person or thing, but when applied to persons, it usually distinctively suggests the characteristic or habitual appearance and expression, especially facial expression; as, "Not risking a landing because of the fierce aspect of the natives" (V. Heiser); "he was a very handsome man, of a commanding aspect" (Austen). Aspect often specifically implies reference to all the features that give a distinguishing appearance to a place at a definite moment, an age, a particular situation, or the like. "The aspect of affairs was very alarming" (Dickens). "Fifty years from now, it may be, the olive tree will almost have disappeared from southern France, and Provence will wear another aspect" (A. Huxley). Semblance comes into comparison with the other words of this group because it basically implies outward seeming, without necessarily suggesting a false appearance. Nevertheless, it is rarely used in this sense without an expressed or implied contrast between the outward appearance and the inner reality. "Thou, whose exterior semblance doth belie Thy Soul's immensity" (Wordsworth). Consequently, the word frequently implies a false appearance or a counterfeit of the truth. "It was also a snuff-box that brought about the only semblance of reconciliation that ever occurred" (Lucas). Sometimes, however, the word stresses the likeness of the thing to something else, without suggesting deceptiveness in the appearance. "A piked road that even then had begun to take on the semblance of a street" (S. Anderson).

appease. *Pacify, placate, mollify, propitiate, conciliate.

Ana. Assuage, alleviate, mitigate, lighten, *relieve: *palliate, extenuate: *satisfy, content.

Ant. Exasperate, aggravate. — Con. Perturb, upset, disturb, *discompose: vex, irk, *annoy, bother: *anger, incense, enrage, infuriate.

appellation. *Name, title, designation, denomination, style.

append. *Add, subjoin, annex, superadd.

Ana. Affix, attach, *fasten.

Con. *Detach, disengage: curtail (see SHORTEN).

appendage. Appendage, appurtenance, accessory, adjunct agree in designating something regarded as additional, and at the same time as subsidiary, to another object. Appendage implies a certain closeness of attachment or connection, yet often stresses (esp. when used of a person), even to mild contempt, the idea of subordination; as, the caudal appendage; the smaller borough is a mere appendage of the larger. "Those graceful and useless appendages, called Directors" (Scott). Appurtenance is applied to something that belongs to the principal object, or goes with it customarily, yet is not an integral part of it, as the barns, outhouses, gardens, etc., on a piece of land, or the permanent fixtures in a building. "The bed itself, with all appurtenances of palliasses, mattresses, etc." (Barham). Accessory is applied usually to that which is dispensable yet contributes to the appearance, usefulness, comfort, convenience, or the like, of the principal thing; as, automobile accessories; costume accessories. Adjunct is applied to that which is or may be added or joined to the principal thing without becoming an essential part of it. "In the great age of Louis XIV, it [the ballet] became an established institution, still an adjunct of opera" (H. Ellis). "Metre and rhyme are not mere adjuncts of poetry" (S. Alexander).

appendix. Appendix, addendum or (pl.) addenda, supplement come into comparison when they designate additional matter subjoined to a book. Appendix is used of appended material which contributes, by way of illustration, amplification, citation of documents, etc., to the effectiveness of a treatment that is still relatively complete in itself. Addendum and supplement, however, agree in implying that the additional matter is essential to completeness of treatment, but differ in that addendum suggests greater brevity and is frequently used of material added to supply omissions, while supplement implies larger compass, and is often applied to material added after some lapse of time, often as a separate publication, to embody later information. When the additional matter of an addendum is a list, as of words or items, the plural addenda is often used instead of addendum.

apperception. Assimilation, identification, *recognition.

appertain. Pertain, belong, relate, *bear, apply appetence or appetency. Appetite, *desire, concupiscence, lust, passion, urge, yen appetite. Appetence, *desire, concupiscence, lust, passion, urge, yen.

Ana., Con. See those at APPETITE.

Ana. Hungering or hunger, thirsting or thirst, yearning, longing (see corresponding verbs at LONG): craving, wishing, coveting (see DESIRE, v.): impulse, spring, *motive: *cupidity, greed.

Con. Abnegation, self-abnegation, self-denial, *renunciation: asceticism (see under ASCETIC, n.): repugnance, distaste (see corresponding adjectives at REPUGNANT).

appetizer. Appetizer, hors d'oeuvre, antipasto, smörgåsbord, apéritif. Appetizer is the comprehensive term denoting any food or drink served in advance of a meal as a whet to the appetite. In American use, appetizer is a generic term including cocktails and any savory tidbit served before going to the table, or a first course, such as of oysters, clams, a fruit cocktail, or a canapé served at the table. Hors d'oeuvre, a French term widely current in English-speaking countries in place of appetizer, may be used of any savory, salt, smoked, tart, or uncooked food served with cocktails or as a first course at table. Its more common plural form, hors d'oeuvres, generally suggests a tray of such foods from which one selects what pleases one's taste. The typical hors d'oeuvres include small sausages, small molds of potted or jellied meats, sliced salt meats, sardines, anchovies, herrings, crevettes, canapés, olives, radishes, tomatoes, fresh fruits such as figs and melon, and the like. Sometimes hot foods are added, such as small patties or snails in a sauce. Fresh butter is a characteristic French addition. Antipasto designates an Italian collection of cold appetizers, usually served as an essential first course of a complete dinner and on an individual plate. Antipasto characteristically, but not invariably, includes salami, anchovy, sliced ham, sliced tomatoes, celery, radishes, and olives on a bed of lettuce. Smörgåsbord, the comparable Swedish term, is now used widely in the United States for a collection of appetizers similar to hors d'oeuvres, but characteristically displayed on a table or sideboard, and presenting a more extensive variety of cold and hot dishes. Smörgåsbord is preferable to hors d'oeuvres as a designation when there is a wider choice of dishes and an emphasis on heartier foods (not tidbits) such as smoked salmon, cheese, hard-boiled eggs, the heavier sausages, and the like. Fish in various forms (pickled, smoked, paste, etc.) usually predominates in smörgåsbord. An apéritif is a small drink of liquor (vermouth, sherry, and the like) taken shortly before lunch or dinner for the purpose of, or under the pretext of, stimulating the appetite. In somewhat loose use, the meaning of this word has been at times extended to be equivalent to appetizer, but in France, where the term originated, it is used of liquor alone.

appetizing. *Palatable, relishing, tasty, toothsome, flavorsome, savory, sapid, saporous.

Ant. Nauseating.

applaud. 1 Applaud, cheer, hurrah, huzza, root agree in meaning to demonstrate one's feeling, especially one's approbation or joy, audibly and enthusiastically. Applaud specifically and usually implies hand clapping; as, it is not the custom to applaud preachers; the audiences at grand opera are asked to applaud only at the end of an act or scene; each graduate was applauded as he came up to receive his diploma. Cheer suggests shouting, usually of meaningless words such as rah-rah-rah, hip-hip-hooray, or of a set form of words adopted by a school, college or organization as its own; in one very modern use, it implies organized rather than spontaneous effort, and includes singing as well as shouting. Cheer differs from applaud also in its purpose, which is chiefly that of encouraging or inspiring individuals or a team going into or taking part in a competition or contest; often, however, it suggests jubilation aroused by a successful play or a brilliant feat. Hurrah and huzza also suggest shouting, but they emphasize the shouting of these particular words in unison and as an expression particularly of triumph and exultation, as over a military or political victory. The words are now less used in speech than formerly. Root, which is peculiarly American slang, may imply cheering or applauding, but it stresses encouragement as the motive. Consequently, in extended use, it implies strong partisanship and vocal public championship of that which one favors; as, to root for a candidate; to root for one's home team or one's town's advantages.

Ana. Acclaim, extol (see PRAISE).

Ant. Hiss: boo. — Con. Deride, taunt, *ridicule, mock.

2 *Commend, compliment, recommend.

Ana. *Praise, eulogize, laud: *approve, endorse, sanction.

Ant. Disparage: criticize. — Con. *Decry, depreciate, belittle: censure, reprobate (see CRITICIZE): *disapprove, deprecate.

applause. Applause, acclamation, acclaim, plaudits agree, both in their concrete and abstract senses, in denoting public expression of approbation. Applause usually suggests loudness or liveliness of demonstration, and often carries its literal implication of clapping hands; as, she waited until the applause died down; round after round of applause greeted him. However, it may be used to designate any other noisy or emphatic expression of approval, such as stamping of feet, cheering, or waving of flags. "Applause rang out from a hundred thousand throats" (Froude). "Caps, hands, and tongues, applaud it to the clouds" (Shak.). Acclamation adds to applause the implications of eagerness, enthusiasm, and, often, unanimity of assent: it often retains its etymological implication of crying out; as, he was nominated to the office by acclamation; that is, without a ballot, and, usually, with emphatically voiced approval; his speech was received with acclamation. Acclaim is more poetic than acclamation, though often interchanged with the latter; it sometimes carries implications of loftier deeds and more enduring esteem than acclamation; as, the heroes were hailed with acclaim; his poetry met with universal acclaim. Plaudits (the singular form is rare), though literally equal to applause, may suggest polite or gracious, rather than demonstrative, expressions of approval. "The colonel bowed and smiled with very pleasant good-nature at our plaudits" (Thackeray).

Ana. Cheering or cheers, hurraing or hurrahs, huzzaing or huzzas, rooting (see corresponding verbs at APPLAUD).
Ant. Hisses: boos. — Con. Deriding or derision, taunting or taunts, ridiculing or ridicule, twitting, mocking (see corresponding verbs at RIDICULE).

appliance. 1 Tool, *implement, instrument, utensil.

Ana. Accessory, adjunct (see APPENDAGE): *device, contrivance, gadget.

2 Apparatus, *machine, engine.

applicable. *Relevant, pertinent, apposite, apropos, germane, material.

Ana. *Fit, suitable, appropriate, apt, felicitous, happy, meet, fitting, proper.

Ant. Inapplicable. — Con. *Impertinent: inept, *awkward.

4 *Bear, relate, pertain, appertain.

appoint. 1 Name, *designate, nominate, elect.

Ana. *Choose, select, pick, single out: commission, *authorize, accredit.

Con. *Dismiss, discharge, cashier.

2 *Furnish, equip, accouter, outfit, arm.

Ana. Garnish, beautify, embellish, bedeck, deck (see ADORN): array, vest, invest (see CLOTHE).

Con. Dismantle, divest, denude, *strip.

appointed. Destined, *prescribed.

Ana. Allotted, assigned (see ALLOT): forecast, foretold, predicted (see FORECAST, v.): determined, decided, settled (see DECIDE).

appointment. *Engagement, rendezvous, tryst, assignation, date.

apportion. 1 Allocate, *allot, assign.

Ana. *Distribute, divide, dispense, deal, dole: *share, participate, partake.

Con. *Gather, collect, assemble: consolidate, concentrate, *compact.

2 Apportion, portion, parcel, ration, prorate agree in meaning to divide something carefully and distribute it among a number. Apportion suggests division on a just, fair, or equitable basis; it does not, however, imply equality in the divisions or in the persons or things affected by the distribution; as, to apportion one's time among various employments; to apportion the residue of an estate according to the terms of a will; "to apportion the judicial power between the supreme and inferior courts" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Portion (often with out) commonly, but not necessarily, suggests division into shares; as, to portion out the leftovers from a banquet to the servants; the country was portioned out among the petty chiefs. Parcel (commonly with out) does not always imply immediate distribution, but it does imply division for the sake of ultimate distribution among purchasers, heirs, etc.; it is the preferred word when that which is divided is cut into pieces or lots or is distributed in small amounts. "It could be parceled out into lots fifty by one hundred feet at five hundred dollars per lot" (Dreiser). "[In the seventeenth century] colonies were estates to be exploited for the benefit of the home merchants, and the world was parceled out among privileged companies" (J. H. Randall, jr.). Ration usually implies authoritative allowance and an equal division of necessities (fuel, food, clothing, and the like) according to some principle such as that of adequacy, sufficiency, or dietary variety, or, when the available supply is limited or scanty, that of fairness to all; as, to ration the food for horses; it was found necessary to ration coal, flour, and sugar in the United States during the World War; the drinking water was rationed during the prolonged voyage. Prorate (chiefly U. S.) implies proportional division (sometimes proportional assessment) for the sake of fairness to those concerned: it may imply an authoritative decision, as by a legislature, or an agreement among those concerned; as, to prorate employment among the workers during slack seasons; to prorate the annual production of oil by the various companies; to prorate overhead expenses among the various departments of a company.

Ana. *Grant, accord, award: *give, bestow: *separate, divide, part.

apposite. Pertinent, germane, *relevant, apropos, applicable, material.

Ana. Felicitous, happy, apt, appropriate, suitable, *fit, fitting: pat, timely opportune, *seasonable.

Ant. Inapposite, inapt. — Con. *Impertinent: *awkward, inept: casual, hit-or-miss, haphazard, *random.

appraise or apprise. Value, *estimate, evaluate, assay, rate, assess.

Ana. *Judge, adjudge: determine, ascertain, *discover: inspect, examine, *scrutinize, audit.

appraising. See under ESTIMATE, v.

appreciable. *Perceptible, sensible, ponderable, palpable, tangible.

Ana. Apparent, *evident: discernible, noticeable (see corresponding verbs at SEE).

Ant. Inappreciable. — Con. Impalpable, imponderable, *imperceptible, intangible, insensible.

appreciate. 1 Comprehend, *understand.

Ana. Appraise, value, rate, *estimate, evaluate: *judge, adjudge: *apprehend, comprehend.

Ant. Depreciate. — Con. Disparage, derogate from, detract from, belittle, *decry.

2 Appreciate, value, prize, treasure, cherish come into comparison when they mean to hold in high estimation. One appreciates that which one understands sufficiently to admire critically, or to enjoy with discrimination of its values, especially its aesthetic values; as, relatively few persons are able to appreciate the fugues of John Sebastian Bach; "he liked to . . . have his talent as a whittler appreciated" (S. Anderson). In loose use, appreciate does not always carry this strong implication of intelligent admiration, but stresses rather a response such as warm approval, keen enjoyment, or gratitude; as, "Those who are just beginning to appreciate the idea" (C. Mackenzie); "Nature actually made him ache, he appreciated it so" (Galsworthy); "children easily appreciate justice" (B. Russell). One values that which one rates highly or as worth more than other persons or things; as, to value honor more than life; there is nothing he values so much as the respect of his children. "Suddenly Gard was smitten by the tragedy of plain women; to be valued, but not loved" (M. Austin). One prizes that which one values highly, especially as a possession, and takes deep pride in or sets great store by; as, "The good we never miss we rarely prize" (Cowper); "We loved the man, and prized his work" (Tennyson). One treasures that which one keeps safe from danger of being lost or stolen, especially, but not invariably, because one regards it as precious, or attaches great sentimental value to it; as, she treasures every memento of her youth; those who value money because it makes them independent are the reverse of those who treasure every penny they acquire and become slaves to their avarice. When used in reference to persons, treasure implies a clinging to more often than an appreciation or love. "Pay me no homage, Mario,—but if it be I have your friendship, I shall treasure it" (Milly). Cherish (etymologically, to hold dear) may often be used interchangeably with prize and treasure; the word, however, carries a stronger implication of love or affection for what is cherished and often suggests closer, more intimate association or attentions. "Cherish a few books only, and those few chosen not for their fame in the world but wholly for the pleasure that they give you" (C. E. Montague). "He was a man who cherished his friends. He liked to call at the Bishop's house to advise him about the care of his young orchard, or to leave a bottle of home-made cherry brandy for Father Joseph" (Cather). Ana. *Criticize (also see CRITICISM): admire, esteem, respect, regard (see under REGARD, n.): enjoy, *like, relish.

Ant. Despise. — Con. Contemn, scorn, disdain (see DESPISE): depreciate, disparage, *decry.

apprehend. 1 *Arrest, detain, attach.

Ana. Seize, *take: capture, *catch, cop, nab.

Con. Release, discharge, liberate, *free.

2 Apprehend, comprehend and their derivative nouns apprehension and comprehension are clearly distinguished in psychological use. The verbs carry in common the meaning to lay hold of something with the mind so as to know it. Apprehend and apprehension, however, do not imply attainment of full knowledge or of complete understanding, but only a glimpsing of the nature, meaning, or significance of that which is the object of thought; comprehend (see also UNDERSTAND) and comprehension imply an understanding of the object of thought in its entire compass and extent. Apprehend may suggest a single act of the mind, and comprehend a complex and laborious process, but this distinction is not so essential as that between imperfect and perfect understanding; thus, one apprehends many things which one can never comprehend, such as infinity or beauty; one apprehends many things as a child, such as mother love, which one does not comprehend until late in life. "Who shall say how quickly the babe apprehends the relation between the causative howl and its effect, the demanded ministration?" (Grandgent). "The thirteenth century which cared little to comprehend anything except the incomprehensible" (H. Adams).

Ana. *Understand, appreciate: grasp, *take (in): perceive, observe, notice, note (see SEE).

3 Divine, anticipate, *foresee, foreknow.

Ana. Fear, dread (see corresponding nouns at FEAR): forecast, predict, forebode, *foretell.

apprehension. 1 Arrest, detention, attachment See under ARREST, v.

Ana. Seizing or seizure, taking (see corresponding verbs at TAKE): capturing or capture, catching, coping, nabbing (see corresponding verbs at CATCH).

Con. Releasing or release, discharging or discharge, liberation (see corresponding verbs at FREE).

2 Comprehension (see under APPREHEND, 2).

Ana. Understanding, appreciation (see corresponding verbs at UNDERSTAND): perceiving or perception, observing or observation, noticing or notice, noting (see corresponding verbs at SEE).

3 Apprehension, foreboding, misgiving, presentiment are here compared as meaning fear (or an instance of it) that something is going wrong or will go wrong. Apprehension usually implies fear that obsesses the mind and keeps one anxious and worried; as, to be under apprehension concerning a child's health. "The relapse you have described . . . was not quite unforeseen by its subject . . . You have no idea how such an apprehension weighs on the sufferer's mind" (Dickens). Foreboding, in precise use, designates oppressive anticipatory fear, often superstitious, unreasoning, or inadequately defined fear; thus, one may relieve a person's apprehensions, yet find it hard to dispel his forebodings. "There was a sadness and constraint about all persons that day, which filled Mr. Esmond with gloomy forebodings" (Thackeray). Misgiving suggests uneasiness and mistrust rather than anxiety or dread; it is often applied to sudden fears, such as a suspicion that one is making a mistake, a doubt of one's capacity to accomplish what one has undertaken, or a disturbing loss of courage. "In the midst of my anecdote a sudden misgiving chilled me—had I told them about this Goat before?" (L. P. Smith). "His self-confidence had given place to a misgiving that he had been making a fool of himself" (Shaw). Presentiment always implies a vague feeling or a dim, almost mystical, perception of something (not necessarily unpleasant) that seems bound to happen; however, because it commonly (but not invariably) suggests an element of anticipatory fear, and, in many cases, of foreboding, it comes into comparison with the other words of this group. "The delicious repose of the soul . . . had been shaken . . . and alarmed with dim presentiment" (G. Eliot).

Ana. *Fear, dread, alarm, panic: worry, anxiety, *care. Ant. Confidence. — Con. *Trust, faith: assurance, self-possession (see CONFIDENCE): *equanimity, sangfroid, composure.

apprehensive. *Fearful, afraid.

Ana. Anxious, worried, solicitous (see under CARE, n.): nervous, uneasy, jittery (see IMPATIENT).

Ant. Confident. — Con. Assured, sanguine, sure (see CONFIDENT): unruffled, imperturbable, composed, *cool, nonchalant.

apprentice. *Novice, novitiate, probationer, postulant, neophyte.

Ana. Beginner, starter (see corresponding verbs at BEGIN): tyro, *amateur.

Con. *Expert, adept, wizard.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

apprise or apprise. *Inform, advise, notify, acquaint, advertise.

Ana. Tell, *reveal, disclose, divulge, discover, betray: publish, proclaim, *declare, announce.

apprize. Variant of APPRAISE.

approach, v. 1 Approach, near, approximate agree in meaning to come or draw close (to). Approach is by far the widest in its range of application. Very often, it implies a coming close in space; as, he left the group and approached us; the storm was approaching. Often also, it suggests a drawing close in time; as, it was approaching three o'clock; the day of the wedding approached. Sometimes it is closeness in order of thought or in an intellectual relation, such as likeness or identification, that is implied; as, her interest in others sometimes approaches intrusiveness; students are expected to approach the standard set for them by their teachers; many words of distinctly different origin gradually approach each other in meaning. Often, especially in current use, though the word retains its implication of coming close, it also implies actual or imminent contact; thus, to approach a man with a proposal is actually to make advances to him; to approach a topic with reluctance is actually to enter upon a discussion of it. Hence, approach often stresses the manner or method of beginning, especially one calculated to evoke the response or effect desired; as, he did not know how to approach the subject. "Every problem in painting was to Leonardo a problem in science, every problem in physics he approached in the spirit of the artist" (H. Ellis). In a still more specific sense, when used in reference to persons, approach suggests advances made by the agent for some ulterior motive such as diplomatic negotiation, solicitation, or bribery; as, the committee awaited a favorable opportunity to approach the governor concerning his candidacy; the attorney for the prosecution declared that two jurors had been approached during the trial. Near is interchangeable with approach only when used in reference to persons or things that draw close in space or time. The word, because of its simplicity and familiarity, is sometimes preferred to approach in poetry: nevertheless, it is not as frequent in speech as might be expected, the expressions "get near" and "come near" often being used in preference. "The lark could scarce get out his notes for joy . . . as he near'd His happy home, the ground" (Tennyson). "The echoed hoof nearing the distant shore" (Wordsworth). "As the time of the birth of our Lord neared" (Pusey). Approximate, on the other hand, is interchangeable with approach chiefly in reference to things which come close to each other in some intellectual relation, as the actual to the ideal, the material to the spiritual, one idea or entity to another, etc.; as, results that approximate perfection. "For law, at any given moment, even under the most favorable conditions, cannot do more than approximate to its own ideal" (G. L. Dickinson). "The plastic arts of painting and sculpture are most art when they approximate to music" (S. Alexander). Approximate is specifically used in reference to a sum, an amount, a quantity, or the like, that approaches, but does not necessarily equal, a given sum, amount, etc.; as, a tablespoonful approximates three teaspoonfuls; their fund now approximates $5000.

Ana. Accost, *address: *begin, commence, initiate: consult, *confer, advise, negotiate.

Con. Avoid, elude, shun, evade, *escape: *refrain, abstain, forbear: retreat, *recede: withdraw, retire, depart, leave, *go.

2 Touch, equal, *match, rival.

Con. Diverge, deviate (see SWERVE).

approach, n. *Overture, advance, tender, bid.

Ana. Attempt, endeavor, essay, try (see under ATTEMPT, v.).

Ant. Repulse.

approbation. Approbation, approval are both derived from the same root as approve and are therefore closely related in meaning. Approbation, the older word, once carried all the meanings usually found in nouns (derived from verbs) ending in -tion, such as the act of approving or the state or fact of being approved: in current English, however, it is not so inclusive or so widely applicable. It now stresses admiration or high favor and is applied either to actual expressions of such feeling or to the state of mind of the person or persons whose favorable opinion is manifest; as, his speech won general approbation; terms of approbation; to feel pleasure in the approbation of his superiors; disapprobation and approbation, when socialized, exert a powerful influence over legislators and legislation. Approval requires qualification by words such as warm, hearty, or enthusiastic to be interchangeable with approbation, especially when the latter term denotes expression of favor. For approval, in itself, implies no greater favor than that involved in giving full consent with no reservations, or in sanctioning. It therefore is applied especially to the formal act of approving or to a formal statement such as a permission, an endorsement, or a confirmation; as, no interscholastic games are to be played without the approval of the principal; the president gave his approval to the proposed legislation in yesterday's conference with reporters. " 'Hol' said Dr. Lavendar, 'boys don't wait for their parson's approval to debate!' " (Deland).

Ana. Admiration, esteem, respect, *regard: *applause, acclaim, acclamation, plaudits.

Ant. Disapprobation. — Con. Odium, opprobrium, disrepute (see DISGRACE): hatred, detestation, abhorrence (see under HATE, v.): censuring or censure, condemning or condemnation, reprehension (see corresponding verbs at CRITICIZE).

appropriate, adj. Fitting, proper, *fit, suitable, apt, meet, happy, felicitous.

Ana. Apposite, pertinent, germane, *relevant: pat, timely, *seasonable, opportune.

Ant. Inappropriate. — Con. Wrong, *false: incongruous, incompatible, *inconsonant.

appropriate, v. Pre-empt, *arrogate, confiscate, usurp.

Ana. *Take, seize, grab: annex, *add: embezzle, peculate, *defalcate.

appropriation. Appropriation, grant, subvention, subsidy agree in meaning money or property given or set apart by an authorized body for a predetermined use by others. Appropriation is the comprehensive term used in government, business, or any institution controlling large sums of money, for the amount formally and officially allotted to any one of its departments, projects, services, or beneficiaries, in advance of the expenditure of that money; as, every department must keep within its appropriation; since the appropriations bill just signed by the president carries no appropriation for the new bridge, it is obvious that construction will not begin this year. Grant (sometimes, to distinguish it from more general senses of grant, called grant-in-aid), as a rule, applies to a gift made by a government or by a corporation, such as an educational or charitable foundation, to a beneficiary on the condition that certain terms be accepted or certain engagements fulfilled. The beneficiary may be a specific institution, a corporation, or even an individual; the gift may be a sum of money, but when the government is the benefactor, it is often a tract of land or a valuable franchise; thus, grants of land (land grants) from the federal government were made to various railroads building new lines and to various colleges and universities providing agricultural and industrial courses in the mid-nineteenth century; the Rockefeller Foundation makes grants chiefly to institutions engaged in health and medical research. Subvention is more restricted than grant since it always implies pecuniary aid, especially to a person or institution in straits; it now more often applies to a grant-in-aid to an artistic, literary, or scientific undertaking than a commercial one; as, opera in many places is possible only because of a subvention; subventioned research (that is, research supported by a subvention). Subsidy applies to a grant made to an individual or a company to enable him (or it) to carry on some work regarded as advantageous to the public but not, for one reason or another, self-supporting. Subvention is often preferred when the grant is made by an educational or charitable foundation or similar agency; subsidy, when it is made by the government; thus, the Carnegie Corporation makes subventions to libraries and educational institutions; the British government provides subsidies for mail-carrying vessels.

approval. *Approbation.

Ana. Commending or commendation, applauding or applause, compliment (see corresponding verbs at COMMEND): endorsing or endorsement, sanction (see corresponding verbs at APPROVE).

Ant. Disapproval. — Con. Criticizing or criticism, reprehension, censure (see corresponding verbs at CRITICIZE); disparagement, depreciation, derogation (see corresponding verbs at DECRY).

approve. Approve, endorse (or indorse), sanction, accredit, certify agree in meaning to have or to express a favorable opinion of. Approve often means no more than this. "Daring them . . . to approve her conduct" (Conrad). Sometimes, however, it suggests esteem or admiration. "Jane secretly approved his discernment" (R. Macaulay). Endorse adds to approve the implication of backing or supporting, as by an explicit statement: it is therefore used chiefly in reference to things requiring promotion or publicity; as, to endorse a person's candidacy; to endorse the platform of a new political party; to endorse an advertised article. Sanction not only implies approval but also authorization; as, the school dances were sandioned by the board of education. The agent (or one that sanctions) may be not only a person or group, but anything which provides a standard by which something can be approved and authorized or disapproved and discounted; as, proposed laws not sandioned by public opinion; some churches permit divorce, but do not sandition remarriage. "These statements are sandioned by common sense" (J. Gilbert). "The introduction into a particular rite of features not sandioned by the texts" (L. P. Smith). Accredit and certify now usually imply official endorsement and conformity with certain standards. Their selection is dependent on idiom rather than on distinctions in meaning; as, an accredited herd of dairy cattle; certified milk; an accredited school or college; a certified teacher; a certified public accountant. Accredited, however, is sometimes used generally, as implying public approval or general acceptance. "If any . . . break away from accredited custom" (Inge). "Sages so fully accredited as Mr. Bertrand Russell" (C. E. Montague).

Ana. *Commend, applaud, compliment: *ratify, confirm.

Ant. Disapprove. — Con. Reject, refuse, repudiate, spurn (see DECLINE): condemn, reprehend, *criticize.

approximate, v. *Approach, near.

approximately. *Nearly, almost, well-nigh.

Ant. Precisely, exactly.

appurtenance. Accessory, adjunct, *appendage.

Ana. Belonging, possession, effect (see POSSESSIONS): furnishing or furniture, equipment, appointment (see corresponding verbs at FURNISH).

apropos or à propos. Apposite, pertinent, *relevant, germane, applicable, material.

Ana. Pat, timely, opportune, *seasonable: appropriate, fitting, *fit, suitable, apt, proper, meet, happy.

Ant. Unapropos.

apt. 1 Happy, felicitous, appropriate, fitting, *fit, suitable, meet, proper.

Ana. Apposite, pertinent, *relevant, apropos: pat, timely, opportune (see SEASONABLE): telling, convincing (see VALID): right, nice, precise, exact (see CORRECT).

Ant. Inapt, inept. — Con. *Awkward, maladroit: wrong, *false.

2 Apt, likely, liable are often confused in use, even by good writers, when followed by to and the infinitive. The correct choice is often difficult, but their differences in meaning are clear and offer the safest guide in selection. Apt implies an inherent or habitual tendency such as an inclination, bent, predisposition; it refers to the past and the present as much as, if not more than, to the future; it applies commonly to persons, but may apply to things that show a tendency or drift. "You are just a little apt to let yourself be a slave to that house of yours" (Bennett). "The upper circles . . . are apt to favor a pronunciation derived . . . from that which prevailed in England" (Grandgent). "Long poems are always apt to drop in places into what is only not called prose because it is metrical" (S. Alexander). Likely stresses probability; it refers in time to the future and therefore has its place in predictions; as, he is likely to succeed; the wedding is likely to cost her parents more than they can afford; it is likely to rain tomorrow. "How now! is Jack Cade slain?" "No, my lord, nor likely to be slain; for they have won the bridge" (Shak). Liable (as here considered: see also LIABLE, RESPONSIBLE) implies exposure to a risk or danger; it suggests a chance rather than a probability and is therefore often used in warnings, in cautions, or in the expression of fears; as, children who play in the street are liable to be injured or killed by automobiles (likely might be used here if the chances are so great as to amount to a probability); drivers must remember that cars are liable to skid on wet roads; anyone who disobeys this rule is liable to be punished severely. Thus, a person who is apt to lose his head under stress knows that he is likely to fail when he is put to a test and therefore forms the habit of avoiding situations in which he is liable to encounter difficulties.

Ana. Inclined, disposed, predisposed (see INCLINE, v): prone, *liable.

Con. Averse, *disinclined, indisposed, loath.

3 *Quick, prompt, ready.

Ana. Clever, smart, bright, *intelligent, quick-witted, alert: gifted, talented (see corresponding nouns at GIFT).

Con. *Slow, sluggish: *lethargic, sluggish: *stupid, dull, dense, crass.

aptitude. Bent, turn, talent, faculty, *gift, knack, genius.

Ana. *Taste, gusto, zest: propensity, *leaning, penchant, flair.

Ant. Inaptitude.

aquatic. Aquatic, lacustrine (or lacustrian), lacuscular, fluvial, fluvialile, marine, oceanic, thalassic, neritic, pelagic, abyssal, bathysmal, bathytic imply reference to water, especially to a body of water, but all of them except aquatic are highly specific in their applications and all, as here compared, more or less technical terms in the geographical and biological sciences and in geology. Aquatic may imply a habitat in water, but as applied to animals and plants it often means living in (but not necessarily submerged by) water, or on the water, or around a body of water. It is specifically applicable to any plant that has its roots in water or in a mud bottom, such as the water hyacinth and the water lily. It is also applicable to any animal that frequents the water, especially to any swimming bird or fowl, such as a gull or a duck. A frog is more often described as an amphibious animal but, as compared to a toad, its habits may be said to be aquatic. Lacustrine implies reference only to a lake; its use is chiefly in biogeography; as, lacustrine shells; lacustrine fauna and flora. It is also used by geologists (as, lacustrine deposits) and by archaeologists (as, the lacustrine period, a prehistoric period when dwellings were erected over lakes). Lacuscular implies reference to a pool or small lake; as, lacuscular vegetation. Fluvial and fluvial are specific terms suggesting the action or operation or influence of flowing water. They imply reference, therefore, to streams, and especially to rivers, and are far more often used in the geographical sciences and in geology than in the biological sciences; as, fluvial ice; a fluvial plain is one made by fluvial deposits. "The river is, itself, a powerful agent of direct denudation—fluvial denudation, as it is sometimes termed" (T. H. Huxley). In reference to salt water, marine (see also MARINE) is the comprehensive term, applicable not only to things that pertain to the open ocean, but to those that pertain to bays, harbors, salt marshes, salt ponds, and the like. When specific reference to the open ocean or to mid ocean is intended, oceanic is the preferred word; thus, marine shells; marine vegetation; marine deposits; oceanic fauna; oceanic currents; oceanic storms. When reference is to seas, gulfs, or the like, as distinguished from the ocean, thalassic is often the term preferred especially by historians; as, a thalassic empire. These terms, however, are not so definitely restricted and therefore so precise as the succeeding technical terms, which usually name definite zones of the ocean. Neritic is referable only to the belt or region of shallow water surrounding the coast; pelagic, which in general use implies definitely the open sea or the high seas (as, pelagic sealing), in its stricter biogeographical application has reference in its extent only to the realm of the open ocean enclosed by the neritic zone and in its depth only to so much of the water covering that expanse as is penetrable by light. Below the pelagic zone in the deepest part of the ocean lies the abyssal zone, where no plant life exists and animals are carnivorous and are usually blind or luminescent. To things that pertain to this zone abyssal, bathysmal, or bathyic are applicable.

Arab. Arabic, *Arabian.

Arabian, adj. Arabian, Arab, Arabic are not, in general, applicable to the same things and are, consequently, often misused. Arabian is used chiefly with reference to a place, Arabia, the large peninsula in southwestern Asia which includes the modern kingdom of Saudi Arabia. Thus, one speaks of the Arabian peninsula, desert, kingdoms, flora, fauna, caravans, rugs, history, etc. Arab is used chiefly with reference to a people (the Arabs), either the pure Semites who still dwell in Arabia, or their descendants of mixed blood who are common in northern, eastern, and central Africa, in Madagascar, India, and the Malay Archipelago, and in some parts of Syria and Persia. The word, therefore, often implies characteristics or habits associated with Arabs, such as a nomadic life, equestrian skill, or Mohammedan practices; as, Arab customs; Arab descent; Arab bazaars; Arab harems; Arab horses. Arabic, however, refers usually to a language (Arabic), originally the language of the Arabs, but now the prevailing speech of several countries whose inhabitants are not exclusively Arab in origin, such as Palestine, Syria, Iraq, Egypt, and northern Africa; as, the Arabic language, literature, liturgy. Since the written language (the spoken language has many dialectal forms) conforms to the classical standards set by the Koran and is that of an important literature which flourished in western Asia, northern Africa, and Spain between A.D. 750 and 1250, the term Arabic is also applicable to a culture or to any manifestations of that culture; as, Arabic architecture, philosophers; Arabic numerals.

architectonic or architectonics, n. *Architecture.

architectural. Architectonic (see under ARCHITECTURE).

architecture. Architecture, architectonic (or architectonics) and their corresponding adjectives architectural and architectonic are often not distinguishable, but in current use they tend to diverge, if not in their meanings, at least in their emphasis. The nouns agree in meaning the science of planning and building structures, such as churches, houses, bridges, and ships, involving problems of artistic design, engineering, and adaptation to the ends in view. In modern popular use, architecture, and hence architectural, often suggest that artistry or beauty in design is the end and goal of the architect; in technical use they stress design as the result of attention to practical as well as artistic ends, and imply that the profession is both a science and an art. Architectonic, or more often architectonics, and its corresponding adjective architectonic, place the emphasis on constructive skill; they suggest attention to the framework, skeleton, or supporting structure, sometimes without reference to the details necessary for the completion or elaboration of the structure; thus, when one speaks of Chartres Cathedral as a triumph of architecture, one calls attention to its beauty of design and ornamentation; but when one speaks of it as a triumph of architectonics, one calls attention to it as a great work of engineering where the supporting parts of pillars, props, and ribs are united so as to form a stone skeleton capable of carrying the enormous weight of stone roof and high towers, yet permitting many windows in its enclosing walls. Architectonic and its adjective are far more common in extended use than architecture and architectural, for the latter seldom escape their suggestions of building with stone, wood, steel, or other material. Architectonic, on the other hand, often is referable to a system of ideas or philosophy, or to a work of art, especially to an epic or a poetic drama, where there is not only perfect articulation of parts, but their combination into an integral or organic whole. "In Boccaccio and Dante he [Chaucer] found for the first time among his moderns architectonic powers which in the case of Dante were supreme" (Lowes).

Ana. Excitement, stimulation, quickening, galvanizing (see corresponding verbs at PROVOKE): eagerness, avidity (see corresponding adjectives at EAGER): zest, gusto (see TASTE).

Ant. Coolness: indifference. — Con. Unconcernedness or unconcern, aloofness, detachment, disinterestedness (see corresponding adjectives at INDIFFERENT): listlessness, languidness or languor, lackadaisicality (see corresponding adjectives at LANGUID).

arduous. *Hard, difficult.

Ana. Laborious, toilsome (see corresponding nouns at WORK): exhausting, wearying or wearisome, tiring, fatiguing (see corresponding verbs at TIRE): *onerous, exacting, oppressive.

Ant. Light, facile. — Con. *Easy, simple, effortless, smooth.

area. 1 Area, tract, region, zone, belt agree in meaning an extent of space (especially of ground or surface) that is distinguishable from its surroundings in appearance or in certain distinctive features. Area still carries its original implication of clearly marked bounds, but it may be used with reference to a space defined on a map or chart as well as to one the limits of which are actually visible; as, an oasis is a green or fertile area in a desert; there are vast uncultivated areas even in the most populous of the states. "Two colors—aspen and evergreen, not intermingled but lying in solid areas of light and dark" (Cather). Tract, on the other hand, stresses extent rather than limits; it is therefore preferred to area in designating a space that might otherwise be described as an expanse, or is thought of as widespread or far stretching and uniform in character. "Beyond the area of small farms lay larger tracts that were immensely productive" (S. Anderson). "Panley Common, viewed from the back windows of Moncrief House, is a tract of grass, furze and rushes, stretching away to the western horizon" (Shaw). Tract is often used in an extended sense, in reference to anything that has extent or duration; as, "wide tracts of life" (Day Lewis); "a large tract of unwritten history" (T. S. Eliot). Region, as here compared, always suggests reference to some definite place or locality, as on the earth's surface, in the atmosphere, or in the human body, distinguished from other localities by certain features or by being subject to a particular condition, influence, or the like; as, the upper region of the air; the Finger Lake region of central New York State; what region of the brain is the seat of consciousness? " 'Is this the region, this the soil, the clime,' Said then the lost Archangel, 'this the seat That we must change for Heaven?' " (Milton). Zone, in precise use, is referred to an area or region that looks like a circle or an encircling band, especially on a map or chart; as, the torrid, arctic, and temperate zones; the parcel post zones; the pelagic zone of the ocean; the tree zone of a high mountain. In looser use, it is often applied to a region that suggests a band or strip and is distinctly set off from its environs by some peculiarity of feature; as, the firing zone of a battlefield; the business zones of a city; the wheat zone of Russia. "That milky way Which nightly as a circling zone thou seest Powdered with stars" (Milton). Belt is a synonym of zone, but is more frequent in colloquial or journalistic English than in literary or scientific English; as, the cotton belt of the United States.

Ana. *Locality, district: *expanse, stretch.

2 Extent, *size, dimensions, magnitude, volume.

arena. Arena, circus, lists, ring, cockpit, court, field, gridiron, diamond, rink denote in common an area or place in which a contest or combat is held, usually in the presence of spectators. Arena (meaning literally, in Latin, sand) designated originally the oval area (usually covered with sand to absorb the blood), in the central part of an ancient Roman amphitheater, in which gladiatorial combats, combats between beasts or between gladiators and beasts, and mock sea fights were held. In modern use arena is often applied to a large indoor space, surrounded by seats for spectators, in which various kinds of athletic contests or exhibitions of animals (as ice hockey games or horse shows) are held, or to the entire structure. A circus, in ancient Rome, was a level oblong space surrounded on three sides by tiers of seats, divided lengthwise through the middle by a barrier, and used chiefly for chariot races. The name circus (meaning literally circle or ring) referred to the circuit which the racing chariots made around the middle barrier. In modern use a circus is typically an oblong area of ground or turf surrounded by tiers of seats and enclosed by a large tent in which wild animals, feats of horsemanship, acrobatic performances, etc., are exhibited, in from one to three rings placed in the enclosure, by an itinerant company. Lists were the barriers of a field, and by extension the field itself, on which mounted combatants contended with lances or spears in the days of knighthood and chivalry. A ring is a comparatively small rope-enclosed platform or plot of ground, originally, as the name indicates, circular, but now often square, usually (in the case of boxing and wrestling) covered with a pad or cushion, in which boxing or wrestling bouts are held or in which acts are performed in a circus. A cockpit is a pit or enclosure for cockfights. A court is a space, primarily quadrangular, on which various games are played with a ball, as tennis, rackets, squash, and handball. Not all of these necessarily have seats for spectators. A court may or may not be enclosed (on all sides or on three sides) and may or may not have a roof or ceiling. A field is an area, usually outdoors and frequently enclosed, for baseball, cricket, football, lacrosse, and certain other athletic contests; as used of the area on which a track-and-field meet is held, field is applied to that part of the area, usually enclosed by the racing track, on which are contested all events (as jumping, vaulting, weight throwing) other than the running, hurdling, and walking races. Gridiron is a colloquial term for a field on which American or Canadian Rugby football is played. A diamond is, properly, the infield of a baseball field, or sometimes, by loose extension, the entire field. A rink is a smooth and level extent of ice, sometimes enclosed, for skating (often specifically for hockey or curling), or by extension, an area of turf for bowling or of planking for roller skating. A rink is not necessarily surrounded by seats for spectators.

Arena, lists, ring, cockpit often have figurative senses which derive from the literal senses here treated. Arena is used for any place of public contest or exertion, or for any sphere of action. "To the schoolboys it [the world] is an arena, a risky place, where, however, fortune favours the brave" (Times Lit. Sup.). Lists is most felicitously made the scene of charging, impetuous contest; in the common expression to enter the lists, it emphasizes the courage, foolhardiness, or other motive that prompts one to risk contest, controversy, etc. "[Let] the spirit Range in free battle lists" (Kingsley). "Dagon hath presumed, Me overthrown, to enter lists with God" (Milton). Ring is especially used of a political contest; as, another man has thrown his hat into the ring (i.e., announced himself as a candidate: from the practice of throwing one's hat into the ring, in boxing, etc., to announce one's readiness to contend). A cockpit is a region that has been the scene of many conflicts, especially military. "She [Italy] was wearied by the long years when she had been the cockpit of war" (Buchan).

argument. 1 Proof, *reason, ground.

Ana. Proving, demonstrating or demonstration (see corresponding verbs at PROVE): disproving or disproof, refuting or refutation, rebutting or rebuttal (see corresponding verbs at DISPROVE).

2 Argument, dispute, controversy come into comparison when they mean a vigorous, often heated, discussion of a moot question. Argument stresses the appeal to the mind, and the use of evidence and reasoning to support one's claims; it implies the hope of each side to prove its case and to convince its opponents. "If Winthrop had not by force of argument . . . obtained the lifting of duties from goods sent to England . . . the Boston colony would have been bankrupt" (A. Repplier). Dispute fundamentally implies the contradiction of something maintained by another and therefore a challenge to argument; as, the decrees of a dictator are not subject to dispute. When applied to a verbal contention, dispute suggests not only a challenger and one challenged, but an effort on the part of each to get the upper hand. Hence it often implies more or less anger or disturbance of the peace. "A dispute begun in jest . . . is continued by the desire of conquest, till vanity kindles into rage, and opposition rankles into enmity" (Johnson). "You dislike an argument, and want to silence this." 'Perhaps I do. Arguments are too much like disputes'" (Austen). Controversy emphasizes a profound difference of opinion, not so often between persons as between parties; the term is applied chiefly to debates over issues of importance or of widespread interest, involving two or more religions, governments, schools of thought, political parties, or the like, and carried on mainly by writings addressed to the public or by speeches on public platforms; as, the Arian controversy; the Shakespeare-Bacon controversy. "When a thing ceases to be a subject of controversy, it ceases to be a subject of interest" (Hazlitt).

Ana. *Argumentation, disputation, debate: controverting, refuting, rebutting (see DISPROVE): contention, dissension (see DISCORD).

3 Theme, *subject, matter, subject matter, topic, text, motive, leitmotiv.

argumentation. Argumentation, disputation, debate, forensic, dialectic come into comparison when they mean the act or art of argument or an exercise of one's powers of argument. In contrast with argument, dispute, controversy (see ARGUMENT, 2) they stress formality and a more or less disciplinary intention. Argumentation is the designation given to a form of discourse the aim of which is to prove or disprove propositions, or to an oral or written exercise having such proof or disproof for its end; as, a course in exposition and argumentation; the next theme will be an argumentation. Disputation and debate both imply the handling of a proposition with the intent to sustain one's position not only by advancing arguments in its support, but by attacking the position of one's opponent and by defending one's own from his attacks. Disputation, however, is more often applied to a formal exercise common in medieval universities, and still found in some modern universities, in which a thesis is tested by the ability of its proponent or defender to sustain it in the face of severe critical attack; debate, to a two-sided contest between persons or teams which is governed by strict rules of procedure and in which the victory goes to the person or team regarded by the appointed judges as manifesting the greater ability. Forensic, in its academic use (chiefly in the United States), is commonly applied to an argumentative exercise intended to convince its readers or hearers; the word suggests emphasis on the qualities of successful legal argument, such as the ability to marshal evidence, to make telling points, to persuade as well as to convince. Dialectic is a term more common among philosophers than in general or academic use. It is, however, applied to a method of reasoning, the aim of which is to reach the truth by the correct application of the rules of logic, or, less often, to argument or argumentation that observes what its writer believes to be the laws of reasoning. "Newman's masterly English, and his competent, if not supreme, dialectic" (Saintsbury).

aristocracy. 1 Plutocracy, *oligarchy.

2 Aristocracy, nobility, gentry, county, gentilefolk, elite, society are here compared as meaning a body of persons who constitute a socially superior caste. Aristocracy often refers to an ideally superior caste, and therefore does not invariably apply to a fixed or definite group of persons. "There is a natural aristocracy among men. The grounds of this are virtue and talents" (Jefferson). Usually the term connotes superiority in birth, breeding, and social station and is applicable to all those persons generally recognized as first in family and in personal importance. "He comes of the Brahmin caste of New England. This is the harmless, inoffensive, untitled aristocracy" (Holmes). However, in countries where there is a privileged and titled class, the nobility, aristocracy is often used to designate the same group with this difference in implication: that nobility stresses rank inferior to that of royalty, but superior to that of all other classes, and aristocracy stresses the possession of power over the people through ownership of land and through long-established and generally acknowledged superiority. "The word 'cousin' in the mouth or from the pen of a royalty signified a recognition of rank superior to nobility" (Belloc). "The distinguishing characteristic of an aristocracy is the enjoyment of privileges which are not communicable to other citizens simply by anything they can themselves do to obtain them" (Hallam). However, nobility in British use does not include titled commoners such as baronets and knights. These latter are thought of as members of the aristocracy. Gentry and county are distinctively British terms applied to a class, usually a leisured class, who by birth and breeding can be described as gentlemen (in the technical sense) and ladies, but who are without hereditary title and are classed as commoners. In British use, gentry refers to a class in rank just below the nobility but often having in its membership persons of equally high birth or breeding. County, however, carries a suggestion of an association of the family with the county, or section, and usually, the ownership of an estate in the country; as, the gentry and the nobility were on friendliest terms; the newcomers were slow in being accepted by the county. "The advantage claimed for this plan is that it provides us with a gentry: that is, with a class of rich people able to cultivate themselves by an expensive education" (Shaw). "I am sure," said Mrs. Rochford, "the county will like far better to see you there than Mrs. Russell Penton" (Mrs. Oliphant). Gentlefolk is in both British and American use; in the former it is often nearly equivalent to gentry; in American and in some British use it is applicable to those persons who are marked as apart by their gentleness of breeding or habituation to the refinements of life and living rather than by their definite social status or long pedigrees. "Oh, Sir, you would not talk thus, if you knew. What life is this of ours . . . You gentlefolk have got Warm chambers to your wish" (Wordsworth). Elite, which literally means the chosen, is referable not to a social rank, but to those members of any group or class who stand out as its flower, or the ones most frequently sought after; as, the elite of the nobility; "few others of the mathematical elite" (Karl K. Darrow). When used without qualification, elite usually means the group regarded as the highest, especially as judged by social or cultural standards. "It is the business of the college to produce an elite—superior men" (North American Review). Society, as here compared, is applied to that portion of a community which marks itself apart as a leisured class, much given to formal entertainments, fashionable sports, and other pursuits characteristic of an active social life. "Society is now one polish'd horde, Form'd of two mighty tribes, the Bores and Bored" (Byron). "There are only about four hundred people in New York Society" (Ward McAllister).

armament. Armament, munitions, arms, ordnance, artillery, ammunition are here compared as used in modern warfare. They are not all synonyms of one another, but they are frequently confused. In general they mean material used in military and naval (including air) operations. Armament is by far the most inclusive term, for it comprehends everything that must be considered in determining a nation's military strength, such as trained soldiers, sailors, and fliers, land fortifications, battleships and all other war vessels, including transports, submarines, destroyers, and the like, aircraft, guns, provisions, equipment, available man power, resources, etc. Munitions is far less inclusive; it comprehends materials only, or supplies of war, including military equipment of all kinds, especially all weapons of attack and defense and the missiles, projectiles, propellants, and the like, necessary for their use. Arms (see also WEAPON) is less definite in its application than either of the preceding words, but in general, when used as an inclusive term, it covers whatever weapons soldiers or sailors need in actual fighting, such as cannon, guns, rifles, pistols, swords, and bayonets. Ordnance is used in two senses, the more general of which is probably the less common. In that sense, the term includes not only everything which is covered by arms, but every other weapon of attack or defense, such as tanks, and everything needed for the equipment and use of these weapons, such as mounts, carriages, projectiles, and missiles, or for their manufacture or repair, such as tools and machinery. In the United States Navy, ordnance also includes torpedoes, submarine mines, range finders, armor, and the like. More narrowly, and more commonly also, ordnance is a comprehensive term for all kinds of heavy firearms, especially those discharged from mounts, such as cannon, guns, howitzers, and mortars. Artillery is a close synonym of ordnance in this latter sense, but it suggests actual warfare and therefore implies group service in the management of mounted firearms. The term sometimes comprehends not only ordnance but also the mounts, ammunition, and the like, essential to the work of that branch of the army dealing with the operation of heavy guns (also called the artillery). Ammunition, though once used as a general term nearly equal to munitions, is now restricted in its application to the projectiles used in warfare, such as bullets, shells, grenades, bombs, and their necessary propellants, detonators, fuses, and primers.

armistice. *Truce.

armory or armoury. Armory (or armoury), arsenal, magazine are here compared chiefly in their technical military senses. Armory once carried the meanings now associated with arsenal and magazine, but in current use, especially in the United States, it has commonly two applications: one, a public building in which troops, such as those belonging to the National Guard, have their headquarters, drill rooms, and the like; the other, an establishment under government control for the manufacture of arms, such as rifles, pistols, bayonets, and swords. Arsenal is correctly applied to a government establishment for the manufacture, storage, and issue of arms, ammunition, and the like: in popular nontechnical use, especially in figurative use, the word usually suggests a store of, or a storehouse for, weapons and ammunition; as, "Weapons from the arsenal of poetic satire" (H. Reed); to make America the arsenal of the democracies. Magazine is strictly applied to a storehouse for all sorts of military and naval supplies, including arms, ammunition, provisions, and the like. In extended use, it often more narrowly suggests a storehouse for ammunition, especially for explosives; as, a powder magazine. "As when high Jove his sharp artillery forms, And opens his cloudy magazine of storms" (Pope). "An educated man stands, as it were, in the midst of a boundless arsenal and magazine, filled with all the weapons and engines which man's skill has been able to devise from the earliest time" (Carlyle). In extended but correct use, magazine is applied to a supply chamber, as one in a gun for cartridges, one in a camera for films, one in a type-setting machine for matrices, or the like.

array, n. 1 *Display, parade, pomp.

Ana. Showing or show, exhibiting or exhibition, exposing or exposition (see corresponding verbs at SHOW): arranging or arrangement, marshaling (see corresponding verbs at ARRANGE): disposition (see DISPOSAL).

2 Raiment, apparel, attire, tire, vesture, *clothes, clothing, dress.

arrear or arrears. Arrearage, *debt, indebtedness, debit, obligation, liability.

arrearage. Arrear, *debt, indebtedness, debit, obligation, liability.

arrest, n. Apprehension, detention, attachment. See under ARREST, v.

Ana. Seizing or seizure, taking (see corresponding verbs at TAKE): capturing or capture, catching, coping, nabbing (see corresponding verbs at CATCH).

Con. Liberation, discharging or discharge, releasing or release (see corresponding verbs at FREE).

arrest, v. 1 Arrest, check, interrupt come into comparison when they mean to stop in mid-course. Arrest implies a holding fixed in the midst of movement, development, or progress, and also, usually, a prevention of further advance until someone or something effects a release; as, to arrest the progress of a disease; a tree arrested the aviator's fall; discouragement sometimes arrests a child's development; books that arrest attention. Check (see also RESTRAIN) suggests suddenness and force in stopping, as though bringing to a halt sharply or with a jerk; as, the entrance of the teacher checked the disturbance in the schoolroom; he checked himself just as he was about to blurt out his indignation. "He caught her by the arm as she ran past and . . . without trying to check her, simply darted in with her and up the stairs" (Conrad). Interrupt stresses a breaking in and a consequent stopping, but it carries no clear suggestion that continuation is impossible or improbable; as, to interrupt a lecture with a question; their talk was interrupted by the arrival of visitors; he was discouragingly interrupted at the point when ideas and words were flowing freely.

Ana. *Interpose, intervene, interfere: *delay, detain, retard: *frustrate, thwart, balk.

Ant. Activate: quicken. — Con. *Vitalize, energize: *stir (up), rouse, arouse, awaken.

2 Arrest, apprehend, attach, detain are here compared only as meaning to seize and hold under restraint or in custody by authority of the law. The same likenesses and differences in meaning are manifest in the comparable use of arrest, apprehension, attachment, detention. Arrest (verb or noun) is the most widely used of these words for the seizing of a person and holding him in custody. It refers both to civil cases where a person is placed under restraint, and to criminal cases, where apprehend and apprehension are also used; thus, one arrests a person for debt, but one apprehends a thief; witnesses are under arrest; to demand the apprehension of the rioters. As a matter of fact, laymen seldom use arrest except in the sense of apprehend, for it carries connotations which make its use objectionable in reference to witnesses or even suspects. Arrest is now not used with reference to the seizure and holding of property and chattels except in admiralty courts and in Scots law; as, to arrest a vessel. The words commonly used when property is seized and held, as for payment of a debt, are attach and attachment; as, to attach the accounts of a firm suspected of falsification of income tax reports. Attach and attachment are used in reference to persons chiefly when the intent is to make them appear in court, as to answer for contempt or to serve as a witness. Detain and detention usually imply holding in custody for inquiry, inspection, or the like. They are not strictly legal terms but are often used when there is the desire to avoid the stigma associated with the word arrest; as, the health officers detained the ship; to detain a suspect or a witness.

Ana. Seize, *take: *catch, capture, cop, nab: *imprison, incarcerate, jail.

Con. Discharge, release, liberate, *free.

arresting. Striking, remarkable, *noticeable, outstanding, salient, signal, prominent, conspicuous.

Ana. Impressive, *moving, touching, affecting, poignant: fascinating, taking, attractive, enchanting (see under ATTRACT).

Con. *Common, ordinary, familiar: hackneyed, stereotyped, *trite.

arripe. Delight, tickle, regale, gratify, *please, gladden, rejoice.

Ana. *Amuse, divert, entertain: beguile, wile, *while.

Con. Irr, bother, vex, *annoy: *tire, weary.

arrival. Arrival, advent denote in common the reaching of a destination. Arrival commonly implies precedent movement; as, the arrival and departure of trains; the morning of my arrival. Advent is sometimes applied to an important, or even momentous, arrival; as, to look forward to the advent of the Messiah. Except when it connotes birth, it usually stresses appearance on the scene more than expected coming or reaching the end of a journey. "With the advent of an attractive young woman [life] took on acknowledged connotations of interest" (M. Austin).

Ana. Coming (see COME): appearing or appearance, emerging or emergence (see corresponding verbs at APPEAR).

Ant. Departure. — Con. Going, leaving, withdrawing or withdrawal (see corresponding verbs at GO).

arrive. *Come.

Ant. Depart. — Con. *Go, leave, withdraw, retire.

arrogant. *Proud, haughty, lordly, insolent, overbearing, supercilious, disdainful.

Ana. Imperious, domineering, *masterful, peremptory, imperative: pretentious, pompous, ostentatious (see SHOWY).

Ant. Meek: unassuming. — Con. *Humble, modest, lowly: yielding, submitting or submissive, deferring or deferential (see corresponding verbs at YIELD).

arrogate, v. Arrogate, usurp, pre-empt, appropriate, confiscate agree in meaning to seize or assume something by more or less high-handed methods. Arrogate (commonly, but not invariably, followed by to and a reflexive pronoun) implies an unwarranted claim, usually an insolent or presumptuous claim, to that which one assumes, frequently to the exclusion of others. "By arrogating to himself too much, he was in danger of losing that degree of estimation to which he was entitled" (Johnson). "He arrogated to himself the right of deciding dogmatically what was orthodox doctrine" (Macaulay). "The exploitation of the tourists was a monopoly which the most active of the children had arrogated, by force and cunning, to themselves" (A. Huxley). Usurp stresses unlawful or wrongful intrusion of oneself into the place of another (usually a person; by extension, a thing) that by law, custom, natural right, or the like, is in possession, and the seizure for oneself of his (or its) territory, power, authority, prerogatives, or rights; as, to usurp a throne; the dictator usurped the powers not only of the king but of the parliament. "Literature, or culture, tended with Arnold to usurp the place of Religion" (T. S. Eliot). Pre-empt implies beforehandness in taking something desired by others and keeping it in one's own possession. Historically, it implies the right to purchase or acquire (land, property, or the like) before others, and, usually, on more favorable terms: this implication is now sometimes found in discriminating figurative use. "Prose has pre-empted a lion's share of the territory once held, either in sovereignty or on equal terms, by poetry" (Louise). In current use, it more often suggests arrogation or usurpation than lawful methods such as purchase, and is therefore not fully accepted as literary English; as, when the townspeople arrived they found that the visitors had pre-empted all the parking places; the best of the slogans suggested had already been pre-empted by a rival manufacturer. In the game of bridge, to pre-empt, or to make a pre-emptive bid, is to make a declaration that is aimed at shutting out shifts by the partner or bids by the adversaries. Appropriate now more often suggests conversion to one's own use than, as originally, a setting apart for a particular or peculiar use. However, the latter implication is often retained; as, Congress appropriated three million dollars for flood control (see APPROPRIATION). The word now usually suggests an acquiring for oneself or an annexing, sometimes by lawful, sometimes by unlawful, means; as, growing plants appropriate whatever elements they need from the soil and the air; a plagiarist appropriates the ideas of others. "If we could by any means appropriate to our use some of the extraordinary digestive power that a boa constrictor has" (Meredith). Confiscate implies seizure, as of others' property or goods, through the exercise of one's authority: it does not, however, like appropriate, suggest conversion to one's own use, though that may or may not follow; as, the teacher confiscated all packages of chewing gum; the police confiscated the cached liquor. "If miners, or any other sort of workers, find that the local authorities will confiscate the incomes of the ratepayers to feed them when they are idle, their incentive to pay their way by their labor will be . . . perceptibly slackened" (Shaw).

Ana. Seize, *take, grab: *take, assume.

Ant. Renounce: yield. — Con. *Relinquish, surrender, cede, resign.

arsenal. *Armory, magazine.

art, n. 1 Art, skill, cunning, artifice, craft come into comparison when they mean the faculty of performing or executing that which is planned or devised. Art is not actually a comprehensive term, but is so variable in its implications that it is interchangeable with any one of the others and capable of carrying its specific implications; hence, the last four words are synonyms of art, but they are not always closely synonymous with each other and may even, at times, be used in distinction from each other. The earliest and still common implications of art are those which are now associated specifically with skill: technical knowledge, and proficiency or expertness in its exercise or practical application. "True ease in writing comes from art, not chance. As those move easiest who have learn'd to dance" (Pope). "'Tis hard to say, if greater want of skill Appear in writing or in judging ill" (Pope). Both words are also used concretely with these implications. "There's a great art in doing these things properly. I have often had to carry off a man of fourteen stone, resting him all the time as if he was in bed" (Shaw). "Able boys and girls will . . . submit willingly to severe discipline in order to acquire some coveted . . . skill" (B. Russell). Art also, at times, comes close to cunning (as here compared: see also DECEIT), especially in the older underogatory, and now archaic, sense of that word, where it adds to skill such implications as great or recondite knowledge, inventive or creative power, and capacity for perfection in execution. This sense prevails especially in the phrase "a work of art," once often called "a work of cunning." In the following citations either word may be substituted for the other without change of meaning. "High-ribbed vault . . . With perfect cunning framed" (Wordsworth). "Praised be the Art whose subtle power could stay Yon cloud, and fix it in that glorious shape" (Wordsworth). Art also may be used interchangeably with artifice (as here compared: see also TRICK) when the latter stresses skill and intelligence (or obedience to rules) in contriving, devising, or constructing, and suggests lack of creative power. In this sense both art and artifice in their emphasis on mechanical skill imply a contrast with power derived from nature or inspiration. "Flowers worthy of Paradise, which not nice Art In beds and curious knots, but Nature boon Poured forth profuse on hill" (Milton). "When you come to dissect the Odyssey, what amazing artifice is found under that apparently straightforward tale" (Quiller-Couch). Art and craft (see also TRADE) were once close synonyms but now tend to become contrasted terms. Both words still imply ingenuity and subtlety in workmanship; both may suggest, but art less often suggests, trickery or guile in the attainment of one's ends; as, a gold bracelet made with the craft (or art) of a Benvenuto Cellini. "Craft, where strength doth fail, And piece the lion with the fox's tail" (J. Wilson). "The lion's skin too short, you know . . . Was lengthened by the fox's tail; And art supplies, where strength may fail" (Unknown). Both words, as here considered, are also affected by their use as designations of pursuits (for the discrimination of art and craft in this sense, see TRADE), craft tending to be applied to a lower kind of skill or inventive power revealing itself in the mastery of materials or technique, and in effects that can be analyzed and imitated, and art to a higher creative power capable of expressing a personal vision and of achieving results which defy analysis and imitation; thus, an artist may demonstrate his craft in painting sunlight but he manifests his art in painting a scene that conveys his feeling to the spectator.

2 Craft, handicraft, profession, *trade.

3 Art, science are comparable when they designate a branch of learning. Art (especially as it is found today in the phrases: the liberal arts, bachelor of arts, master of arts) historically refers to one of the fundamental branches of learning regarded as necessary to every educated person and serving as an instrument for his advancement in knowledge not only generally but specifically in his professional studies. In the Middle Ages, the liberal arts were grammar, logic, rhetoric, arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy; with these as a foundation, a student was ready to proceed with his studies in philosophy, theology, law, or the like. In modern times, the liberal arts, as interpreted by various colleges giving arts degrees, are the disciplinary or instrumental branches of learning, as distinguished from those that are technical or professional in their character; or, often, the cultural, as distinguished from the vocational, studies. Science was also used in the late Middle Ages and the Renaissance of a branch of learning. It was not identical with art, however, because it was not restricted to studies giving the rudiments or providing the apparatus for further study, but was applied to any branch of learning that was a recognized subject of study. "I do present you with a man of mine, Cunning in music and the mathematics, To instruct her fully in those sciences" (Shak.). "A gentleman of Tyre; my name, Pericles; My education been in arts and arms" (Shak.).

Since the nineteenth century, especially in reference to departments of knowledge or courses given in schools, colleges, and universities, these words show a wider divergence in implications and applications and a tendency (especially in the plural forms) to be used as generic terms. On the one hand, art is applied to those courses which have for their end teaching students to make or do something that requires skill and a knowledge of technique, and also, usually, special gifts such as inventiveness, taste, or ingenuity; as, the manual arts; the fine art of painting; instruction in the arts of design. On the other hand, science is applied only to such courses (or generally, to all such courses or studies) as deal with the gathering and classification of facts, the drawing of correct inferences from them, and the establishment of verifiable general laws; as, the science of physics, of botany, of economics; to major in science; teachers of science. Still other distinctions are drawn between the two, when art or science refers not so much to a branch of learning as to a pursuit for which one is prepared by the study of an art or science; thus, questions arise as to whether architecture is an art or a science, that is, (1) whether its essential demands of the architect are inventiveness, taste, and technical skill, or a knowledge of the principles of physics, of engineering, and of other related sciences; (2) whether the end to be served is to give aesthetic pleasure or to produce something useful. "Hence rhetoric was for Rome both an art and a science . . . It had obvious utilitarian value, and its materials were not only exact logical concepts, but the sonorous words and the noble rhythms which were the glory of their tongue" (Buchan).

Ana. Craftsman, handicraftsman, mechanic, workman (see WORKER).

artificial. Artificial, factitious, synthetic, ersatz come into comparison because they mean not brought into being by nature but by human art, effort, or some process of manufacture. They are not often interchangeable, however, because of differences in some of their implications and in their range of application. Artificial is far more extensively used than the others. It may be applied to anything that is not produced by natural conditions but is, in a sense, a human creation; as, "most of the inequalities in the existing world are artificial" (B. Russell); the family is a natural society, the state is an artificial society; in law, a corporation, an institution, or the like, that may be the subject of rights or duties, is called an artificial person, in distinction from a human being, who is a natural person. Artificial is also applicable to something that has its counterpart in nature and is, therefore, an imitation or likeness; thus, natural heat emanates from the sun, from warm-blooded bodies, or the like, but artificial heat comes from burning fuel or electricity; natural ice is produced by the freezing of water in temperatures below 32° Fahrenheit, artificial ice is produced by chemical and physical means. The word is also applied to things which imitate the appearance of something that is found in nature, and in some cases serve the same purposes, but which are otherwise described as false, or not genuine; as, artificial flowers, leather, or gems. Artificial is also applicable to persons, their acts, utterances, and the like; it then implies lack of naturalness or spontaneity and often connotes affectation, conventionality, formalism, or the like. "Set him [a Frenchman] to write poetry, he is limited, artificial, and impotent; set him to write prose, he is free, natural, and effective" (Arnold). "The strained artificial romanticism of Kotzebue's lugubrious dramas" (J. W. Krutch). Factitious is applied largely to intangible things such as emotions, states of mind, situations, relations, reasons, which are not naturally caused or are not the product of real circumstances, but are manufactured (that is, "got up," "trumped up," "worked up," "cooked up," or the like) for one's own ends or purposes; as, to create a factitious demand for shares of a given stock; the vogue was short-lived because factitious. "His trick of doing nothing with an air, His salon manners and society smile, Were but skin-deep, factitious" (W. Watson). "They stood for Parliament and played the game of politics upon factitious issues" (H. G. Wells). Synthetic, as here compared, is applicable to any manufactured substance that is made either by a chemical combination of natural substances (as, a synthetic perfume) or by chemical treatment of one natural substance so that it acquires the appearance and characteristics of another and may be used in place of it; thus, synthetic silk is made by the chemical treatment of cellulose; a synthetic rubber is made by the polymerization of chloroprene. Synthetic is often preferred to artificial in distinguishing products that are derived by chemical combination or treatment from natural products of the same class or kind; thus, one may speak of rayon as an artificial silk or as a synthetic fabric, or of oleomargarine as artificial butter or as a synthetic foodstuff. This use is especially favored when the synthetic article has qualities, virtues, or uses not characteristic of the thing it originally imitates. However, the content and application of the word are still in a process of fluctuation. Ersatz (a German word meaning primarily replacement, and secondarily an artificial substitute for a natural product) is now frequently used in English as a synonym of artificial or synthetic always, however, with the implication of use as a substitute; it is used chiefly with the name of a natural product (as, ersatz coffee, ersatz butter, ersatz wool) thereby implying imitation and inferiority and, often, suggesting a base or disagreeable origin. "The search for Ersatz . . . materials was unceasing. Sugar from sawdust; flour from potato meal; gasoline from wood and coal" (J. Gunther).

Ana. Fabricated, manufactured, fashioned (see MAKE, v.): simulated, feigned, counterfeited or counterfeit (see corresponding verbs at ASSUME).

Ant. Natural. — Con. Genuine, veritable, bona fide, *authentic: *real, true, actual.

artillery. Ordnance, *armament, munitions, arms, ammunition.

artisan. 1 Artificer, *artist, architect.

2 Mechanic, workman, workingman, *worker, operative, craftsman, handicraftsman, hand, laborer, roustabout.

artist. 1 Artist, artificer, artisan, architect are here compared chiefly as meaning one who makes something beautiful or useful (or both). In their larger senses (which are sometimes their original rather than their extended senses) the words are often confused; in their current specific applications only some of them are a source of difficulty. The earliest and the abiding implication of artist is skill or proficiency (see artist under EXPERT); it was in Shakespeare's time, and later, applied to anyone who made or did things requiring learning and skill; thus, a teacher, a philosopher, a physician, a scientist, an alchemist, or a craftsman was then called an artist. "The wise and fool, the artist and unread" (Shak.). "I will give you more directions concerning fishing; for I would fain make you an Artist" (Walton). Gradually, however, the word became associated with those whose aim is to produce something which gives pleasure, first with musicians, dancers, actors, and the like, and later with poets, painters, and sculptors. The two ideas of skill and the aim to give pleasure were combined, so that since the early nineteenth century, artist (when it does not mean specifically a painter) is usually applied to a gifted person who works in the fine arts, and especially to one who reveals his skill, taste, and power to create beautiful things. "Of the faults of Scott as an artist it is not very necessary to speak" (Chesterton). "The counsels of Marcus Aurelius . . . are more fit for a moralist than for an artist" (Conrad). Artificer, the oldest of these words in English (antedating artist by nearly two centuries), still retains its earliest meaning of one who makes something by means of art and skill. Originally it was applied especially to mechanics. "I saw a smith stand with his hammer, thus . . . With open mouth swallowing a tailor's news . . . Another lean unwash'd artificer Cuts off his tale" (Shak.). Around 1600, the idea of art or skill in devising became involved in its meaning, so that it came to imply more in the way of inventiveness than is usually ascribed to mechanics. In current English it suggests craftsmanship and is applied especially to those who work in some plastic substance such as silver or gold, which permits the exercise of skill, taste, and ingenuity in contrivance. "A fine cook and artificer of strange English dishes" (Bennett). "The teacher has been only one of the artificers in the making of this changing personality [the school child]" (H. Suzzallo). In Shakespeare's time artisan was applied to the practitioner of any art (especially industrial art), chiefly, in distinction from an artist, one highly proficient in his art (especially an art requiring taste and learning). "The Germans . . . are better Artisans than Artists; better at handy-crafts than [than] at headcraft" (J. Colgrave). This difference between artisan and artist widened as artist came to imply a love of the beautiful and the power to create or produce beautiful things and became restricted in its application to a worker in the fine arts. In current use, artisan is a general term almost equal to workman, and names one engaged in a craft, a handicraft, a trade, or the like; it comprehends in its range mechanic, artificer, craftsman, machinist, and similar terms. In extended use, it is still often contrasted with artist, the latter now implying imaginative power and a passion for perfection, the former mere mechanical industry. "Free verse is not yet out of the experimental stage, and the artists who practice it have still the artisans in their own craft to reckon with" (Loues). Architect has never lost its etymological implication of a master builder, though it has come to stress more the designing of that which is to be built than actual participation in its erection. Specifically it designates a person whose profession it is to plan buildings or structures in detail and to exercise supervision over their construction in order to see that the design is executed in every particular. In extended use, the word usually implies the power to conceive a thing as a whole and in detail in advance of its coming into being, as well as to control its execution. It is often applied to the Creator (as, "the Architect," "the great Architect," "the grand Architect"). Although it comes close to artist in its implications of imaginative power and constructive ability, it differs from the former in its greater emphasis upon design than upon execution. "The hasty multitude Admiring entered [the newly erected palace of Satan]; and the work some praise, And some the architect" (Milton). "The poet is an artificer by profession, an architect experimenting with a variety of materials, concerned with . . . new designs" (Day Lewis).

Ana. Craftsman, workman (see WORKER): creator, *maker: *writer, composer, author.

2 Artiste, virtuoso, *expert, adept, wizard, dab, dabster. artiste. Artist, virtuoso, adept, *expert, dab, dabster, wizard.

artistic. Artistic, aesthetic (or esthetic) are often understood as equivalent terms, especially when used in such collocations as the artistic, or aesthetic, temperament; artistic, or aesthetic, satisfaction; artistic, or aesthetic, standards or values; for artistic, or aesthetic, reasons. In precise use, they are very carefully distinguished. In general, artistic stresses the point of view of the artist, or of one who actually produces a work of art, who thinks in terms of technique, of the relationship of details to the design of the whole, of the effects to be gained, and who, therefore, regards beauty as a thing that results from his attention to these matters and that is his creation. By extension, artistic also may imply the point of view of one who studies or judges art objectively from the artist's angle. On the other hand, aesthetic stresses the point of view of one who contemplates a finished work of art or beauty that exists, and thinks in terms of the effect it has upon him and especially of the sensations it stimulates and the feelings it excites. Strictly, the artistic temperament shows itself in an urge to fashion or to express, and to create out of materials, or of words, or of sounds, the beautiful thing that the artist designs or conceives: the aesthetic temperament shows itself in responsiveness to beauty wherever it is found, and by contrast, in aversion to that which is ugly. Artistic satisfaction is the gratification that comes to one who can look at a work of art (his own or another's) and call it good: aesthetic satisfaction is the content that accompanies the enjoyment of beauty for its own sake and independently of all other considerations. For aesthetic, largely because of its connection with aesthetics, the branch of philosophy or of psychology dealing with beauty, usually implies a distinction between that which is beautiful and that which is moral, or useful, or merely pleasing. Artistic standards are, therefore, the tests of perfection in a work of art which artists and critics have accepted: aesthetic standards are the criteria (usually subjective) which have been set up by aestheticians or by the individual to enable one to distinguish that which is beautiful from that which is merely pleasing or gratifying.

artless. *Natural, simple, ingenuous, naïve, unsophisticated, unaffected.

Ana. *Spontaneous, impulsive: candid, open, plain, *frank: *straightforward, aboveboard, forthright.

Art. Artful: affected. — Con. *Sly, cunning, wily: designing (see INTEND).

as. Since, *because, for, inasmuch as.

ascend. 1 *Rise, arise, mount, soar, tower, rocket, levitate, surge.

Ana. Elevate, raise, rear, *lift: *advance, progress.

Ant. Descend.

2 Ascend, mount, climb, scale agree in meaning to move upward to or toward the top of (something). Ascend is the most colorless of these terms, for it implies little more than progressive upward movement; as, to ascend a mountain or hill; the car rapidly ascended the steep grade. It may, however, be specifically used of movement along a river in the direction of its source; as, the Amazon can be ascended by seagoing ships 2300 miles. Mount almost invariably implies getting up on something above the level of the ground and is therefore preferred to ascend in some collocations; thus, one mounts (better than ascends) a platform or a scaffold but one may ascend (or mount) a throne; one mounts (not ascends) a horse. Climb usually suggests effort and ascent by the use of various means, such as the hands and feet or, in the case of vehicles, of gears or extra power; as, to climb a tree, a pole, the social ladder. "To climb steep hills Requires slow pace at first" (Shak.). Scale adds to climb not only the suggestion of progression by steps but that of great difficulty; it is referable therefore to feats of climbing; as, to scale a wall, a precipice. "A ladder quaintly made of cords . . . Would serve to scale another Hero's tower" (Shak.). Ant. Descend.

ascendancy or ascendancy. *Supremacy.

Ana. Dominance, predominance (see corresponding adjectives at DOMINANT): command, sway, dominion, control, *power, authority: sovereignty (see corresponding adjective at FREE).

ascension. Ascension, ascent are often used in distinction from each other when they denote the act of moving upward or the movement upward. Ascension in modern precise use occurs chiefly where there is no implication of effort or difficulty in rising, and where there is, usually, the suggestion of movement activated by some property in the thing which ascends; as, a balloon ascension. The chief use is religious, however, and in one restricted reference; as, the Ascension of Jesus (or Our Lord) into heaven. The phrase "the Ascension of the Virgin Mary" occurs, but is regarded as incorrect, "Assumption" (a taking up) being the technical term. Ascent, on the other hand, is preferred when there is any implication of effort or of a human agent or operator; as, during their ascent of the mountain; the scientists effected an ascent to the stratosphere; her rapid ascent in the social scale; to make an ascent of three miles in an airplane. These distinctions are not always observed, however, for ascension is increasingly rare except in religious and some astronomical use, and ascent is employed, even by good writers, in all collocations where ascension is sometimes preferred or is traditionally used.

ascent. *Ascension.

ascertain. Determine, *discover, unearth, learn.

Ana. Inquire, query, interrogate, *ask: study, contemplate, weigh, *consider: observe, survey (see SEE).

Con. *Conjecture, surmise, guess: presume, assume (see PRESUPPOSE).

ascetic, adj. Austere, *severe, stern.

Ana. Disciplined, trained, schooled (see TEACH): self-denying, self-abnegating (see corresponding nouns at RENUNCIATION): abstaining or abstinent, forbearing (see corresponding verbs at REFRAIN): abstemious (see corresponding noun at TEMPERANCE).

Ant. Luxurious, voluptuous (see SENSUOUS). — Con. *Sensuous, sensual, epicurean, sybaritic: dissolute, *abandoned.

ascetic, n. Ascetic, mystic and their derivative nouns asceticism, mysticism are not synonyms but are not always clearly distinguished, partly because of overlapping implications but largely because the first two are often applicable to the same person. Historically many of the great mystics have been ascetics. But ascetic suggests an austere mode of life in which everything that does not contribute to, or may interfere with, the end in view (usually spiritual, sometimes intellectual, perfection) is sacrificed, and certain acts, such as fasting and mortification in the religious life, are practiced not for their own sake but for their disciplinary effect, especially in strengthening one's powers of contemplation. Mystic, on the other hand, suggests the possession of a power, such as a high capacity for contemplation, or of an "inner light," by means of which one overpasses the limits of human reason and by a kind of spiritual sight comes to a knowledge of that which is divine or supernatural. Ascetic and mystic, therefore, when applied to the same person, regard him from different points of view; the former implies that he practices austerities believed favorable to spiritual contemplation; the latter, that he has had the mystical experiences that are the end of contemplation. But the two terms do not necessarily imply each other; ascetic, even when applied to those who aim at spiritual perfection, does not connote attainment of mystical knowledge; mystic, on the other hand, does not invariably imply a connection with an ascetic life. Although asceticism and mysticism may denote doctrines or practices, their chief differences are apparent when they denote the theory upon which such doctrines and practices are based. Asceticism often designates the theory that abstinence from otherwise lawful acts or pleasures and the practice of austerities are conducive to spiritual and intellectual perfection; mysticism, the theory that immediate knowledge of God or ultimate reality is attainable through a faculty that transcends the reason and makes no use of ordinary human perceptive or ratiocinative powers. "One is sometimes tempted to think that to approve mysticism is to preach asceticism. Certainly many mystics have been ascetic. But that has been the accident of their philosophy, and not the essence of their religion" (H. Ellis).

Ana. Anchorite, hermit, eremite, cenobite (see RE-CLUSE): monk, friar, nun, *religious.

Ant. Bon vivant. — Con. *Epicure, gourmet, gourmand, glutton: sensualist, voluptuary, Sybarite (see corresponding adjectives at SENSUOUS).

asceticism. Mysticism (see under ASCETIC, n.).

ascribe. Ascribe, attribute, impute, assign, refer, credit, accredit, charge are synonymous when they mean to lay something (creditable, discreditable, or neutral) to the account of a person or thing. The first four of these words are often used interchangeably without marked loss, but their distinctions in discriminating use are here emphasized. One ascribes to a person or thing something which is not outwardly apparent but which may be inferred or conjectured, such as a motive, a feeling, an opinion, or a value. "Whatever else might be in her head, it was . . . neither love, nor romance, nor any of the emotions usually ascribed to the young" (V. Sackville-West). Also, one ascribes something whose origin is unknown or disputed to that which is conjectured to be its source, cause, or author; as, a poem formerly ascribed to Chaucer. "That conceit always ascribed to a lack of intelligence" (Brownell). One attributes to a person or thing something believed, usually on good grounds, to belong to it or to be appropriate to it, such as a quality, a character, or a value, or something for which that person or thing is judged to be responsible or accountable. "If he disclaimed the virtues attributed to him he should only accentuate his embarrassment" (C. Mackenzie). "A combination . . . might have attributed to it . . . the character of a monopoly merely by virtue of its size" (Justice Holmes). "The counter-reformation, and the collapse of Protestantism in France, must be largely attributed to Jesuit efforts" (B. Russell). One imputes when one so definitely ascribes something to a person or, less often, a thing, that the ascription is impressed on (etymologically, "thought into") that person or thing. For this reason, impute commonly, but not invariably, implies accusation and, often, its resulting stigma. "How dare you, sir, impute such monstrous intentions to me?" (Shaw). One assigns something to a person or thing when one deliberately attributes a character, a value, an origin, or the like which definitely places or fixes that person or thing, as in the class to which he or it belongs, under a certain description, at the date when it occurred, or the like. "More than one rejoinder declared that the importance I here assigned to criticism was excessive" (Arnold). "He concluded that they [poems of disputed authorship] must be assigned to Vaughan" (Quiller-Couch). Also, one assigns a reason for something when one definitely fixes or states the ground, excuse, or motive for that thing; as, it is impossible to assign any reason for his failure. Sometimes, assign suggests allegation, but this connotation is usually derived from the context. "Whatever reason of discontent the farmers may assign, the true cause is this" (Coleridge). One refers a thing (rarely a person) to the class to which it belongs or to its origin when, after tracing it back, one assigns it to its proper category or to its ultimate cause or source; as, the aurora borealis is commonly referred to the class of electric phenomena. "I am convinced that at least one-half of their bad manners may be referred to their education" (Quiller-Couch). One credits someone with something, or something to someone, when one ascribes the thing to some person or thing as its author, its agent, its source, or its explanation. "People credited Moriarty's queerness of manner and moody ways to the solitude" (Kipling). Sometimes, credit suggests unwarranted belief. "Aunt Rosa had credited him in the past with petty cunning and stratagem that had never entered into his head" (Kipling). One accredits a person or, rarely, a thing with something said or done, when one accepts him as the author or agent or it as the cause or motive, thereby tasking him or it with responsibility. "Mr. Bright himself was accredited with having said that his own effort to arouse a reforming spirit . . . was like flogging a dead horse" (J. McCarthy). One charges something on (or upon) a person or thing when one fixes the responsibility for a fault, crime, evil, or the like on him or it. "Crimes as base as any charged on me?" (Cowper).

Ana. Attach, *fasten, affix: *conjecture, surmise, guess: allege, advance, *adduce, cite.

asepsis. See under STERILE.

aseptic, adj. *Sterile, antiseptic.

asexualize. *Sterilize, castrate, spay, geld, emasculate, mutilate, caponize.

ash. *Ashes, cinders, embers, clinkers.

ashamed. Ashamed, mortified, chagrined agree in meaning acutely or manifestly conscious of embarrassment and humiliation. One is ashamed whose embarrassment and humiliation are mixed sometimes with a sense of guilt, and always with the awareness of being discredited or disgraced by one's own or, vicariously, another's, shameful or indecorous act, behavior, situation, or the like. "He sees he has nothing to be ashamed of in you—rather everything to be proud of" (Meredith). "Suddenly Joe began to cry. He was ashamed and did not want his wife to see" (S. Anderson). One is also ashamed who by anticipating such feelings is reluctant or unwilling to do something that seems shameful. "What shall I do? for my lord taketh away from me the stewardship: I cannot dig; to beg I am ashamed" (Luke xvi. 3). One is mortified whose embarrassment and humiliation are mixed with a strong sense of being put in a false or disagreeable light and who suffers more because of loss of esteem or a hurt to his own pride than because of the shameful or indecorous character of the act, behavior, or situation; as, he professed not to be ashamed of his conduct, but he was mortified when his parents learned of it. "Don't spare him; let the university expel him! . . . Let Robert be ashamed, if you would save his soul alive! . . . Robert was sullen and mortified, but, alas, not ashamed" (M. Deland). One is chagrined whose embarrassment and humiliation are accompanied by vexation or annoyance. "Tony, somewhat chagrined at his mistake, said he should like to see the other pictures" (Arch. Marshall). "I was as much chagrined as they were flabbergasted by this involuntary outbreak" (L. P. Smith).

Ana. Embarrassed, discomfited, abashed (see EMBARRASS): humiliated, humbled, abased (see ABASE): abject, *mean: contrite, penitent, repentant (see corresponding nouns at PENITENCE).

Ant. Proud. — Con. Vain, vainglorious (see under PRIDE, n.): arrogant, overbearing (see PROUD).

ashen. Ashy, livid, pallid, wan, *pale.

Ana. *Ghastly, grim, macabre: blanched, bleached, decolorized (see WHITEN).

ashes. Ashes, ash, cinders, clinkers, embers are comparable when they mean the remains of combustible material after it has been destroyed by fire. Ashes, in precise use, implies perfect combustion and a powdery residue consisting only of incombustible and thoroughly disintegrated mineral or earthy substances; as, wood ashes are used as a fertilizer; the house and its furnishings were reduced to ashes. Ash differs from ashes only in suggesting a solid mass, not yet disintegrated; as, the ash of a cigar; soda ash. Cinders, in careful use, carries the implication of either incomplete or imperfect combustion and is applied to a residue, usually of a coal fire, consisting of coarse particles which, if the combustion is incomplete, are capable of further burning, but without flame (as, to sift the ashes from the cinders), or which, if combustion is imperfect, are more precisely called small clinkers. A clinker is a fused or vitrified stony mass such as is formed in burning impure coal or in smelting metals containing impurities, or is ejected from a volcano; thus, cinders which are composed mainly of small clinkers are often used for surfacing paths, driveways, and tracks (cf. a cinder track). Embers is applied to the still glowing or still smoldering remains of a fire just before it is reduced to ashes or cinders.

ashy. Ashen, livid, pallid, wan, *pale.

Ana. See those at ASHEN.

asinine. *Simple, fatuous, silly, foolish.

Ana. *Stupid, crass, dumb, dense, dull: puerile (see YOUTHFUL): *irrational, unreasonable.

Ant. Sensible, judicious. — Con. *Wise, sane, prudent, sapient, sage: *intelligent, clever, knowing, smart: *rational, reasonable.

ask. 1 Ask, question, interrogate, query, inquire (or enquire), speer (or speir, spier), catechize, quiz, examine agree in meaning to address a person in an attempt to elicit information. Ask is the general or colorless term for putting a question; as, ask and you will find; to ask the price of an article; ask your brother if he will join us. "None of them [certain philosophers] understood how to ask the question which they were trying to answer" (H. Ellis). Question usually suggests asking one question after another, as in teaching, in examining a witness or a candidate, or the like; as, to question a suspect at length; Socrates preferred questioning his disciples to lecturing them. Interrogate stresses formal or systematic questioning. "They examined many witnesses . . . whom they interrogated, not only upon the express words of the statute, but upon all . . . collateral or presumptive circumstances" (Bp. Burnet). Query is often formal or bookish for ask, but it may be used without a suggestion of either formality or bookishness when it strongly implies a desire for authoritative information or the resolution of a doubt; as, "Should not one query whether he had not those proofs in his hands antecedent to the cabinet?" (Walpole). In current use, the word is specifically a proof-reader's term. "If the copy is not perfectly clear, or if you have reason to doubt its correctness, look up the point or query it to the publisher's editor . . . Do not query a misspelled word in ordinary text . . . Never query style to the author" (Manual of Style, U. of Chicago Press). Inquire has for its fundamental implication a search for the facts or the truth; only when it distinctly implies in addition to such an intention the asking of a question or questions does it come into comparison with the other words of this group; as, to inquire the best route to New York City; to inquire when the public library would be open. "It was soon evident that this was the redleman who had inquired for her" (Hardy). Speer, which is chiefly a Scottish and North of England term, comes very close to inquire, with its dual implication of a search and the asking of questions. It does not, however, as often suggest an investigation as does inquire, and frequently it connotes curiosity as the motive. "Speer as little about him as he does about you" (Scott). Catechize adds to interrogate the suggestion of an aim to elicit a certain kind of answer. Often the answers expected are definite statements of doctrine already phrased in a catechism (a book supplying questions and answers concerning the doctrines of a church); as, to catechize a candidate for the ministry. In extended use, however, there is often the implication of a desire to lead the person who is questioned into making answers that are self-condemnatory or that will reveal his weaknesses; as, it was their policy to catechise every candidate for a doctor's degree at the beginning of his advanced studies. Quiz is a colloquial term frequently used in American colleges; it implies a careful, often a thoroughgoing, interrogation of a class to determine how well a series of lectures or a course of reading has been understood and assimilated. Examine, in the special sense in which it is here considered (for leading sense, see SCRUTINIZE), implies interrogation or catechizing for the purpose of drawing answers that indicate how much or how little a person knows, as from students when their fitness for promotion is to be decided, or from candidates for a position when it is necessary to determine the extent of their preparation and the adequacy of their training, or from those giving testimony in a trial, or when the lawyers on each side try to elicit information of value to their clients; as, the students in this course are examined at the end of the year; no candidate for a civil service position is considered until he has been examined with all other candidates and given a satisfactory rating; it took the whole day to examine and to cross-examine the principal witness.

Con. Reply, *answer, respond, rejoin, retort.

2 Ask, request, solicit agree in meaning to seek to obtain by making one's wants or desires known. Ask, in this as well as in its primary sense, implies expectation of a response, often an affirmative response; as, I am going to ask a favor of you; he asked the close attention of all his audience; to ask the citizens for their full co-operation. Request, by its suggestion of greater courtesy and formality in the manner of asking, is preferable to ask when one feels that what one wants may not be granted, either for lack of power or means or of interest on the other side, or when one wishes to be exceedingly polite or ingratiating; as, to request a loan; to request the presence of a person at a reception (the formula for a formal invitation); to request an opportunity to present one's opinions. Solicit belongs with this group rather than with that discriminated at BEG, because it now seldom implies earnest entreaty or urging; its most common suggestion in present-day use is that of calling attention to one's wants and desires in the hope of having them satisfied; thus, a merchant solicits trade by means of letters, or handbills, or advertisements in journals; a magazine solicits subscriptions when it sends an agent (a solicitor) to interview possible subscribers.

Ana. Appeal, petition, plead, pray, sue (see under PRAYER): *address, accost.

Con. *Get, obtain, acquire, secure: *decline, refuse, spurn: *deny, gainsay.

askance. Askew, *awry.

Ana. Mistrustfully, distrustfully (see corresponding verbs at DISTRUST): enviously, jealously (see corresponding adjectives at ENVOUS).

Ant. Straightforwardly, directly.

askew. *Awry, askance.

Ana. Crookedly, obliquely (see corresponding adjectives at CROOKED).

Ant. Straight.

asocial. *Unsocial, antisocial, nonsocial.

Ant. Social.

aspirant. *Candidate, applicant, nominee.

aspiration. *Ambition, pretension.

Ana. Aim, goal, objective (see INTENTION): *desire, passion, lust, yen.

aspire. *Aim, pant.

Ana. Crave, covet, *desire: *long, yearn, hunger, thirst, pine.

Con. *Stoop, condescend, deign: grovel, *wallow.

assail. Bombard, *attack, assault, storm.

Ana. Beset (see INFEST): belabor, pummel, buffet, pound, *beat.

assassin. Assassin, cutthroat, gunman, trigger man, finger man, bravo designate a murderer, or one who can be hired to murder, in cold blood. Assassin, etymologically a hashish eater, was originally applied to one of an order of Mohammedans who were employed during the Crusades and later to murder Christians and who were sent forth under the influence of this drug. The term in all of its uses stresses secrecy and treachery in operation; as, like assassins, these destructive animals do their work in the dark. It is now chiefly applied to murderers of important personages; as, tyrants always live in dread of assassins; revolutions breed assassins. Cutthroat and gunman designate professional and, usually, hiring murderers. Cutthroat is now chiefly literary (or merely figurative) because daggers and knives are no longer the weapons usually employed by such criminals, but the word still commonly suggests the brutal methods of a ruffian. "Thou [the hired murderer of Banquo] art the best o' the cut-throats" (Shak.). "I am a soldier, sir, and not a cut-throat" (Froude). Gunman, in current use, is applied chiefly to a gangster, especially to one engaged in a robbery and supplied with firearms, or to a murderer by occupation who, under the orders of a leader or employer, shoots to kill. Since the term is also applied to a person who aids the killer in accomplishing his aim, trigger man is often used, in underworld slang, in place of gunman for the actual murderer, and finger man for the assistant who points out the intended victim. Bravo was the term common in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries for a type of brutal ruffian; the term usually implied his availability for hire as a murderer. It is now chiefly historical or literary. "The hired bravos who defend 'The tyrant's throne'" (Shelley).

Ana. Murderer, slayer, killer, assassinator (see corresponding verbs at KILL).

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

assassinate. Murder, *kill, slay, dispatch, execute.

assault, n. *Attack, onslaught, onset.

Ana. Assailing, bombarding or bombardment, storming or storm (see corresponding verbs at ATTACK): *invasion, incursion, raid.

assault, v. Storm, *attack, bombard, assail.

Ana. Smite, slug, *strike: *beat, pound, buffet, pummel.

Con. Resist, withstand, *oppose, combat: *defend, protect, shield, guard.

assay, v. Essay, attempt, try, endeavor, striving, struggle. See under ATTEMPT, v.

Ana. *Effort, exertion: trial, test, proof (see under PROVE).

assay, v. 1 Essay, *attempt, try, endeavor, strive, struggle.

Ana. *Aim, aspire: *begin, commence, start.

2 Assess, evaluate, *estimate, appraise, value, rate.

Ana. *Analyze, resolve: *calculate, compute, reckon: *prove, test, try, demonstrate.

assemblage. 1 Assembly, collection, congregation, gathering. See under GATHER.

Ana. *Aggregate, aggregation: *crowd, throng, horde, crush, press: *flock, drove, herd, pack, swarm.

2 Assemblage, assembly are not always interchangeable in concrete use (that is, when they denote that which is assembled). Assemblage may be used freely in reference either to persons or to things (as, an assemblage of farmers from every section of the state; an assemblage of the city's manufactured products for exhibition); it may imply a unit that is a collection of individuals of the same general kind, or one that is a whole formed by the union of miscellaneous things (as, an assemblage of logs; an automobile is an assemblage of various distinct parts); it may be applied to something that can be seen as a unit or whole or that can be conceived as such. "We have just been picturing nature as an assemblage of particles set in a framework of space and time" (Jeans). Assembly, on the other hand, was until recently restricted in its application to a group of persons who gather together in a given place, usually for the purpose of acting in concert or of social enjoyment, or, in a more specific sense, in order to serve as a deliberative or legislative body; as, the mayor decided to call an assembly of the citizens; the New York State Assembly. There is a tendency now to use assembly instead of assemblage of a structure, or machine, or part of a machine, that is formed by the union of different parts; as, a hub assembly.

2 *Assemblage.

Ana. See those at ASSEMBLY, 1.

assent, v. Assent, consent, accede, acquiesce, agree, subscribe and their corresponding nouns, express in common the idea of concurrence with what someone else has stated or proposed. Assent implies primarily an act of the understanding and applies to opinions or propositions. "One was convinced and believed and assented" (D. Webster). "Whatever is expressed with art—whether it be a lover's despair or a metaphysical theory—pierces the mind and compels assent and acceptance" (A. Huxley).

Consent involves the will or the feelings and indicates compliance with what is requested or desired. A lady may assent to a gentleman's opinion on the weather, but if he makes a proposal of marriage he must await her consent. "If a thing has been practiced for two hundred years by common consent, it will need a strong case for the Fourteenth Amendment to affect it" (Justice Holmes). Neither assent nor consent necessarily implies approval; as, one sometimes assents against his better judgment. Accede implies a yielding, either of one's adherence (as to a cause) or of one's assent (as to a statement or proposal). "Potidaea had already acceded to the confederacy" (Thirlwall). "Mr. Bennet could have no hesitation in acceding to the proposal before him" (Austen). Acquiesce implies tacit acceptance or forbearance of opposition. "No organism acquiesces in its own destruction" (Mencken). Agree may or may not imply previous difference of opinion, but it very often carries an implication of this and also of previous discussion, negotiation, or attempts at persuasion; as, he reluctantly agreed that his son be allowed to choose his own college; he finally agreed to the proposal. "Post, my lord, to France; Agree to any covenants" (Shak.). Subscribe denotes assent but it implies in addition hearty approval; as here compared, it seldom implies signing one's name in token of assent, but it does connote a willingness to go on record. "No one would subscribe at present to the Kantian doctrine, that mathematics derive their validity from their applicability to sensible experience" (S. Alexander).

Ana. Accept, *receive: *adopt, embrace, espouse: believe, credit (see corresponding nouns at BELIEF).

Ant. Dissent. — Con. *Deny, gainsay, impugn: reject, spurn, refuse (see DECLINE): *object, protest.

assert. 1 Assert, declare, affirm, aver, protest, avouch, avow, predicate, warrant, as here compared, agree in meaning to state positively either in anticipation of denial or objection or in the face of it. Assert implies absence of proof: it usually ascribes to the speaker or writer either assurance of the grounds for his statement or such confidence in his opinions as to make him indifferent to evidence. "That rigid sect which asserts that all real science is precise measurement" (H. Ellis). "Hobart . . . could talk; he could assert . . . but he couldn't meet or answer arguments" (R. Macaulay). Declare (see also DECLARE) adds to assert the implication of open or public statement. "They do not, for the most part . . . declare . . . that no war can ever be right" (Inge). "Some one had seen Steve Hunter shot down in the street and had declared the harness maker had done it" (S. Anderson). Affirm implies conviction of truth and willingness to stand by one's statement because it is supported by evidence, one's experience, faith, or the like. "Yet, with the evidence before us . . . we cannot affirm that this is the later play" (T. S. Eliot). "These things I will that thou affirm constantly" (Titus iii. 8). Aver suggests complete confidence and certainty of truth. "For all averred, I had killed the bird" (Coleridge). Protest (see also OBJECT) stresses emphasis in affirmation, especially in the face of doubt or contradiction. "I here protest, in sight of heaven . . . I am clear" (Shak.). "He protested that, except Lady Catherine and her daughter, he had never seen a more elegant woman" (Austen). Avouch usually imputes authority or personal knowledge to the one who makes a positive statement. "His own deposition, as three Cardinals avouched that he had made it before them" (C. M. Yonge). Avow, now somewhat rare in this sense, implies open and emphatic declaration and personal responsibility for the statement. "We affirm and avow that the very meanest translation of the Bible in English . . . containeth the word of God" (Bible: Preface to A.V., 1611). Predicate, though once often and still occasionally used as a close synonym of the preceding words, is now chiefly a term of logic implying the affirmation of something as a quality, a property, or an attribute of a thing, especially of a thing as a member of its class, species, or genus; as, to predicate sweetness of sugar, or whiteness of snow; to predicate intelligence of human beings; "logic works by predicating of the single instance what is true of all its kind" (W. James). In somewhat looser use, the term implies the affirmation of a quality, property, or attribute which can be regarded as evidently or permanently a possession of the individual person or thing described. "There was nothing to be predicated of him in general: he was but a bundle of incongruities, most of them unattractive, and, in combination, futile" (Belloc). Because that which is predicated of a thing is accepted as true and forms a postulate for one's reasoning regarding that thing, the word predicate is now often used, especially in the United States, in the sense of to ground or to base (as, success predicated on efficiency). Such a meaning, though found in writers like Charles Sumner and J. R. Lowell, has not been generally approved. Warrant, in the sense here considered (see also JUSTIFY, 3), is now found chiefly in colloquial use; it carries a strong implication of assurance or positiveness, sometimes suggesting little or no fear that one will be doubted or contradicted, and at other times connoting one's personal guarantee; as, I warrant that's just what will happen; "[My neck is] as smooth as silk, I warrant ye" (L'Estrange); "cheap-jacks who sell at dockyard gates a pill warranted to cure measles, toothache and rupture" (C. E. Montague).

Ant. Hamper: impede. — Con. *Hinder, obstruct, block: trammel, clog, fetter (see HAMPER): *prevent, forestall.

assistance. Help, aid. See under HELP, v.

Ana. Service, advantage, profit, avail, *use: supporting, upholding, backing (see SUPPORT, v): subsidy, grant, subvention, *appropriation: co-operation, concurrence (see corresponding verbs at UNITE).

Ant. Impediment: obstruction.

assistant, n. Assistant, helper, coadjutor, adjutant, aide (or aid), aide-de-camp are here compared as designations of persons who take over part of the duties of another, especially in a subordinate capacity. Assistant is applicable to any person who meets this description, regardless of the status of his work; as, a baker's assistant; a bishop's assistant; a superintendent's assistant. Helper often implies apprenticeship in a trade or the status of an unskilled laborer; as, a bricklayer's helper. Sometimes, it is euphemistic; thus, a mother's helper often performs the duties of a nursemaid. Coadjutor, in its general use, usually implies equivalence except in authority; it is chiefly applied to a co-worker. "He [Octavian] no longer stood alone; the companions of his youth [Agrippa and Maecenas] had become in the full sense his coadjutors" (Buchan). In specific use, it names or is applied to a bishop who serves as an assistant to the bishop having jurisdiction over a diocese. Especially in Roman Catholic and Protestant Episcopal use it implies the right of succession. Adjutant, now rare in its general sense, is applied almost exclusively to a staff officer in charge of the personnel division of a military command, and responsible for all records, reports, correspondence, orders (except combat orders), and the like. Aide and aide-de-camp designate a military or naval officer who personally attends a general or a sovereign, a president or a governor, often as an escort but sometimes with definitely prescribed duties.

associate, v. Connect, relate, link, *join, combine, unite.

Ana. Merge, mingle, *mix, blend, amalgamate, coalesce: organize (see ORDER, v).

Con. Alienate, *strange: *separate, part, divorce, sever, sunder, divide.

associate, n. Associate, companion, comrade, crony, chum, pal, buddy are here compared as meaning a person in company with whom one is found. Associate is the general term, referable to anyone whose company one enjoys or tolerates more or less regularly and usually on terms of equality, because of a business, social, fraternal, or similar connection, or because of a community of interests or aims; as, a person is known by his associates;

his associates included all the prominent young men of the town. "He became a leader of fashion. Then, to the visible embarrassment of his young associates, he suddenly tired of it all" (Day Lewis). Companion is referable only to a person who actually accompanies or attends one; a person who walks along the street with one or who sits with one at a restaurant table or in a Pullman section may be called a companion for the time being even if one has never seen him before and never sees him afterwards. However, the word often implies more habitual association and closer personal relationship than associate; as, his wife was his lifelong companion. "He no longer stood alone; the companions of his youth had become in the full sense his coadjutors" (Buchan). "He was her darling brother, her beloved companion in adventure" (R. Ma-caulay). Sometimes the association is not the result of friendship or of relationship but of a business arrangement; as, the old lady sought a competent paid companion. Comrade always implies association in a common calling or pursuit, and more or less familiarity in companionship; as, comrades in arms; school comrades. Commonly, however, it connotes more sentiment than either associate or companion, even though that sentiment is sometimes no more than a sense of shared fortunes or experiences, or a consciousness of having worked or played together. "Return to her . . . ? No, rather I abjure all roofs, and choose . . . To be a comrade with the wolf and owl" (Shak.). "Which weep the comrade of my choice . . . The human-hearted man I loved" (Tennyson). The word is also used as a term of address for a member of one's party or faction by communists and others. Crony was originally a term of university and school slang in England for one's most intimate friend and companion. It is now seldom used of a young person, though often applied to an older person who was one's intimate friend in school days or with whom one has been on intimate terms for a very long time; as, an old crony of his turned up after a long absence from England; the two old ladies are great cronies. Chum (regarded as colloquial) and pal (regarded as slang) are applied to one's most intimate friend or associate who is also one's close companion or comrade. Chum, which is a contraction of chamber fellow, was originally applied to one's roommate at school or college; although that implication is no longer always carried by the word, chum usually suggests constant companionship and intimacy; as, they have been chums since boyhood. Pal often carries a suggestion of helpfulness or of partnership in work or recreation; as, one does not double-cross a pal. Buddy, originally a diminutive or pet name for brother, was used by American soldiers during the World War as a slang term for a soldier comrade or, loosely, for any fellow soldier, then by extension as a general slang term equivalent in meaning to chum. The last three terms (especially chum and buddy) are applied, in loose American slang usage, especially as terms of address, to casual acquaintances or even strangers; as, a man passing by called to him "Look out, buddy."

Ana. *Partner, colleague, ally, confederate: accomplice, abettor, accessory (see CONFEDERATE): *assistant, helper, coadjutor, aide.

Corn. Antagonist, adversary, *opponent: *enemy, foe: rival, competitor (see corresponding verbs at RIVAL).

association. Association, society, club, order are comprehensive terms which agree in denoting a body of persons who unite in the pursuit of a common aim or object. Association is in general used of an organization which is inclusive in its membership, excluding only those whose personal affiliations, interests, and needs are different from those of the typical member, or, if the object of the organization is service of some sort, those who do not belong to the business, the industry, or the profession served; as, the Young Men's Christian Association; the Modern Language Association; the National Association of Manufacturers. Society is often used interchangeably with association, but it tends to suggest a more restricted aim, a closer union of members, and their more active participation, and, sometimes, a narrower field of choice of membership; as, the Christian Endeavor Society; Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals; a missionary society; a secret society; the Philological Society; Society for Ethical Culture. Club usually suggests such privacy that admission to membership is only through election and invitation; it often also implies quarters for the meeting and entertainment of members, and therefore is applied to the buildings or rooms as well as to the organization; as, going to the country club to play golf; Rotary clubs; a political club; a bridge club; most large cities have a university club. Order is now applied chiefly to a society whose members have common aims and accept common obligations, such as those of working together in brotherly union and of practicing certain virtues; as, a religious order; a fraternal order. In modern societies, order in the legal name usually, but not necessarily, suggests in addition a ritual, a uniform, and honorary distinctions; as, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

assoil. Archaic form of absolve. For synonyms, see CONFESS, EXCULPATE.

assort. Assort, sort, classify, alphabetize, pigeonhole, agree in meaning to arrange in systematic order or according to some definite method of arrangement or distribution. Assort (see also assorted under MISCELLANEOUS) implies division into groups, as of like things or of things intended for the same purpose or destination; as, to assort the contents of an attic; to assort one's papers. When used in reference to homogeneous material, assort usually implies grading, as according to size, condition, value, or the like; as, to assort oranges for the market; to assort one's books before an auction. Often, additionally, it implies selection, either of that to be eliminated or of that to be chosen or preserved. "The company indeed was perfectly assorted, since all the members belonged to the little inner group of people who, during the long New York season, disported themselves together daily and nightly" (E. Wharton). Sort usually equals assort, but is often preferred to it when the latter would seem too literary or too technical; as, to sort mail; to sort stockings; to sort yarns. Frequently, especially with out, sort implies culling or selection even more than arrangement. "He sorted and re-sorted his cargo, always finding a more necessary article for which a less necessary had to be discarded" (Cather). Classify is more often used of things that fall into intellectual categories than of those which can be physically grouped. It usually implies a division into types, genera, species, or the like, and an arrangement for convenience in dealing with material that cannot be assembled or that is not before one; as, to classify bodies of water; to classify poems as epic, lyric, and dramatic; to classify languages according to the way in which words are formed. Alphabetize is used only of material which lends itself to arrangement according to the letters of the alphabet or to some filing scheme; thus, letters may be alphabetized under their writers' names; papers may be alphabetized by subject or topic; one must assort one's papers before alphabetizing them. Pigeonhole is a picturesque term suggesting an arrangement of small compartments as in a writing desk or of boxes in a post office, each compartment being a receptacle for one group of letters or papers that are sorted or classified. In extended use, the word implies the ability to put each of a number of things in its right class or category; thus, one who pigeonholes the wild flowers he meets on a day's walk assigns each to its proper classification or is able to give it its proper specific or generic name; one pigeonholes every bit of information that comes to him who files it away in his memory properly labeled and in its right place with relation to the rest of his knowledge.

Ana. Arrange, methodize, systematize, *order.

Con. *Mix, mingle, commingle: derange, disarrange, disorganize, *disorder.

assorted. *Miscellaneous, heterogeneous, motley, promiscuous.

Ana. Diverse, *different, various, disparate, divergent: selected, picked, chosen, preferred (see CHOOSE): mixed, mingled (see MIX).

Ant. Jumbled. — Con. Like, *similar, identical, uniform.

assortment. See corresponding adjective assorted at MISCELLANEOUS.

Ana. *Mixture, blend, compound: combining or combination, associating or association, uniting or union (see corresponding verbs at JOIN).

Ant. Jumble, hodgepodge.

assuage. Alleviate, *relieve, mitigate, lighten, allay.

Ana. Temper, *moderate, attemper: *comfort, solace, console: mollify, placate, appease, *pacify.

Ant. Exacerbate: intensify. — Con. Kindle, enkindle, inflame (see LIGHT, v.): aggravate, heighten (see INTENSIFY): *increase, augment.

assume. 1 *Take.

Ana. Accept, *receive: *arrogate, pre-empt, usurp: vest, invest, *clothe.

2 Assume, affect, pretend, simulate, feign, counterfeit, sham agree in meaning to put on false or deceptive appearances. Assume often implies a pardonable motive rather than an intent to deceive. "It sometimes happens that by assuming an air of cheerfulness we become cheerful in reality" (Cowper). To affect is to make a show of possessing or using, usually for effect, sometimes because of one's liking for it; as, to affect plainness of speech. "To affect a gesture, an opinion, a phrase, because it is the rage with a large number of persons" (Hazlitt). "Jones had really that taste for humour which others affect" (Fielding). Pretend implies overt profession of what is false; as, "that pretended liking called politeness" (L. P. Smith); to pretend to be insane. To simulate is to assume the appearance or characteristics of something else by imitating its signs; as, to simulate insanity. Feign implies more invention than pretend, less specific imitation of life than simulate; as, to feign madness (by a fictitious representation). "I grow angry and I curse them, and they feign penitence, but behind my back I know they call me a toothless old ape" (Kipling). But feign and simulate are often interchangeable. Counterfeit implies the highest degree of verisimilitude of any of the words in this group. "Are you not mad indeed? or do you but counterfeit?" (Shak.). "There was never counterfeit of passion came so near the life of passion" (Shak.). Sham always implies feigning with an intent to deceive; it usually connotes deception so obvious that it fools only the gullible; as, to sham sickness; to sham sleeping. "'E's all 'ot sand an' ginger when alive, An' 'e's generally shammin' when 'e's dead" (Kipling).

Ana. Dissemble, *disguise, cloak, mask.

3 *Presuppose, postulate, presume, premise, posit.

Ana. *Conjecture, surmise: *grant, concede, allow: *assert, affirm, aver, predicate.

assumption. Presupposition, postulate, position, presumption, premise. See under PRESUPPOSE.

Ana. *Hypothesis, theory: *principle, fundamental, axiom, theorem: conjecture, surmise (see under CONJECTURE, v.).

assurance. 1 *Insurance.

2 Certitude, *certainty, conviction.

Ana. *Belief, faith, credence, credit: *trust, confidence, reliance, dependence: positiveness, sureness, cocksureness (see corresponding adjectives at SURE).

Ant. Mistrust: dubiousness. — Con. Doubt, *uncertainty, skepticism, suspicion: disbelief, *unbelief, incredulity.

3 Self-assurance, *confidence, self-confidence, self-possession, aplomb.

Ana. Sang-froid, composure, *equanimity: sureness, sanguineness (see corresponding adjectives at CONFIDENT): mettle, resolution, spirit, *courage, tenacity: effrontery, *temerity, nerve.

Ant. Diffidence: alarm. — Con. Timorousness, timidity (see corresponding adjectives at TIMID): shyness, bashfulness, modesty (see corresponding adjectives at SHY).

assure. Insure, *ensure, secure.

Ant. Alarm. — Con. *Frighten, scare, fright, terrify: abash, discomfit, *embarrass: *intimidate, cow.

assured. *Confident, sanguine, sure.

Ana. Fearless, unapprehensive, unafraid (see affirmative adjectives at FEARFUL): *cool, composed, unruffled, imperturbable, collected: *reliant, self-reliant.

Ant. Abashed: timorous. — Con. Discomfited, embarrassed, rattled, disconcerted (see EMBARRASS): *fearful, apprehensive, afraid: hesitant, reluctant (see DISINCLINED).

astern. *Aft, aft.

Ana. After, hind, rear, back (see POSTERIOR).

Ant. Ahead. — Con. *Before, afore, forward.

astonish. *Surprise, astound, amaze, flabbergast.

Ana. Nonplus, dumfound, bewilder, confound (see PUZZLE): impress, strike, touch, *affect.

astound. *Surprise, astonish, amaze, flabbergast.

Ana. Dumfound, confound, nonplus, bewilder (see PUZZLE): startle, affright, alarm, terrify (see FRIGHTEN).

astral. *Starry, stellar, sidereal.

astray. *Amiss.

astringent, adj. Astringent, constringent, styptic come into comparison when they mean having the quality of contracting or shrinking organic tissue or matter. Astringent, the most inclusive term, is applicable to any of several agents used in the treatment of mucous membranes and other surfaces to dry up secretions, arrest discharges, contract the ends of blood vessels, or, in cosmetics, to tighten the pores; as, tannin is an astringent substance used in medicine; an astringent lotion. Constringent occurs infrequently in comparison with astringent; it usually suggests a stiffening effect rather than a drying up; thus, timothy is said to have a constringent property which keeps horses from becoming flabby; the constringent effect of severe cold. Styptic was once frequently, but is now seldom, used as an equivalent of astringent; it is now commonly restricted in its application to an astringent agent used in arresting bleeding; as, to apply a styptic colloid to a cut; a styptic pencil (a stick of some styptic substance used in treating small cuts, such as those made in shaving).

astute. *Shrewd, perspicacious, sagacious.

Ana. *Sharp, keen, acute: discreet, prudent, foresighted (see under PRUDENCE): knowing, *intelligent, clever, smart: wily, crafty, cunning, *sly.

Ant. Gullible. — Con. Ingenuous, naïve, simple, unsophisticated (see NATURAL): candid, open, plain, *frank: forthright, *straightforward, aboveboard.

asylum. *Shelter, refuge, retreat, sanctuary, ark, cover.
at. 1 At, in, on cause difficulty when used in phrases giving the place or locality of an action. When reference to the interior of any place is made prominent, in is used; when a place is regarded as a mere local point, at is more commonly employed; when the direction is indicated, on is sometimes used in place of at; as, to look for a book in the library; to meet a friend at the library; sit on my right; the town lies on the east coast. "He appointed regular meetings of the States of England twice a year in London" (Hume); "An English king was crowned at Paris" (Macaulay). In is commonly employed before the names of countries or districts and at before names of institutions, public offices, business houses, etc.; as, in America; in the South; Milton was educated at Christ's College; at the customhouse; at the jeweler's. With names of towns and cities the use of in or at is usually determined according as the place designated is regarded respectively (1) as an including area or scene, especially with an implication of destination or permanence of occupancy, or of having familiar associations for the speaker, or (2) merely as a point, as along a journey or course, on a map or plan, or at a remove from the speaker; as, on our way to visit in Troy we lunched at Albany; after a stopover at Chicago, we arrived in Sioux Falls on Friday; a man born here in Zenith is consul at Hong Kong. In giving a town address we say at 141 Wood Street, in Springfield. In giving the street without the number, in is preferred in Great Britain, on in the United States; as, he lives in (or on) Riverside Avenue.
 2 At, in, on are clearly distinguishable when used to introduce a phrase giving the time of an action. When reference is to time by the clock, or to a point of time registered by a clock, at is commonly used; as, at two o'clock; promptly at the hour appointed; at three minutes to six. When the reference is not to a point but to a period in the course of which an action occurs, in is the correct preposition; as, at two o'clock in the afternoon; September 1st in the year 1939; in the month of May. When the reference is to a particular day in the course of which something occurs, on is used; as, on July fourth there will be a celebration; it happened on a Sunday. On is sometimes used also with reference to a point of time with which there is, or should be, coincidence; as, be here on the hour; he is always on the dot.

atavism. *Reversion, throwback.

atavistic. Reversionary, reversive. See under REVERSION.

atheist. Atheist, agnostic, deist, freethinker, unbeliever, infidel designate a person who rejects some or all of the essential doctrines of religion, such as the existence of God. An atheist is one who denies the existence of God; an agnostic (see also under SKEPTIC) is one who withholds belief (though he does not deny the possible existence of a supreme being) because he does not know and is unwilling to accept as proof the evidence of revelation and spiritual experience; a deist, in the historical sense, is one who rejects the conception of a supreme being as ruler and guide of men and the universe, but still believes in a god who is the creator and the final judge of men. Since deism was tantamount to a denial of revelation and supernaturalism, deist has often been used as though it were the equivalent of atheist. The other terms are words whose application depends on the point of view of the person using them; usually, they imply reproach. Freethinker suggests loss of faith and the rejection of any or all of the tenets of revealed religion in favor of what seems rational or credible. Unbeliever is more negative than freethinker, because it carries no implication of a substitute for faith. Infidel, once a highly contemptuous term, is now rarely used with such value except in historical narratives. Rather, it tends to become a designation applied by Christians to an adherent of any of the great world religions (especially Mohammedanism) that do not accept the Christian (and usually, the Jewish) conception of God, and thereby to be distinguishable from heathen and pagan. In Roman Catholic canon law, it is a very inclusive term designating any unbaptized person and covering such extremes as a heathen and an unbaptized Protestant. From the Mohammedan point of view, especially as presented in English fiction and poetry, infidel often means a Christian.

Ant. Theist.

athirst. Avid, *eager, keen, anxious, a-tiptoe, agog.

Ana. Thirsting, hungering, pining, yearning, longing (see LONG, v.): craving, coveting or covetous, desiring or desirous (see corresponding verbs at DESIRE).

Con. *Indifferent, unconcerned, incurious, aloof: *languid, lackadaisical, listless: apathetic, *impassive.

athlete. Athlete, gymnast agree in denoting a person skilled in the performance of physical exercises requiring agility, powers of endurance, and, often, muscular strength. Athlete also implies the status of a contender in games or in sports involving a contest, whether outdoor or indoor; thus, college athletes are the students who participate in college football, baseball, basketball, and other games, or who belong to the track team. A gymnast is one who is skilled, whether as participator or as teacher, in gymnastics; that is, bodily exercises, which may or may not involve competition, performed in a gymnasium, often with the aid of apparatus, for the development of nimbleness, strength, and control in the use of the body. "Leaping back a yard . . . with the speed and security of a trained gymnast" (Stevenson).

athletic. *Muscular, husky, sinewy, brawny, burly.

Ana. *Strong, stalwart, sturdy: lusty, *vigorous, strenuous, energetic.

Con. Frail, fragile, *weak.

athletics. Athletics, sports, games agree in denoting physical activities engaged in as for exercise or play. Athletics is a collective term (not used in the singular) for exercises for the performance of which one acquires and maintains agility, skill, stamina, etc., by regular and systematic training and practice, usually with the aim of competing, singly or as a member of a team, with others similarly trained, whether for pleasure, to keep the body in trim, to win honor for oneself, one's team, college, club, etc., or to earn a livelihood; as, college football, basketball, hockey, baseball, rowing, and tennis, and professional baseball, hockey, football, and tennis, are forms of athletics. Sports are forms of physical activity, usually outdoor, that afford pleasure or diversion. The term may be used in the singular for any of the various forms of athletics, inasmuch as, whatever the main purpose of athletic activity may be, a certain amount of pleasure is usually derived; as, football, basketball, hockey, baseball, rowing, and tennis are perhaps the most popular sports with those who go out for athletics in college; major-league baseball is a professional sport. The idea of training to develop agility, skill, stamina, etc., prominent in athletics, is frequently wanting in sports, which may involve so little exertion (as fishing) or be engaged in for so short a period or so infrequently as not to require it; thus, an impromptu baseball game between two pick-up teams falls under the head of sport, but hardly of athletics. So also the idea of competition, usually present in athletics, is frequently wanting in sports; as, noncompetitive skating, skiing, canoeing, and swimming are sports. The term is wider than athletics, including such activities as hunting and fishing (in which the pleasure derives from pursuit of quarry). Since sports contests are often an object of interest to others, the term sports is also applied to contests which provide amusement or diversion for spectators as well as, or rather than, contestants; hence, horse racing, dog racing, bull fighting, cock fighting, and bear baiting are sports. "We . . . have every source of amusement open to us, and yet follow these cruel sports" (W. Windham). Games (as here compared: for singular see FUN) are athletic or sports contests, usually those which are of a somewhat artificial nature and therefore require more extensive rules than such contests as rowing, boxing, wrestling, and skiing. Thus, practically all forms of competition that center around a ball or similar object are called games, as baseball, football, hockey, golf, tennis, and polo. Although the plural games is sometimes applied collectively in titles to a competition (now usually called meet) consisting chiefly or only of track-and-field events (as, Olympic games, Nemean games), the singular game is applied to none or few of the individual events of such a competition.

athwart. Crosswise, crossways, *across.

a-tiptoe. *Eager, avid, keen, agog, athirst, anxious.

Ana. Alert, *watchful, vigilant: ready, *quick, prompt: tense, taut (see TIGHT).

Con. Nonchalant, *cool, composed: *calm, tranquil, serene.

atmosphere. 1 *Air, ether, ozone.

2 Atmosphere, feeling, feel, savor (or savour), tone, aura come into comparison when they denote an intangible and, usually, unanalyzable quality or aggregate of qualities which gives something an individual and distinctly recognizable character. Atmosphere is used chiefly in reference to places, to groups of persons, or to periods of time that have a definite identity. It frequently denotes a character that accrues to something or that pervades it as a whole and determines the impression it produces on those who come within the range of its influence; thus, a place that has no atmosphere is by implication a place that leaves no clear impression of its difference from other places of the same type or kind; a poet who re-creates the atmosphere of the Middle Ages is one who by implication gives a true and vivid impression of the life of that time. But atmosphere may also denote an environment (regarded as a sum total of physical, social, intellectual, and spiritual conditions) that not only produces a distinct impression but exerts a definite influence on the state of mind, habits of work, views, and the like, of those who are encompassed by it. "Genius can only breathe freely in an atmosphere of freedom" (J. S. Mill). "Any judge who has sat with juries knows that . . . they are extremely likely to be impregnated by the environing atmosphere" (Justice Holmes). Feeling, as here compared (see also FEELING, SENSATION), may refer either to the character one ascribes to something when one has a clear and unified impression of its distinctive qualities or atmosphere, or to the aesthetic effect of a work of art which not only represents a thing but re-creates its atmosphere or conveys the impression the artist seeks to produce. "Most of those who have educated themselves in the technique of painting are city-bred, and can never have the feeling of the country, however fond they may be of it" (Jeffries). "They bring the notion of the thing described to the mind, they do not bring the feeling of it to the imagination" (Arnold). Feel, although it occurs in the works of good writers, is commonly regarded as colloquial or informal. It may be used interchangeably with feeling (as, to describe or paint a scene so that one gives another the feel of it), but it may also be substituted for atmosphere, especially when the quality of a thing is known through frequent experience or intimate knowledge.

"The factory had a homely feel" (D. H. Lawrence). "The sensitive reader may discover in them, also, something of the quality and 'feel' of Shakespeare's own poetry" (Day Lewis). Savor differs from feel not only in being a more literary or a less homely word, but in connoting an epicurean enjoyment of that which has an atmosphere or of the sensations it evokes. "A healthy craving for the sap and savour of a more personal, national art" (Binyon). "Carrying on his life at Hilbury as if nothing had happened to change all the savour of it" (Arch. Marshall). "The exactness which Miss Lowell loved is nowhere more remarkable than in her sense of the savour and 'feel' of words" (Lowe). "It is in moments like this of waiting and hushed suspense that one tastes most fully the savour of life" (L. P. Smith). Tone is a character associated with the thing itself as its inner spirit, its tenor, its prevailing quality, rather than with the impression it produces or the influence it exerts; thus, one may praise a community for its high moral tone yet find its atmosphere somewhat depressing. Nevertheless, a tone is thought of as a character that may be imparted or acquired and, therefore, as one capable of exerting an influence. "She was rather afraid of the self-possession of the Morels, father and all. [but] She took their tone . . . It was a cool, clear atmosphere, where everyone was himself" (D. H. Lawrence). "A furious attack [on Poe] by Rufus W. Griswold . . . set the tone of native criticism for years" (Mencken). Aura (etymologically, a breeze) is a highly poetic word used chiefly in reference to persons who seem to be enveloped by an ethereal spirit which is an emanation of their inner life or of their secret thoughts; by extension, it is also used of things that are invested with a mysterious quality or character; as, in their company, he was always conscious of an aura of disapproval. "There was about her the aura, the glow, the roseate exhalation that surrounds the woman in love" (E. Ferber). "Throughout the Middle Ages the Taunus and the Harz had about them an aura of the uncanny as the last haunt of the primeval gods" (Buchan).

Ana. *Quality, character, property: peculiarity, individuality, characteristic (see corresponding adjectives at CHARACTERISTIC): *impression, impress.

atom. 1 *Particle, molecule, corpuscle.

2 *Particle, bit, mite, smitch, smidgen, jot, tittle, iota, whit.

Ana. Smack, spice, dash, suspicion, soupçon, *touch, suggestion, tincture, tinge, shade.

at once. *Directly, immediately, instantly, forthwith, straightway, right away, anon, instantaneously.

atone, atone for. *Expiate.

Ana. Compensate (for), *pay (for): propitiate, conciliate, appease (see PACIFY).

atonement. Expiation (see under EXPIATE).

Ana. Compensating or compensation, offsetting (see corresponding verbs at COMPENSATE): conciliation, propitiation, appeasement (see corresponding verbs at PACIFY): *reparation, amends.

atrabillious, atrabiliar. Hypochondriac, *melancholic, melancholy.

Ant. Detach. — Con. Disengage (see DETACH): disencumber, disentangle, disembarass (see EXTRICATE): sever, sunder, divorce, part, *separate.

attachment, n. 1 Arrest, apprehension, detention. See under ARREST, v.

2 Attachment, affection, love denote the feeling which animates a person who is genuinely fond of someone or something. Attachment and affection differ in that affection usually has for its object a sentient being, whereas that of attachment may be even an inanimate thing; as, an attachment to one's profession, to a house in which one has lived. Attachment implies strong liking, devotion, or loyalty; affection, rather warmth and tenderness of sentiment. "A profound attachment to the King as king" (Belloc). "It cannot show lack of attachment to the principles of the Constitution that she thinks it can be improved" (Justice Holmes). "Between him [Horace] and Augustus there was a strong affection" (Buchan). Affection and love differ in that affection implies a feeling more settled and regulated, less intense or ardent, than love, which alone of the three may connote passion. Thus to one's friends any one of the three terms may be applicable; to the members of one's own family, love or affection, but usually not attachment; to God, love (in the sense of reverent devotion), but not affection or attachment; to one's country, love, especially if ardent patriotism is implied, affection, if the emphasis is upon genuine but not blind devotion, attachment, if allegiance and loyalty are definitely connoted.

Ana. Fondness, devotedness (see corresponding adjectives at LOVING): devotion, piety, fealty, *fidelity, allegiance.

Ant. Aversion. — Con. *Antipathy: estrangement, alienation, disaffection (see corresponding verbs at ESTRANGE).

attack, v. Attack, assail, assault, bombard, storm come into comparison not only in their military but also in their extended senses. All carry as their basic meaning to make a more or less violent onset upon. Attack, which is etymologically related to attach, originally connoted a fastening upon something, as a beast of prey fastens upon its victim. It now implies aggression or aggressiveness in all its senses and usually the initiative in entering into an engagement or struggle, as with a person or thing that is opposed or that one intends to conquer; as, to plan to attack the enemy at dawn; to attack the position of one's opponents in a debate; to attack a problem in engineering. "They lack the courage to attack their other studies with the vigor requisite to success" (Grandgent). "It had become increasingly apparent that the logical method of eradicating disease was to attack it at its source" (V. Heiser). Assail etymologically connotes a jumping upon, but in modern use it suggests the action of one who would conquer by force of repeated blows rather than by brute strength. Its chief distinction from attack is in this suggestion of repetition of blows, strokes, shots, thrusts, or other means of breaking down resistance; as, to assail an enemy with shells; to assail with reproaches; assailed by temptations. "Property interests . . . assailed by attempts to put industry upon a more reasonable and more equitable footing" (J. A. Hobson). "Old pains keep on gnawing at your heart, old desires

. . . old dreams, assailing you" (Conrad). Assault, which also etymologically connotes a jumping upon, now always implies close contact or a direct confrontation; in contrast with assail, it suggests the use of brute strength and an attempt to overpower by suddenness and violence of onslaught; as, to assault a person with a club; to assault a stronghold on all sides. "My ending is despair. Unless I be relieved by prayer. Which pierces so that it assaults Mercy itself" (Shak.). "A universal hubbub wild Of stunning sounds . . . assaults his ear" (Milton). Bombard literally means to assail (as a town, a fortress, an army) continuously and devastatingly with bombs or shells; as, the advancing German army in 1914 expected to bombard Paris and bring a quick end to the war. In extended use, it is, in its stronger implication of importunity or of continuous pestering, distinguishable from assail; as, "He [Octavius] bombarded Cicero with letters asking for advice" (Buchan); the reporters bombarded the district attorney with questions. Storm, as here considered, means to assault with the violence, rush, and effectiveness of a sudden and devastating storm or wind; in literal and extended use it connotes an attempt to sweep from its path every obstacle to a victory. "Several of their bravest officers were shot down in the act of storming the fortress" (Irving). "Who think to storm the world by dint of merit" (Burns).

Ana. Fight, *contend, battle, war, cope: beset, overrun (see INFEST): *surprise, waylay, ambush.

Con. *Defend, shield, guard, protect: resist, withstand, *oppose, combat.

attack, n. 1 Attack, assault, onslaught, onset come into comparison when they denote an attempt made on another or on others to injure, destroy, defame, or the like. An attack (for military and allied senses see ATTACK, v.) may be upon the person or it may be upon the character, the reputation, the writings, or the like, of a person or persons; it often suggests animosity or definite enmity as its cause, but it may imply motives as various as wanton cruelty, partisan feeling, or a critical intention; as, the victim of a cowardly attack by ruffians; the speech was a severe attack upon the policies of the administration; the book was the object of attacks from all sides; an unprovoked attack upon the fairness of the court. Assault, in general use, implies more violence, more malice or viciousness, and often the infliction of greater damage or less reparable damage than attack. However, an assault upon the person is legally an apparently violent attempt, or a willful offer with force or violence, to injure or hurt that person physically. When the hurt has been inflicted the precise legal term for the act is assault and battery. Rape is sometimes specifically called an assault, but this usage of assault is chiefly euphemistic. In military language an assault is sometimes distinguished from an attack upon the enemy, the former term being applied only to the last phase of an attack, or offensive movement, when the aggressors close upon their opponents and the issue is determined. In general use, however, assault and attack are not clearly distinguishable except in emphasis; thus, an assault upon a person's character suggests violent emotion, such as hatred or vindictiveness; an attack upon a person's character may or may not imply strong feeling as its motive. "The two men [Matthew Arnold and F. H. Bradley] fought . . . in spite of Bradley's assault upon Arnold, for the same causes" (T. S. Eliot). "The passage . . . shows how alarmed a Hegelian may be by an assault upon the authority of science" (Inge). Onslaught suggests a vigorous and destructive method of attack; it usually implies an attempt to overwhelm as by force of momentum or of numbers or by the fury of the assault; as, the defenders, taken by surprise, were unable to repel the onslaught; no play can withstand such an onslaught from the critics. "He sees I am no man to take rebuff . . . Quick to the onslaught, out sword, cut and thrust!" (Browning). Onset is applicable not only to the first furious rush that initiates an attack (an offensive movement, an act of aggression, a fit of illness, or the like), but to any such succeeding rush that marks a renewal of vigor in the attack; as, at the onset, the twelfth regiment bore the brunt of the attack; a pause in the fighting gave the officers time to rally their scattered troops and to prepare for a fresh onset from the enemy. "At every onset of the gale convulsive sounds came from the branches" (Hardy).

Ana. Push, action, *battle: striking, hitting, smiting, slugging (see STRIKE): *criticism, condemnation, denouncing or denunciation (see corresponding verbs at CRITICIZE).

Con. Defending or defense, vindication, justification (see corresponding verbs at MAINTAIN): resistance, opposition (see corresponding verbs at OPPOSE).

2 Attack, aggression, offense (or offence), offensive and their corresponding adjectives attacking, aggressive, offensive come into comparison when they denote or describe action in a struggle for supremacy which must be met with defense or by means of defenses. The terms are used not only of military operations but of competitive games, exhibitions of skill, as in fencing and sword-play, and the like. Attack always implies the initiation of action; commonly, also, it suggests an attempt to catch the enemy or opposition off guard and therefore connotes suddenness, and often violence, of onset. "The first raiding attack was . . . repulsed with heavy losses" (H. G. Wells). Aggression, which also commonly implies initiation of hostile action, stresses rather a lack of provocation and a desire for conquest or domination. Attack is applicable to any movement or action in a series of operations, aggression is applied chiefly to a war or to a type of fighting that involves invasion or encroachment on another's territory; it usually further connotes a determination to maintain the advantage of the attacking side; as, pledged never to fight in a war of aggression. "The business of government is to check aggression only" (Adam Smith). "An aggressive war, as distinguished from mere plundering inroads" (Freeman). Offense and (in the sense here considered) the more common offensive characterize the position or the methods of the attacking side. The noun is interchangeable with attack only when the latter word does not refer to a concrete action; as, methods of attack (or offense) and of defense; weapons of offense, or offensive weapons; a war of offense (not attack); to be ready for an attack (not an offense). Both words are distinguishable from aggression and aggressive, which in many ways they closely resemble, by their absence of suggestion of any motive or aim other than that of a desire for supremacy; thus, an aggressively fought battle is one in which each side struggles to maintain the upper hand. Offensive, as a noun, is commonly a substantive use of the adjective; thus, to take the offensive is to carry on offensive operations; to maintain the offensive is to succeed in holding an offensive position. Sometimes, however, it closely approaches attack in meaning; as, the offensive began at 10 a.m.

3 *Fit, access, accession, paroxysm, spasm, convulsion.

Ant. Intensify. — Con. Heighten, aggravate, enhance (see INTENSIFY): augment, *increase.

attempt, v. Attempt, try, endeavor (or endeavour), essay, assay, strive, struggle are here compared as verbs meaning to make an effort to do something that may or may not be successful and as nouns (the single exception in form being striving) meaning the effort made to accomplish such an end. Attempt, in precise use, always implies an actual beginning of, or venturing upon, that which one hopes to accomplish or carry through; it often, but not invariably, suggests failure; as, to form a plan and yet make no attempt to execute it; the troops were driven back when they attempted to break through the enemy's line; after many attempts to construct a flying machine, the Wright brothers succeeded; nothing attempted, nothing gained. In several idiomatic expressions attempt also implies the end in view; thus, to attempt the king's life is to make an effort to assassinate him; to make an attempt on a fortress is to attack it; to attempt a person (now archaic) is to make an effort to tempt, seduce, move, or bribe that person. "It made the laughter of an afternoon That Vivien should attempt the blameless king" (Tennyson). Try is often thought of as a simpler and more colloquial word than attempt; in discriminating use, however, the two terms are distinguishable by subtle differences in meaning. Try, in such use, seldom loses the implication found in nearly all of its leading senses: that of effort or experiment directed toward the end of ascertaining a fact or of testing or proving a thing. This implication is especially apparent in some idiomatic phrases such as: to try a window (that is, to attempt to open it so as to find out if it is fastened); to try one's hand at something (that is, to attempt to do something new to test one's ability or aptitude); to try one's luck with the horses (that is, to bet on horse races in the hope of proving one's luck). In freer use, try often carries the same implication but not quite so obviously; nevertheless, it is the preferable word when effort or experiment or testing are stressed rather than a venturing upon or undertaking; as, to try to find which of two methods is the better; to make a try at solving the problem; to succeed at the first try. "Freedom in thought, the liberty to try and err, the right to be his own man" (Mencken). Endeavor heightens the implication of exertion and should be avoided as too strong when likelihood of success is implied; as, I shall try (better than endeavor) to make time for a game of tennis tomorrow; "she walked up and down the room endeavouring to compose herself" (Austen); "the Good, which is the goal of all moral endeavour" (Inge); "In Arnold's phrases the first step for every aspirant to culture is to endeavor to see things as they are, or 'to learn, in short, the will of God'" (C. W. Eliot). "We all endeavour, as Spinoza says, to persist in our own being; and that endeavour is, he adds, the very essence of our existence" (L. P. Smith). Essay and the now less common assay both imply that the thing to be accomplished is especially difficult; otherwise they combine the foremost implications of attempt (that is, making a beginning) by suggesting a tentative effort, and of try (that is, experiment) by suggesting the testing of a thing's feasibility. "Sculpture which attempted to unite repose and action, the 'far off' and the familiar, in a way which Phidias and Donatello were too prudent to essay" (Brownell). "Till I have brought him to his wits again, Or lose my labour in assaying it" (Shak.). "[Literary] conventions frequently take their rise . . . from the faulty essays of an early and as yet undeveloped technique" (Loues). The last terms of this group, strive and struggle, not only carry heightened implications of difficulty and of correspondingly greater exertion, but also connote greater opposition to be overcome. Strive and striving suggest persistent endeavor to surmount obstacles created by one's weaknesses, one's lack of experience, the height of one's ambitions, the power of resisting forces, or the like; as, to strive to overcome a bad habit; a striving to reach the top of one's class; "Strive, my son, when you represent the People, to provide for their education" (Mereditih); "sick of self and tired of vainly striving" (W. James); "the bitter, desperate striving unto death of the oppressed race" (R. Macaulay). Struggle literally and figuratively implies straining or stretching that suggests a tussle, a wrestling, or an effort to extricate oneself from that which impedes or fetters one; as, to struggle to free oneself from attackers; a struggle to reach the shore. So strong at times is this implication that the word loses or nearly loses its implication of endeavor; as, "He clambered over half-visible rocks, fell over prostrate trees, sank into deep holes and struggled out" (Cather); "The struggle between two strong-willed women to control one weak-willed man is the usual motive of the French drama in the nineteenth century" (H. Adams).

Ana. *Begin, commence, start, initiate, inaugurate.

Ant. Succeed. — Con. Accomplish, achieve, effect, fulfill, execute, *perform: attain, compass, *reach, gain attempt, n. Endeavor, essay, assay, try, striving, struggle. See under ATTEMPT, v.

Ana. Experiment (see EXPERIENCE): trial, test (see under PROVE): beginning, commencement, starting or start, initiation (see corresponding verbs at BEGIN).

attend, 1 Listen, list, hearken, hark, *hear.

Con. Ignore, disregard, *neglect, slight.

2 *Tend, mind, watch.

Ana. *Nurse, foster, nurture, cherish: supervise, oversee (see corresponding nouns at OVERSIGHT).

3 Escort, *accompany, chaperon, convoy.

attention, 1 Attention, study, concentration, application come into comparison when they mean the direct focusing of the mind on something, especially on something to be learned, worked out, accomplished, or the like. Attention is applicable to the faculty or power as well as to the act; as, to fix one's attention on something; noises that distract one's attention; this requires attention; "if we had to think about breathing or digesting . . . we should have no attention to spare for anything else" (Shaw); "every awareness is the simple form of attention" (S. Alexander). Since the word does not carry any implications descriptive of the quality or nature of the power or the act or of the length of the latter's duration, it usually requires qualifying words or phrases; as, close attention; trained habits of attention; a few moments' attention. Study, on the other hand, stresses continuity and closeness of attention; it usually also implies an aim such as the acquisition of knowledge, or the analysis of something that is complex or confusing, or the working out of a plan, as for action, or of a design, as for a book; as, the president said that he would not comment upon the proposal until he had given it further study. "Of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh" (Ecclesiastes xii. 12). Concentration emphasizes the centering of the attention on one thing to the exclusion of everything else; as, amazing powers of concentration. "The learning to read poetry takes as much patience and concentration as the learning to write it" (Day Lewis). Application usually suggests persistence in fixing one's attention, and diligence and assiduity in the performance of all that is required; it suggests therefore a virtue won by effort and sheer force of will rather than, as concentration, a power that has its origin in one's temperament or is the result of profound interest as much, if not more, than of directed effort or training. "Application for ever so short a time kills me" (Lamb). "Louise won the disfavor of . . . Mary and Harriet by her application to her studies in school" (S. Anderson).

Ana. Diligence, assiduity, sedulousness, industriousness (see corresponding adjectives at BUSY).

Ant. Inattention. — Con. Preoccupation, abstraction, absent-mindedness (see corresponding adjectives at ABSTRACTED).

2 *Courtesy, gallantry, amenity, comity.

Ana. Courting or court, wooing (see corresponding verbs at INVITE): deference, homage, *honor, reverence: solicitude (see CARE).

Con. Neglect, *negligence: indifference, aloofness, unconcernedness or unconcern (see corresponding adjectives at INDIFFERENT): rudeness, discourteousness or discourtesy, impoliteness (see corresponding adjectives at RUDE).

attentive, *Thoughtful, considerate.

Ana. Courteous, polite, gallant, chivalrous, *civil: solicitous, concerned (see under CARE, n.).

Ant. Inattentive: neglectful. — Con. *Indifferent, unconcerned, aloof: *negligent, remiss: heedless, thoughtless, *careless.

attenuate, v. *Thin, rarefy, dilute, extenuate.

Ana. *Weaken, sap: reduce, lessen (see DECREASE): dissipate (see SCATTER): *contract, shrink, constrict, deflate.

Ant. Enlarge: dilate: enrich — Con. *Expand, amplify, swell, distend, inflate: *increase, augment.

attest, 1 Witness, *certify, vouch for.

Ana. Testify, depose, depone, affirm, *swear, asseverate: *confirm, corroborate, substantiate, verify.

Con. *Disprove, controvert, refute, confute: *deny, contradict, gainsay.

2 Argue, prove, bespeak, *indicate, betoken.

Ana. Demonstrate, test (see PROVE): *confirm, authenticate, substantiate.

Ant. Belie. — Con. *Misrepresent.

attire, v. *Clothe, apparel, array, tire, dress, robe, invest, vest.

Ana. Accouter, appoint, equip, outfit, arm (see FURNISH).

Ant. Divest. — Con. *Strip, bare, denude, dismantle.

attire, n. *Clothes, clothing, tire, apparel, raiment, dress, vesture, array.

attitude, 1 *Posture, pose.

Ana. Mien, *bearing, carriage, manner, port, presence, demeanor.

2 *Position, stand.

Ana. *Point of view, angle, slant, standpoint, viewpoint: bias, prepossession, prejudice, *predilection.

Ana. *Substitute, supply, alternate.

2 *Lawyer, solicitor, proctor, procurator, counselor, barrister, counsel, advocate.

attract, v. Attract, allure, charm, fascinate, bewitch, enchant, captivate, take agree in meaning to draw another by exerting an irresistible or compelling influence over him. The same distinctions in implications and connotations are observable in the adjectival forms of these words, attractive, alluring, charming, fascinating, bewitching, enchanted, captivating, taking. Attract always implies a drawing of one thing to another either because of material or immaterial qualities or properties in the agent (such as magnetism) or because of an affinity in the one attracted for that which draws it or a susceptibility to its influence; as, a magnet attracts iron; positive electricity attracts negative; a store of honey attracts a bear; a stimulating new book attracts attention. "Milton, in whom there was so much to repel Goethe rather than to attract him" (Arnold). When used in reference to persons of different sexes, it commonly also suggests the arousing of strong admiration or the awakening of love or desire in the person attracted. "Talking, in that beautiful voice which made everything she said sound like a caress, to Papa, who had begun to be attracted rather against his will" (V. Woolf). Allure implies not only attraction but enticement by that which is fair, pleasing, seductive, or the like. It may, like lure, suggest enticement into evil or danger, but in modern use this is not as often connoted as in the past, though the implication of a siren's attraction is always conveyed. "Ancient fables of men allured by beautiful forms and melodious voices to destruction" (Hudson). More often the stress is on the overcoming of resistance or indifference by the use of winning methods, such as delicate flattery or the enhancement of one's charms, or by the bait of a pleasant prospect; as, an alluring advertisement of a summer resort; she did not naturally attract men, but she became accomplished in alluring them; the prospect of an interesting, vivid life allures many young women to the big cities. "Young children should rather be allured to learning by gentleness and love, than compelled to learning by beating and fear" (Ascham). Charm implies a power in the agent to cast a spell (literal or figurative) over the person or thing affected, thereby holding the latter under the agent's power or compelling him (or it) to do the agent's will. "Only his daughter had the power of charming this black brooding from his mind" (Dickens). In its commonest use, charm implies a power to evoke or attract admiration, but it usually heightens that implication by retaining the suggestion of casting a spell over the senses or, far more often, over the mind. "There was a grace about him which charmed, and a hint of latent power which impressed" (Buchan). "Cyril, having taken a fancy to his brilliant aunt [Sophia], had tried to charm her as he seldom or never tried to charm his mother. Cyril and Sophia had dazzled and conquered each other" (Bennett). Fascinate, like charm, implies the casting of a spell, but in precise or discriminating use, it usually suggests the ineffectiveness of resistance, or a person's enslavement or being at the mercy of one that fascinates. "Blandishments will not fascinate us, nor will threats of a 'halter' intimidate. For, under God, we are determined that . . . we will die free men" (Jos. Quincy). "Personality . . . so fascinating that . . . it would absorb my whole nature, my whole soul, my very art itself" (Wilde). Bewitch and enchant likewise imply the exertion of a magical influence; the former, in its literal sense, suggesting witchcraft, and the latter, sorcery (see MAGIC), but these implications are often either exceedingly weak or actually lost. Bewitch, in its commonest sense, implies the exertion of a power of fascination that causes another to succumb to one's charms or allurements and to be under one's thrall. Enchant, on the other hand, usually suggests a power to evoke joy or rapture or ecstatic admiration in the person fascinated; as, he is enchanted by the young lady's beauty; he is bewitched by her charms. "Heavens grant that Warwick's words bewitch him not!" (Shak.). "Sophia enjoyed the intimacy with Constance. As for Constance, she was enchanted" (Bennett). "There was in Mary [Queen of Scots] 'some enchantment whereby men are bewitched'" (J. R. Green). Captivate is the weakest of these words in its suggestion of an irresistible influence or attraction. It implies a capturing of the fancy or feelings, and a holding them in thrall for the time being, but it carries no suggestion of prolonged influence or of enslavement; as, the child captivates everyone with his sunny smile; "just the hero to captivate a romantic girl" (Irving). Take, which in early use was often employed in the sense of to charm by casting a spell over (as, "Then [Christmas Eve] no planets strike, No fairy lakes, nor witch hath power to charm"—Shak.), now frequently occurs in the extended senses of attract, fascinate, and captivate; in fact, the word is sometimes preferred when the literal implications of these terms might obscure the meaning; as, he hadn't been particularly taken with the girl; "He stared at her from doorways . . . as she went about with her partners; and the more he stared, the more taken was he" (Kipling); he has a very taking smile. Ana. *Invite, solicit, court: entice, *lure, tempt, seduce: *catch, capture.

Ant. Repel. — Con. *Offend, affront, outrage, insult. attraction. Attraction, affinity, sympathy are comparable in their abstract senses when they denote the relationship between persons or things that are involuntarily or naturally drawn together and exert, to some degree, an influence over each other. Attraction implies the possession by one person or thing of a quality or qualities that have the power to pull another person or thing so that the latter moves toward the former or, in the case of things, is drawn into contact with it or cleaves to it. Attraction, however, also implies the existence in the thing attracted of susceptibility to the influence of that which attracts; in the case of persons it may be a natural inclination for, or a predisposition to, or an innate liking of, that which attracts; in the case of things, a tendency to unite or combine with it. This natural or constitutional susceptibility is called affinity. In very precise use, therefore, affinity is the complement of attraction and not its synonym; thus, attraction is the force whereby a magnet draws iron to it, but iron is one of the few metals that have an affinity for the magnet; chemistry has a powerful attraction for minds that have an affinity for it. "He [Marcus Aurelius] too yearns as they do for something unattained by him. What an affinity for Christianity had this persecutor of the Christians!" (Arnold). The words are interchangeable only when used of persons and things that are mutually attracted or have a reciprocal affinity for each other: even in these cases, however, the fundamental distinction in meaning prevails; as, two persons who have an attraction (or an affinity) for each other; atoms remain in combination in a substance because of their affinity (or attraction) for each other; it is not by chance that in physics, the science concerned with energy, attraction is the word used in reference to atomic cohesion, and that in chemistry, the science concerned with the composition of substances, affinity is the technical term. Sympathy, as here considered, stresses not so much the drawing together of persons or things (though that is usually inferable) as their reciprocal influence or their susceptibility to the same influences. When used in reference to things, it commonly implies interaction; as, the tides rise and fall in sympathy with the moon; there is close sympathy between the heart and the lungs. When used in reference to persons, sympathy usually connotes spiritual affinity, or compatibility in tastes, interests, aims, etc. "Union of hearts, not hands, does marriage make, And sympathy of mind keeps love awake" (Aaron Hill).

attractive. Alluring, charming, fascinating, bewitching, enchanting, captivating, taking. See under ATTRACT.

Ana. Lovely, fair, *beautiful, bonny, pretty, comely: luring, enticing, tempting, seductive (see corresponding verbs at LURE).

Ant. Repellent: forbidding. — Con. *Repugnant, abhorrent, distasteful, obnoxious: *offensive, repulsive, revolting, loathsome.

attribute, v. *Ascribe, impute, assign, credit, accredit, refer, charge.

Ana. *Fasten, attach, fix: predicate (see ASSERT): blame (see CRITICIZE): *accuse, charge.

attribute, n. 1 *Quality, property, character, accident. 2 Emblem, *symbol, type.

Ana. *Sign, mark, token, badge, note: *character, symbol, sign.

attrition. 1 Contrition, repentance, *penitence, remorse, compunction.

Ana. Regret, *sorrow, grief, anguish.

2 Abrasion, *erosion, corrosion.

Ana. Disintegration, crumbling, decomposition (see corresponding verbs at DECAY).

Ant. Accretion.

attune. Tune, *harmonize.

Ana. Adapt, adjust, accommodate, reconcile, conform: accord, *agree, harmonize: attemper, temper (see MODERATE): balance, counterbalance, *compensate.

Con. Alienate, *estrangle, wean.

atypic or atypical. *Abnormal, aberrant.

Ana. *Irregular, anomalous, unnatural: divergent, *different: deviating, departing (see SWERVE, v.): *exceptional.

Ant. Typical: representative. — Con. Ordinary, *common, familiar: *usual, customary.

auction, v. *Sell, vend, barter, trade.

audacious. Bold, intrepid, courageous, *brave, valiant, valorous, doughty, undaunted, dauntless.

Ana. Daring, daredevil, reckless, venturesome, *adventurous, rash, foolhardy, temerarious: brazen, brash, *shameless.

Ant. Circumspect. — Con. *Cautious, wary, chary, calculating: prudent, sane, judicious, *wise: *cowardly, craven, pusillanimous.

audacity. *Temerity, hardihood, effrontery, nerve, cheek, gall.

Ana. Intrepidity, boldness, courageousness (see corresponding adjectives at BRAVE): daring, daredeviltry, recklessness, rashness, foolhardiness (see corresponding adjectives at ADVENTUROUS): *courage, mettle, spirit: brazenness or brass (see corresponding adjective at SHAMELESS).

Ant. Circumspection. — Con. Caution, wariness, calculation (see under CAUTIOUS): timidity, timorousness (see corresponding adjectives at TIMID): fearfulness, apprehensiveness (see corresponding adjectives at FEARFUL).

audible. *Aural, auricular.

Ant. Inaudible.

audience. 1 *Hearing, audition.

2 Public, *following, clientele, clientage.

Ana. Fans, devotees, votaries (see singular nouns at ADDICT).

audile. *Auditory, acoustic, acoustical.

audit, n. Examination, inspection, scrutiny, scanning. See under SCRUTINIZE.

Ana. Check, *corrective, control: investigation, probe, *inquiry.

audit, v. Examine, inspect. *scrutinize, scan.

audition. *Hearing, audience.

auditor. *Bookkeeper, accountant.

Ana. Examiner, inspector, scrutinizer (see corresponding verbs at SCRUTINIZE): verifier, authenticator (see corresponding verbs at CONFIRM).

auditory. Auditory, audile, acoustic, acoustical agree in meaning of or relating to the hearing of sounds. Auditory often stresses hearing more than sound; as, the auditory (not acoustic) powers of a dog; the auditory (not acoustic) sensitivity of an individual's organs of hearing. Audile, a term coined to correspond to tactile, motile, visile, etc., is more often used in psychology than in physiology, and is applied chiefly to sounds as heard (as, audile images) or to persons who recall most easily that which they have heard (as, the audile type of mentality). Acoustic, on the other hand, emphasizes sound with reference to its capacity for being heard or the conditions under which it is heard; as, the acoustic quality of a person's voice; the acoustic properties of a hall. Both words are used in anatomy with little distinction, except that some human anatomists prefer acoustic; as, the auditory, or acoustic, nerve; the auditory, or acoustic, area of the brain. Acoustical is often interchangeable with acoustic. When, however, direct reference to the science of acoustics is intended, the former is the correct word; as, acoustical engineering.

auf Wiedersehen. Au revoir, farewell, Godspeed, adieu, adios, *good-by, bon voyage.

ought, n. Ought, naught, nought, *cipher, zero.

augment. *Increase, enlarge, multiply.

Ana. *Intensify, aggravate, enhance, heighten: swell, *expand, amplify, dilate.

Ant. Abate (sense 2). — Con. Reduce, diminish, *decrease, lessen, dwindle: curtail, abridge, *shorten.

augur. Prognosticate, presage, portend, forebode, prophesy, forecast, *foretell, predict.

Ana. Betoken, *indicate, bespeak, argue: apprehend, anticipate, divine, foreknow, *foresee.

augury. Omen, portent, presage, prognostic, *foretold.

Ana. *Sign, symptom, token, note, badge, mark: precursor, *forerunner, harbinger, herald.

Con. Fulfillment, accomplishment, effecting or effect (see corresponding verbs at PERFORM): realization, actualization, materialization (see corresponding verbs at REALIZE).

augment. Majestic, imposing, stately, noble, grandiose, *grand, magnificent.

Ana. Impressive, *moving: *splendid, sublime, superb: awful, *fearful.

Ant. Unimpressive: unimposing.

aura. *Atmosphere, feeling, feel, savor, tone.

aural. Aural, auricular, audile agree in meaning heard, or perceived by the ear. They are, however, not often interchangeable. Aural is applicable to any sensation, impression, or the like, which affects the ears rather than the nose (nasal) or the eyes (ocular or visual) or the nerve ends (muscular); as, insensitiveness to aural stimuli; to prefer the aural to the visual method in learning a language. Auricular is applicable not only to that which is heard, as distinguished from that which is read, but also especially to that which is communicated privately and is addressed to the ear of a particular person; thus, auricular confession is used of the private confession of sins to a priest, as distinguished from open confession before a congregation. "You shall . . . by an auricular assurance have your satisfaction" (Shak.). Audible is applicable only to sounds, voices, conversation, etc., which are heard, as distinguished from those which are not heard because too faint, too low, uttered in a whisper, or the like; as, "his voice being distinctly audible in the street" (Hardy).

aureate, adj. Euphuistic, flowery, *rhetorical, grandiloquent, magniloquent, bombastic.

Ana. *Ornate, florid, flamboyant, rococo, baroque.

Ant. Austere (in style).

aureole or aureola. Glory, nimbus, *halo.

Ana. Effulgence, radiance (see corresponding adjectives at BRIGHT).

au revoir. Auf Wiedersehen, *good-by, farewell, God-speed, adieu, adios, bon voyage.

auricular. *Aural, audible.

auspicious. *Favorable, propitious, benign.

Ana. *Lucky, fortunate, happy, providential: *hopeful, roseate: indicating or indicative, betokening (see corresponding verbs at INDICATE).

Ant. Inauspicious: ill-omened. — Con. *Sinister, baleful, malign, malefic: *adverse, antagonistic, counter: *ominous, portentous, unpropitious, fateful.

austere. *Severe, stern, ascetic.

Ana. Bald, *bare: unembellished, unadorned, unornamented, undecorated (see affirmative verbs at ADORN): dispassionate (see FAIR): rigorous, strict (see RIGID): grave, *serious, sober, earnest.

Ant. Luscious (of fruits, etc.): warm, ardent (of persons, feelings, etc.): exuberant (of style, quality, etc.). — Con. Lush, prodigal, *profuse: clement, lenient, indulgent (see FORBEARING): grandiloquent, magniloquent, aureate, flowery, *rhetorical: *impassioned, passionate, fervid, fervent.

autarchic or autarchival. Autarkic, autonomous, autonomic, independent, *free, sovereign.

autarchy. Autarky, autonomy, independence, freedom, sovereignty. See under FREE, adj.

autarkic or autarkical. Autarchic, autonomous, autonomic, independent, *free, sovereign.

autarky. Autarchy, autonomy, independence, freedom, sovereignty. See under FREE, adj.

authentic. Authentic, genuine, veritable, bona fide agree in the sense of being exactly what the thing in question is said to be or professes to be. The prevailing sense of authentic is authoritative, trustworthy, with the implication of actuality, or accordance with fact; as, "confirmed both by legend and authentic record" (Froude); an authentic description of the Great Fire of London. The prevailing sense of genuine is real, true (see REAL), often with the implication of descent, without admixture, from an original stock, or of correspondence, without adulteration, to the natural or original product called by that name; as, genuine maple sirup; a genuine Russian wolfhound; this is real merino, the genuine article. Often the stress is on sincerity, or lack of factitiousness; as, genuine piety; "true simplicity and genuine pathos" (Wordsworth). Both terms are used—genuine more frequently than authentic—as opposed to spurious, counterfeit, apocryphal; as, "Let them contrast their own fantastical personages . . . with the authentic rustics of Burns" (Jeffrey); "What is genuine knowledge, and what is its counterfeit?" (Neuman). The 18th-century distinction between the two terms, as applied to documents—"A genuine book, is that which was written by the person whose name it bears, as the author of it. An authentic book, is that which relates matters of fact, as they really happened" (R. Watson)—while still often observed, is becoming obliterated in present usage. However, it is idiomatic to say of a work such as a portrait, "this is an authentic portrait of George Washington" (that is, it was painted from life) and "this is a genuine Gilbert Stuart portrait of Washington" (that is, it is properly ascribed to Gilbert Stuart, the painter). Veritable, in precise use, always implies a correspondence with truth; it is seldom used without a suggestion of asseveration or of affirmation of belief. "I who am now talking . . . am the veritable Socrates" (Blackie). "Though Christ be the veritable Son of God" (Quiller-Couch). In looser use, it is applied to words or phrases used figuratively or hyperbolically, as an assertion of the justice of the designation or of its truth in essentials; as, his fits of passion are veritable hurricanes; he is a veritable fool. Bona fide, though often used as though it were the equivalent of genuine or authentic, is properly applied when good faith or sincerity is in question; as, a bona fide sale of securities; a bona fide bid for a piece of property.

Ana. Authoritative, authoritarian, oracular (see DICTATORIAL): *reliable, trustworthy, dependable: *correct, right, exact: true, *real, actual.

Ant. Spurious. — Con. *Fictitious, apocryphal, fabulous, mythical, legendary: *false, wrong: deceptive, *misleading, delusive, delusory: *supposed, supposititious, putative, hypothetical.

authenticate. Validate, verify, *confirm, substantiate, corroborate.

Ana. Certify, accredit, endorse, *approve: *prove, try, test, demonstrate: vouch, warrant (see ASSERT).

Ant. Impugn. — Con. *Deny, gainsay, contradict, traverse, negative, contravene: reject, repudiate, spurn (see DECLINE).

author. 1 *Maker, creator.

2 *Writer, composer.

authoritarian. 1 Authoritative, dogmatic, *dictatorial, magisterial, magistral, doctrinaire, oracular.

Ana. Despotic, autocratic, arbitrary, tyrannical, tyrannous, *absolute: domineering, imperious, *masterful.

Ant. Liberal, libertarian: anarchistic, anarchic.

2 *Totalitarian.

authoritative. Magisterial, magistral, authoritarian, oracular, dogmatic, *dictatorial, doctrinaire.

Ana. Authorized, accredited (see AUTHORIZE): certified, endorsed, approved (see APPROVE): *authentic, bona fide, genuine: *masterful, imperative, peremptory.

Ant. Questionable: servile. — Con. *Doubtful, dubious: meek, modest, *humble.

authority. 1 *Power, jurisdiction, command, control, dominion, sway.

Ana. Ascendancy, *supremacy: government, ruling or rule (see corresponding verbs at GOVERN).

2 *Influence, weight, credit, prestige.

Ana. Exemplar, ideal, standard, pattern, *model, example: *expert, adept, artist: connoisseur, virtuoso, *aesthete.

authorize. Authorize, commission, accredit, license (or licence) denote in common to invest with power or the right to act. One authorizes a person to act for oneself when he is given the necessary legal right or power, with or without instructions of a specific character. Often, discretionary powers are implied; as, to authorize a friend to make an answer to an attack on one's character; our clerks are authorized to receive contributions for the Red Cross. One commissions a person when one not only authorizes but instructs him to perform a definite duty or office. "I am commissioned to make you an offer which I have told him . . . you would not accept" (Gray). Specifically, commission may imply appointment as one's business agent, as in buying, selling, or supplying goods, or it may suggest an order to do a certain kind of work, especially work of a professional or artistic nature; as, to commission an artist to paint portraits of one's family. In military and naval use, it implies the conferring of rank and authority on officers above a certain rank. One accredits a person when one sends him, invested with authority and possessed of the proper credentials, as a representative, delegate, ambassador, or the like; as, John Hay was accredited to the Court of St. James's. "The sovereign to whom I am accredited" (Molley). One licenses a person (or, sometimes, a business, a trade, a craft) when one grants formal legal permission to act in a certain capacity (or to carry on a certain business, trade, or craft); as, to license teachers; to license medical school graduates to practice medicine. License sometimes stresses permission so strongly that the implication of authorization is obscured and that of regulation substituted; as, to license beggars; to license a firm to sell liquor. Ana. Empower, *enable: permit, allow, *let. Con. Enjoin, *forbid, prohibit, interdict.

autochthon, n. Native, aborigine, indigene. See under NATIVE, adj.

Con. Foreigner, alien, *stranger.

autochthonous or autochthonal, autochthonic. Indigenous, *native, aboriginal, endemic.

Ant. Naturalized.

Con. Foreign, alien, extraneous, *extrinsic.

autocratic or autocratical. Arbitrary, *absolute, despotic, tyrannical, tyrannous.

Ana. *Dictatorial, magisterial, magistral: authoritarian, *totalitarian: *masterful, domineering, imperious: overbearing, arrogant (see PROUD).

Con. Yielding, deferring, submitting, capitulating (see YIELD, v.): tolerant, lenient, *forbearing, indulgent.

autogenous. Endogenous, spontaneous, *automatic.

automatic, adj. 1 Automatic, spontaneous, autogenous, endogenous, as here compared, are not close synonyms, but they agree in meaning brought into being or action by an internal, as opposed to an external, agency. Automatic has historically been subjected to various changes in meaning and has only within recent generations acquired stable senses. Originally, it was used to describe a thing that was self-acting or self-activated because it contained the principle of motion within itself. "In the universe, nothing can be said to be automatic" (Sir H. Davy). Now, in the sense here considered, it is applied to machines and mechanical contrivances which, after certain conditions have been fulfilled, continue to operate indefinitely without human supervision or until the conditions have materially changed; thus, an automatic firearm is so constructed that after the first round is exploded the force of the recoil or gas pressure loads and fires round after round until the ammunition is exhausted or the trigger is released; a thermostat is an automatic device which maintains the temperature of artificially heated rooms by operating the appropriate parts of a furnace when the temperature exceeds or falls below the point at which it is set. Spontaneous (see also SPONTANEOUS) is applicable not so much to objective things as to processes, particularly natural processes, thought of as originating without external agency or, more often in noncontroversial use, without human agency; thus, spontaneous generation implies origin of living directly from nonliving matter; spontaneous combustion implies a generation of heat through chemical changes in matter causing it to burn; a spontaneous growth refers to vegetation produced neither from humanly sown seed nor from plantings. Autogenous and endogenous are used chiefly in the biological sciences. Autogenous usually stresses origin within the same individual as contrasted with origin in another; as, an autogenous bone graft; an autogenous infection; autogenous vaccines. Endogenous emphasizes origin within the organism as contrasted with external origin (exogenous origin); as, the endogenous toxins of bacteria; tuberculosis of endogenous origin; the endogenous causes of cancer.

2 Mechanical, instinctive, *spontaneous, impulsive.

Ana. Trained, disciplined, schooled, instructed (see TEACH): prompt, *quick, ready.

Con. Deliberate, *voluntary, intentional.

autonomic. Autonomous, independent, sovereign, *free, autarchic, autarkic.

autonomous. Autonomic, independent, sovereign, *free, autarchic, autarkic.

autonomy. Independence, freedom, sovereignty, autarky, autarchy. See under FREE, adj.

auxiliary. Auxiliary, subsidiary, accessory (or accessory), contributory, subservient, ancillary, adjuvant agree in meaning supplying aid or support. Auxiliary may or may not imply subordinate rank or position; as, an auxiliary organization; an auxiliary bishop. "The conclusion that the humanistic point of view is auxiliary to and dependent upon the religious point of view" (T. S. Eliot). It now often suggests something in reserve; as, an auxiliary motor (in a sailboat). Subsidiary once had in English its etymological notion of a reserve supply; as, subsidiary forces. "A subsidiary fund always at hand to be mortgaged in aid of any other doubtful fund" (Adam Smith). In present use, however, subsidiary stresses subordinate or inferior status or capacity, often to the obscuring, even loss, of the notion of supplying aid; as, subsidiary streams (that is, tributaries); a subsidiary company (one controlled by another company that holds a majority of the shares of its stock). Accessory stresses so strongly the mere fact of association or accompaniment that in many applications the notion of assistance or support is obscured or even lost; as, accessory sounds in music; an accessory mineral (one present in a rock but not an essential constituent); cf. automobile accessories. A person accessory to a crime (for example, the hirer of an assassin or a receiver of stolen goods) need not actively participate in its commission (see also accessory, n., under CONFEDERATE). Contributory stresses the assistance rather than the subordinate status of the assistant and usually implies the effecting of an end or result; as, resentment against the unjust tax was one of the contributory causes of the revolt; contributory negligence (negligence on the part of an injured person contributing to the production of the injury). Subservient usually stresses the subordinate nature of the assistance. "A catastrophe to which every incident should be subservient" (Crabbe). It also stresses the importance or usefulness of the end it serves and, often also, the nature of its motive, such as commendable self-subordination or a sense of order and due relation; as, "He has uniformly made his talents subservient to the best interests of humanity" (Coleridge); "those features of a work of art which by themselves would be unattractive or repulsive, like an 'ugly' face, but in the work are subservient to the total effect and may even heighten its beauty" (S. Alexander). Ancillary preserves to some extent, even in present use, its etymological association with maidservant (Latin ancilla) and more than the other terms stresses the intimacy of the assistance. "Does it not follow that some practice in the deft use of words, with its correspondent defining of thought, may well be ancillary even to the study of natural science in a university?" (Quiller-Couch). Adjuvant differs from auxiliary, its closest synonym, in attributing greater importance, or more noticeable effectiveness, or a more definite influence, to the thing so qualified; thus, an adjuvant ingredient in a prescription often modifies the major ingredient so as to aid significantly the latter's action or to make it effective; as, "used as adjuvant respiratory organs" (R. B. Todd).

Ana. *Subordinate, succursal, secondary, tributary: supporting, upholding, backing (see SUPPORT, v.): helping, aiding, assisting (see HELP, v.): supplementary, complementary (see corresponding nouns at COMPLEMENT).

avail, v. 1 *Benefit, profit, bestead, boot.

Ana. Meet, answer, *satisfy, fulfill: *help, aid.

Con. Harm, hurt, *injure, damage.

2 In form avail oneself of. Utilize, employ, *use, apply.

Con. *Abuse, misuse: *neglect, ignore, slight, overlook: reject, refuse, spurn (see DECLINE).

avail, n. *Use, service, account, advantage, profit.

avant-propos. Preface, foreword, proem, *introduction, prologue, induction, prelude, prolegomenon, exordium, preamble, prolusion, protasis, overture.

avarice. Greed, *cupidity, rapacity.

Ana. Avariciousness, covetousness, acquisitiveness (see corresponding adjectives at COVETOUS): stinginess, niggardliness, miserliness, parsimoniousness (see corresponding adjectives at STINGY).

Ant. Prodigality. — Con. Extravagance (see corresponding adjective at EXCESSIVE): liberality, generosity, munificence, bountifulness (see corresponding adjectives at LIBERAL).

avaricious. *Covetous, acquisitive, grasping, greedy.

Ana. Miserly, close, close-fisted, parsimonious, *stingy.

Ant. Generous. — Con. *Liberal, bountiful, munificent: lavish, prodigal (see PROFUSE).

avenge. Avenge, revenge agree in meaning to inflict punishment on a person who has wronged oneself or another. Once close synonyms, these verbs are now increasingly divergent in implications. One may avenge or revenge (a person who is wronged), but avenge is the preferred word when that person is another than oneself and one is motivated by a desire to vindicate him or to serve the ends of justice. Avenge may also be used when the person injured is oneself and one is thought of as visiting just or merited punishment on the wrongdoer. In either case the word is often followed by on, upon, or the archaic of (the wrongdoer). "Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints" (Milton). "I swear on my knees, on these stones, to avenge you on Foulon" (Dickens). "He had avenged himself on them by havoc such as England had never before seen" (Macaulay). On the other hand, one revenges oneself, now almost never another, when one inflicts injury on or upon (or, archaic, of) an offender in a desire to exact satisfaction for his offense. Revenge may imply a desire for vindication or an aim to serve the ends of justice, but more often it suggests a desire to get even, to pay back in kind or degree, and therefore variously connotes malice, spite, an unwillingness to forgive, or the like. "The hope of revenging himself on me was a strong inducement" (Austen). "Monti at least revenged himself of Pius for placing him below Metastasio" (J. C. Hobhouse). "He saw that his true policy was not to revenge himself by executions and confiscations" (Stubbs). Also, one may either avenge or revenge (a wrong, injury, or the like) but avenge now usually implies that the end is just retribution whether the activity is in one's own or another's behalf, whereas revenge implies that the end is retaliation and the compelling spirit of the act hatred or bitterness; as, Orestes revenged his father's murder by killing the murderer, his mother, but the gods avenged his matricide by driving him mad.

Ana. Requite, recompense, compensate, *pay (back): vindicate, defend, justify (see MAINTAIN): *punish, chasten, chastise.

Con. Forbear, *refrain, abstain: remit, pardon, forgive (see EXCUSE).

avenue. 1 *Road, street, boulevard, terrace, drive, parkway, roadway, highway, highroad, thoroughfare.

2 Avenue, alley, allée, mall designate a shaded walk or road, especially in a park or on an estate. Avenue is applied to an approach which leads to a house or building at a distance from the gate and which is lined on both sides by tall trees; alley, to a narrow walk bordered by shrubs or trees, as one through a garden or a grove. Allée, the French equivalent, is sometimes preferred to alley to avoid confusion; it is, however, specifically applied to an alley where the trees or shrubs are twice as high as the width of the path. Mall is applied to a public promenade, often, especially originally, tree lined, and used frequently but not invariably as a proper name.

aver. Declare, avouch, avow, affirm, *assert, protest.

Ana. Asseverate, testify, *swear: *maintain, defend, justify.

Ant. Deny. — Con. Gainsay, negative, contradict, traverse (see DENY).

average, n. Average, mean, median, norm, par agree in denoting something, usually a number, a quantity, a condition, or the like, that represents a middle point between extremes. Of these words average, mean, median and par are also used as adjectives. Except in extended use, average is an arithmetical term applied to a quotient obtained by dividing a sum total by another figure or quantity. When the figures or quantities added up are unequal in value, the divisor is the number of items involved, and the quotient represents the figure or quantity each would be if all were alike; thus, the average of 10, 12, 14, 16, 18, 20 is 15 (that is, $90 \div 6$). Such averages are computed to give one a fair estimate of a group, a series, or the like, in which there are inequalities; as, his average (that is, the average of his ratings) for his high school course was 82; the average of the apple pickers (that is, the average quantity of apples picked) was 25 bushels a day. When, especially in sports, the sum total represents the number of chances taken or of opportunities offered or provided, the quotient, or average, is obtained by dividing the number of successes, or successful performances, by this sum total. Such an average is expressed as a percentage (often more accurately, as a permillage) and gives a fair estimate of a player's performance and a basis for comparison with others; thus, a baseball fielder who handles a total of 1114 chances and makes 6 errors, has a fielding average of .9946 (that is, $1108 \div 1114$); a baseball batter who is credited with 633 appearances at bat and has made 254 hits has a batting average of .401 (that is, $254 \div 633$). A similar method is used in estimating probabilities, such as the chances of death for a person between given ages and the length of the period between recurrences of an unpredictable phenomenon; thus, the average of mortality for persons of a given age is computed from statistics of deaths at that age and of the population group consisting of persons of that age. In extended use, average is applied not to a number but to a concept of what is the typical or ordinary person or thing of its kind (see also average, under MEDIUM); as, the boy is above the average for his age and background; the play is below the season's average in dramatic interest. Mean, in its earliest use in English, named a condition, quality, intensity, rate, or the like, that is midway between two extremes. This meaning still prevails, but it is found chiefly in idiomatic phrases such as "the golden mean," "the happy mean" implying moderation and avoidance both of blamable excess and of blamable deficiency; as, to observe a happy mean between abjectness and arrogance or between effusiveness and reserve. "He that holds fast the golden mean, And lives contentedly between The little and the great"

(Couper: transl. of Horace). In its mathematical use, mean is more general than average (for which another name is arithmetical mean): it covers also the geometric mean, that is, the square root of the product of two numbers or quantities (or the *n*th root of the product of n quantities); thus, 10 is the arithmetical mean (or average) of 4, 16, while 8 is the geometric mean of 4, 16. In computing the mean of temperatures, only the averages of the highest and of the lowest readings during the given period are considered. The average of the highest readings of a thermometer each day for a month is known as the mean maximum temperature; of the lowest readings, as the mean minimum temperature. These two figures are averaged to give the mean temperature for the month. Median, in the sense here considered, as in all its senses, refers to a midway point in position: in statistics it names the figure or quantity which represents the point at which there are as many instances below as there are above it; thus, the average of a group of 5 workers earning respectively 3, 4, 5, 8, and 10 dollars a day is six dollars a day, whereas the median for the same group is five dollars, because one half of them earn less than five dollars a day and one half more. When, however, the figure is the same for some members of the group, the median is derived by taking into account two factors, the figure for each member of the series, and the number of members coming under each of these figures. Thus, if the scores of a class of fifteen are 4, 6, 8, 8, 8, 8, 9, 9, 9, 9, 9, 10, 10, the median score is 9 (the eighth figure in the series). Norm etymologically suggests a rule for guidance or, by extension, a definite pattern to be followed: it has come also to denote, especially in scientific fields, such as psychology and sociology, the average (sometimes the mathematically computed average, sometimes the estimated average) of performance or achievement of a group, class, category, or the like, which is set up as the standard for, or as the minimum of accomplishment by, the entire membership of the group; thus, a course of study for a certain grade is based upon whatever is the accepted norm for children of the age, experience, and background commonly found in that grade. "Crime is merely a name for the most obvious, extreme, and directly dangerous forms of . . . departure from the norm in manners and customs" (H. Ellis). "It is everything to have acquired and to possess such a norm of Poetry within us that we know whether or not what he wrote was Poetry" (Quiller-Couch). Par, which in the sense here considered is more common in British than in American use, usually refers to an average for an individual and not, as norm, to the average for a group. In the United States, as in Great Britain, it often refers to an individual person's average in health, accomplishment, or the like; as, I feel below par (that is, below my average in health) today; this theme is above par for that student (that is, above his average theme in quality). In British use, however, par may be employed in reference to an average in amount (as, the par of crop production for a given farm) or in barometric pressure (as, the par for this particular level), or the like.

Ant. Maximum: minimum.

average, adj. 1 Mean, median, par. See under AVERAGE, n.

2 Middling, *medium, indifferent, fair, moderate, mediocre, second-rate.

Ana. *Common, ordinary, familiar: *usual, customary.

Ant. Exceptional: extraordinary. — Con. Outstanding, prominent, conspicuous, *noticeable: superlative, *supreme, surpassing, pre-eminent.

averse. 1 *Disinclined, indisposed, loath, reluctant, hesitant.

Ana. Recoiling, shrinking, flinching, quailing (see RECOIL, v.): uncongenial, unsympathetic (see INCONSONANT): balky, *contrary, perverse.

Ant. Avid (of or for): athirst (for).

2 Unsympathetic, *antipathetic.

3 *Adverse.

aversion. *Antipathy.

Ana. Repugnance, repellency, abhorrence, distaste or distastefulness (see corresponding adjectives at REPUGNANT): horror, dread, *fear.

Ant. Predilection: penchant. — Con. Partiality, bias, prejudice (see PREDILECTION): *leaning, propensity, flair.

avert. 1 *Turn, deflect, sheer, divert.

Ana. Bend, twist, *curve: shift, remove, transfer, *move.

2 Ward off, *prevent, obviate, preclude.

Ana. *Escape, avoid, shun, eschew, evade, elude: forestall, anticipate (see PREVENT): *frustrate, balk, thwart, foil.

aviation. *Aeronautics, aviation.

avid. *Eager, keen, anxious, agog, a-tiptoe, athirst.

Ana. Desiring or desirous, craving, coveting or covetous (see corresponding verbs at DESIRE): longing, yearning, pining, hankering, hungering, thirsting (see LONG, v.).

Ant. Indifferent: averse. — Con. Indisposed, *disinclined, loath: aloof, disinterested (see INDIFFERENT): listless, *languid: apathetic, *impassive.

aviation. *Aeronautics, aviation.

avocation. *Vocation.

Ana. Diversion, amusement, recreation (see under AMUSE).

avoid. 1 Void, vacate, quash, abrogate, *annul.

Ana. Invalidate, *nullify, negate: cancel, *erase.

2 *Escape, shun, eschew, evade, elude.

Ana. Avert, ward off, *prevent, obviate: forestall, anticipate (see PREVENT): flee, fly (see ESCAPE).

Ant. Face: meet. — Con. *Incur, contract, catch: court, solicit, *invite.

avouch. Aver, affirm, avow, declare, *assert, protest, warrant, predicate.

Ana. Testify, depose, depone, asseverate, *swear: *confirm, corroborate.

Con. Gainsay, contradict, *deny, negative, traverse, impugn.

avow. 1 Affirm, declare, aver, avouch, warrant, *assert, protest, predicate.

Ana. *Maintain, defend, vindicate: testify, asseverate, *swear.

2 Own, *acknowledge, confess, admit.

Ana. Proclaim, *declare, publish, announce: *reveal, discover, disclose, divulge, tell.

Ant. Disavow. — Con. Repudiate, reject, refuse (see DECLINE, v.): *deny, gainsay, negative, contradict.

await. Look for, *expect, hope, look.

Ana. Wait, abide, *stay.

Ant. Despair (of).

awake, adj. *Aware, alive, cognizant, conscious, sensible.

Ana. Alert, vigilant, *watchful: roused, aroused, stirred (up), awakened (see STIR).

Con. *Sleepy, drowsy, somnolent, slumberous: *inactive, inert, supine.

awake, v. *Wake, awaken, waken.

Ana. Excite, stimulate, quicken, galvanize (see PROVOKE): rouse, arouse, *stir.

awaken. 1 Waken, awake, *wake.

2 Waken, rouse, arouse, *stir, rally.

Ana. Excite, galvanize, quicken, stimulate, *provoke:

kindle, enkindle, fire, inflame (see LIGHT): elicit, evoke (see EDUCE).

Ant. Subdue. — Con. *Arrest, check: *frustrate, thwart, baffle, balk, foil.

award, v. *Grant, accord, vouchsafe, concede.

Ana. Bestow, confer, present, *give: assign, *allot, apportion, allocate: adjudicate, adjudge, *judge, arbitrate.

award, n. Prize, *premium, reward, guerdon, meed, bonus, bounty.

aware. Aware, cognizant, conscious, sensible, alive, awake agree in meaning having knowledge of something, especially of something that for some reason is not obvious or apparent to all. One is aware of something through information or, especially, through one's own vigilance in observing or in drawing inferences from what one sees, hears, feels, or the like. "Few, so far as I am aware, now claim the free speech to call a knave a knave" (T. S. Eliot). "Mr. Potter would not . . . have been worthy of his reputation had he not been aware . . . of the existence of this League. Journalists have to be aware of such things" (R. Macaulay). "It is only through imagination that men become aware of what the world might be" (B. Russell). One is cognizant of something who has had it called to his attention or has become aware of it through his own powers of observation; in careful use the word commonly implies first-hand or certain knowledge; as, he is not, as yet, fully cognizant of the facts. "If the Saints in bliss Be cognizant of aught that passeth here" (Southey). One is conscious of something that he sees, hears, feels, or otherwise apprehends, when he allows it to enter his mind so that, at the very least, he recognizes its existence or, at the most, he fixes his attention on it; thus, one may or may not be conscious of his heartbeat, or of someone passing through the room. "He stood there motionless and in wonder, dimly conscious that Hallward was speaking to him" (Wilde). "To be happy or miserable without being conscious of it seems to me utterly inconsistent and impossible" (Locke). "Lifelong short-sightedness . . . of which he has never ceased to be conscious" (H. Ellis). One is sensible of something who through feeling or a sixth sense realizes its existence. "She was disturbing him extremely . . . but he was much too sensible of her goodwill to wound her feelings by telling her so" (C. Mackenzie). "Even he was sensible of the decorous atmosphere" (Joyce). One is alive to something who is acutely susceptible to its influence or sensible of its existence. "The Spring Finds thee not less alive to her sweet force Than yonder upstarts" (Cowper). "They were fully alive to the danger of thwarting Barbara" (Galsworthy). One is awake to something who is aroused to it or on the alert for developments; as, the country is not awake to the potential evils of a strict censorship.

Ana. *Sure, certain, positive: informed, acquainted, apprised (see INFORM).

Ant. Unaware. — Con. *Insensible, insensitive, impassible, anesthetic: *ignorant, nescient.

awe, n. Fear, reverence.

Ana. Respect, esteem, *regard: *wonder, wonderment, admiration, amaze, amazement.

Con. Contempt, scorn, disdain, despite (see under DESPISE): insolence, superciliousness, arrogance (see corresponding adjectives at PROUD).

awful. *Fearful, dreadful, frightful, terrible, horrible, shocking, appalling, terrific, horrific.

Ana. Impressive, *moving: solemn, *serious, grave: imposing, august, majestic (see GRAND): sublime, superb, *splendid: *ominous, portentous.

awkward. Awkward, clumsy, maladroit, inept, gauche

come into comparison when they mean not adapted by constitution or character to act, operate, or achieve the intended or desired ends with ease, fitness, or grace. Awkward and clumsy are by far the widest of these terms in their range of application. Awkward (etymologically, wrong in direction) in many of its applications involves the idea of unfitness for easy handling or dexterous management. It may suggest unhandiness or inconvenience; as, an awkward tool; an awkward arrangement of controls. It may suggest embarrassment or discomfiture; as, an awkward situation; an awkward silence; an awkward meeting. "How earnestly did she then wish that her former opinions had been more reasonable, her expressions more moderate! It would have spared her from explanations . . . which it was exceedingly awkward to give" (Austen). When applied to persons, their build, their movements, their manners, or the like, awkward usually implies a lack of ease or grace and often suggests muscular in-co-ordination or deficiency in poise; thus, an awkward gait implies lack of muscular control; an awkward greeting implies want of tact or address; so, an awkward dancer; an awkward gesture; an awkward response; "His [Tiberius's] manners were awkward and unconciliatory" (Buchan). "Somehow these two could not talk. Constance perceived that Sophia was impeded by the same awkwardness as herself" (Bennett). Clumsy (etymologically, benumbed) stresses stiffness or heaviness with consequent want of flexibility or dexterity. The word is often applied to that which is so constructed or contrived as to be lumbering or ponderous; as, a boy of clumsy build; a bear is the most clumsy of animals; a clumsy style; clumsy boots. "When a great writer, like Carlyle or Browning, creates a speech of his own which is too clumsy to be flexible and too heavy to be intimate" (H. Ellis). Sometimes the word also implies unwieldiness; as, "a great play in spite of . . . the clumsy machinery of the plot" (T. S. Eliot). More often, however, and especially when applied to persons and their acts, it implies a lack of expertness or adroitness in manipulation, often with a suggestion of bungling; as, "the clumsy attempts of governments or other social bodies to interfere . . . will only make matters worse!" (J. A. Hobson); "he was a clumsy dissector because of his injury" (H. G. Wells). The next two words, maladroit and inept, imply awkwardness or clumsiness in managing that which requires mental or social dexterity, and are applicable only to persons and their acts or utterances. Maladroit implies a lack of tact or of skill in avoiding difficult situations in human intercourse, or a capacity for making things awkward; for this reason it is often opposed to politic or diplomatic in their extended senses; as, a maladroit reply to a letter; a maladroit remark. "It was more correct to 'break' a piece of bad news to a person by means of a (possibly maladroit and unfeeling) messenger" (Thackeray). Inept stresses inappropriateness or lack of aptness, especially in a person's acts or utterances; often, in addition, it carries a suggestion of futility or absurdity; thus, a remark may be inept because it is so out of keeping with the topic under discussion as to seem pointless and yet at the same time be maladroit because it gives an awkward turn to the conversation. "If these two noticed Angel's growing social ineptness, he noticed their growing mental limitations" (Hardy). "He [Henry James] is . . . the sharp-eyed and penetrating critic for whom . . . this extraordinary and extraordinarily inept society has in fancied security unwittingly been waiting" (Brownell). Gauche (etymologically, left-handed) suggests a lack of social graces that makes for clumsiness or ineptness: it may imply also shyness, inexperience, or ill-breeding. "This journey

... tended to reduce my shy, taciturn, and somewhat gauche manner" (G. G. Scott).

Ana. *Stiff, wooden, rigid: embarrassing, discomfiting, disconcerting (see EMBARRASS).

Ant. Handy, deft: graceful. — Con. Adroit, *dexterous, feat: skillful, adept, *proficient: *easy, simple, facile, effortless.

awry. Awry, askew, askance agree in meaning deviating from a straight line or direction when used in their original literal senses. In their current extended senses, they all imply divergence from that which is straight or straightforward, direct, symmetrical, or orderly, but they are seldom applicable to the same things. Awry carries a strong implication of disorderliness, of disarrangement, or of confusion; as, the blinds all hang awry; everything in the kitchen was awry; their plans went awry. Askew stresses crookedness or distortion. It implies that the thing so described is set at a wrong angle, is twisted out of its proper position, goes off in the wrong direction, or the like; as, every chair in this room is askew; since the hurricane many of the trees are askew; the seam in the front of your skirt runs askew. Askance is used chiefly in the set phrases "to look (eye, view) askance"; in early use the word meant sidelong or sideways; in current use, the phrase, not the word, is important, and it means to look at with mistrust, suspicion, disfavor, jealousy, or the like. "Aside the Devil turned For envy; yet with jealous leer malign Eyed them askance" (Milton). "Both . . . were viewed askance by authority" (Gladstone).

axiom. *Principle, fundamental, law, theorem.

aye. *Forever, ever, always, evermore, forevermore.

B

babble, v. Gabble, jabber, prattle, chatter, patter, prate, gibber, gab, *chat.

Ana. *Gossip, blab, tattle: converse, talk, *speak.

babel. Hubbub, racket, *din, uproar, hullabaloo, pandemonium.

Ana. Clamorousness or clamor, vociferousness (see corresponding adjectives at VOCIFEROUS): *confusion, disorder.

Con. Stillness, quietness or quiet, silentness or silence, noiselessness (see corresponding adjectives at STILL).

baby, v. Mollycoddle, humor, pamper, *indulge, spoil.

bacillus. Bacterium, pathogen, virus, *germ, microbe.

back, v. 1 *Support, uphold, champion, advocate.

Ana. Assist, aid, *help: favor, accommodate, *oblige: abet (see INCITE).

Con. *Weaken, undermine, disable, cripple: subvert, upset (see OVERTURN): *oppose, resist, combat.

2 Retrograde, crawfish, *recede, retreat, retract.

Con. *Advance, progress.

back, adj. *Posterior, rear, hind, hinder, after.

Ant. Front.

backbiting, n. *Detraction, slander, scandal, calumny.

Ana. Aspersions, *ammadversion, reflection, stricture: *abuse, invective, obloquy, vituperation: vilifying or vilification, defaming or defamation (see corresponding verbs at MALIGN).

Ant. Vindication (see corresponding verb at MAINTAIN).

— Con. *Compliment, flattery, adulation: praising or praise, eulogizing or eulogy, extolling or extollation (see corresponding verbs at PRAISE).

backbone. 1 *Spine, vertebrae, chine.

2 Grit, guts, sand, *fortitude, pluck.

Ana. *Courage, resolution, tenacity, mettle, spirit: courageousness, intrepidity, dauntlessness, valiancy (see corresponding adjectives at BRAVE): nerve, *temerity, hardihood.

Ant. Spinelessness. — Con. Cowardliness or cowardice, pusillanimousness or pusillanimity (see corresponding adjectives at COWARDLY).

backdrop. *Background, setting, milieu, mise-en-scène, environment.

backer. 1 Supporter, upholder, champion, advocate. See under SUPPORT, v.

2 *Sponsor, surety, guarantor, patron, angel.

background. Background, setting, environment, mi- lieu, mise-en-scène, backdrop come into comparison when they are used in reference to human beings and their actions as found in real life or as represented in art, and denote the place, time, circumstances, and conditions in which those persons live or carry on their activities. However, they vary widely in their derivations and are not always interchangeable. Background, the oldest of these words in the sense here considered, was first used with reference to a dramatic performance and to the back and usually dimly lighted part of the stage, as distinguished from the better-lighted foreground where the main action usually took place; as, "Ranger retires to the background" (Wycheley); "Elvira walks about pensively in the background" (Sheridan). Later, it was used in reference to paintings, engravings, and the like, and applied to that part of a picture which seems most remote from the spectator and against which the figures or principal objects represented seem to be projected; as, many of the Renaissance painters preferred a natural background, such as mountain peaks and blue sky, others preferred an architectural background, such as a group of buildings or an interior. Both of these uses are still common, but the term's applicability has been widely extended to cover that which lies behind anything (such as a historical event, a movement, a career, or a phase of a person's or a people's development) that is capable of being seen in perspective or that may be viewed in its relation to its surroundings or the influences that have determined it in whole or in part; as, to know a person well one needs to know his background; students of English literature must have as background a knowledge of English history. "Landscape is treated as an accessory to human life and a background to human events" (Bin-yon). "The Latin of the Vulgate and the Offices has been a background giving depth and, as the painters say, 'value' to nine-tenths of our serious writing" (Quiller-Couch). Setting also derives its basic implications from the arts, originally from the jewelers' art, where the term is still used of the framework of precious metal in which a gem is mounted, and later from the dramatists' art, where it is used of the framework, in the way of scenic paintings, furniture, and the like, which indicates to the spectator the surroundings in which the action of a play takes place. Hence, setting is preferred to background as a designation of that element in a novel, a play, or other literary representation of human life, which is distinguished from the plot and the characters, and which is the author's imaginative reconstruction of the time, place, and conditions in which his characters live and act. When used in reference to real life, setting commonly connotes the standpoint of one who looks at human beings and their activities as though they were dramatic or literary representations. "What a social setting it was, that little world into which Mark Twain was born! It was drab, it was tragic" (Van W. Brooks). Environment, which came into common use early in the nineteenth century, was at first hardly distinguishable from the much older word environs, or the surroundings (usually natural surroundings) of a town, a body of water, or the like. "The environment of this loch put me in mind of Grasmere" (Blackie). However, after the theory of evolution was definitely propounded in the mid-century, environment came to be applied to all the external conditions which affect the life and development of an organism. When the human species and the factors influencing its development became a matter of widespread interest, the term acquired new implications. Consequently, when used in reference to persons, environment suggests not only natural surroundings but social conditions, and implies their importance as factors in the physical, mental, and moral development of the species or the individual or as formative influences; as, "the environment which produced Jonathan Edwards and Cotton Mather" (Brownell); "They were, perhaps, too far advanced for their time and environment" (Cather). When the formative influences in a person's development are the result of heredity or nature, background is the preferred term; when they are the product of his surroundings or his nurture, environment is the proper choice; thus, one may say that, although it is impossible to change a child's background, he will turn out well if brought up in a different environment. Milieu, a French word now naturalized in English, carries none of the scientific implications of environment, yet it also means surroundings and is used chiefly in reference to the physical and social surroundings of a person or group of persons. It is preferred to environment when there is the intent to evoke a clear picture or to suggest the specific character or atmosphere of such surroundings; it may be used in reference to imagined as well as to actual persons, and therefore is often interchangeable with setting; as, "A duplicate of the village in which Mark Twain had grown up, the milieu of Huck Finn and Tom Sawyer" (Van W. Brooks); "His chief object... is not to make an isolated study of this or that milieu, or to describe a particular social sphere" (Athenaeum). "A Chicago journal... treating of courtship, apostrophizes... 'the turned-down light, the single chair,' but it would be idle to pretend that the milieu thus briefly characterized is congenial to all of us" (Brownell). Mise-en-scène, also a French term in increasing use in English, is the equivalent of setting, especially as referred to a theatrical performance. However, its stronger suggestion of the use of properties to achieve a given atmosphere or theatrical effect is the reason for its preference by some writers when the reference is not specifically to a dramatic performance, or even to invented scenes. "In 'The Scarlet Letter' how truly in the spirit of art is the mise-en-scène presented... The material investiture of the story is presented... by the reserved, fastidious hand of an artist, not by the gaudy fingers of a showman or the mechanical industry of a department-store window-dresser" (Cather). Backdrop, literally a drop curtain at the rear of the stage which provides the decorative or realistic background for the action of a play and brings players and their movements into relief, is now increasingly common in an extended sense as a substitute for background, or setting, or milieu, when there is the intent to stress pictorial effect rather than social influence or spiritual significance. "In Imperial City... Against the multi-towered backdrop of New York he [Elmer Rice] has pictured... the passions and hopes, the dreams and desolations... of... seven million souls" (Atlantic Monthly).

backslide, v. Relapse, recidivate, *lapse.

Ana. Revert, *return: deteriorate, degenerate, decline (see corresponding nouns at DETERIORATION): *recede, retreat, retrograde.

backslider. *Renegade, renegado, apostate, recreant, turncoat, pervert.

backsliding, n. Relapse, recidivation, recidivism, lapse. See under LAPSE, v.

Ana. Retrogressiveness or retrogression, retrogradation (see corresponding adjectives at BACKWARD): abandoning, deserting, forsaking (see ABANDON).

backstairs or backstair, adj. Privy, clandestine, furtive, covert, *secret, surreptitious, stealthy, underhand, underhanded.

backward, adj. Backward, retrograde, retrogressive, regressive all involve the idea of not moving or going ahead, or forward, or in advance. Only when applied to motion or a movement does backward imply the reverse of forward motion; as, a backward thrust of a hand; the backward swimming of a crayfish. Its commonest implication is failure to move ahead; in this sense it is chiefly applied to human beings who do not or cannot progress or develop with others of their age, kind, or class, or to persons or things that hold back or are held back from doing that which is normal or to be expected; thus, a child who is unable to keep up with others of his age in school because of some degree of mental deficiency, or because his normal mental development has been retarded, is described as backward; a person who holds back from expressing his appreciation, or in urging his candidacy for a position, because of shyness or self-distrust, is also describable as backward in doing the thing expected; when cold weather and frosts delay the development of vegetation beyond the normal or usual time, the season may be called backward. "Anthropology has come to mean chiefly the study of the backward races" (Inge). Retrograde is not only applicable to backward motion and backward movement but also to any moving or seemingly moving thing that proceeds in a direction which is contrary to the direction usually followed by things of its kind; as, the retrograde motion of a wheel; a retrograde planet (that is, a planet seemingly moving from east to west). It is also applicable to a process, such as the evolution of a species when it passes through stages in the order contrary to that which is normal and progressive; thus, some species of animal life that show indications of development in the direction of simpler and less specialized forms are said to manifest retrograde evolution. Retrograde, when applied to races, peoples, institutions, movements, and the like, differs from backward in implying decline or degeneration; thus, a backward race is one that does not progress; a retrograde race is one that is relapsing into barbarism or sinking into an inferior state. Retrogressive always implies diametric opposition to progressive. Like retrograde, and unlike backward, it implies movement in the direction that is the reverse of forward; unlike retrograde, however, it is seldom applied to physical movement; thus, one speaks of a retrograde (but not a retrogressive glacier), but one would speak of a retrogressive (not a retrograde) inquiry when such an inquiry leads the investigator from that which is near to that which is remote. Retrogressive is usually the preferred term when the reverse of improvement or betterment is implied; as, a retrogressive policy; objections were made to the proposed legislation on the ground of its probable retrogressive effect. Regressive carries a stronger implication of going backward by steps or degrees and often, also, a weaker implication of failure to progress or move ahead than any of the others. Consequently, it is often the preferred term when a colorless or uncolored statement of fact is intended; thus, when one infers the cause from the effect, or a principle from a number of facts, he is said to follow a regressive process of reasoning; the process of growing old may be described as a retrograde development when the emphasis is on its backward direction, as a retrogressive development when the stress is on the reversing of progress, and as a regressive development when the intent is to indicate that it is marked by an inversion of order in its stages; a regressive loss of memory implies that the most recent memories disappear first and the earliest linger longest. Ana. Laggard, dilatory, *slow: *stupid, dull, dense: *lethargic, sluggish: *abnormal, atypical, atypical. Ant. Advanced. — Con. Civilized, cultured (see corresponding nouns at CIVILIZATION): cultivated, cultured, refined (see corresponding nouns at CULTURE): educated, instructed (see TEACH).

bactericidal, adj. Germicidal, antiseptic, disinfectant. See under ANTISEPTIC, n.

bactericide. Germicide, *antiseptic, disinfectant, bacteriophage, phage, antitoxin.

bacteriophage, phage. Antitoxin, bactericide, germicide, *antiseptic, disinfectant.

bacterium. Usually in plural form bacteria. *Germ, microbe, bacillus, pathogen, virus.

bad. 1 Bad, evil, ill, wicked, naughty are synonymous when they mean not meeting with the approval of the ethical consciousness. Bad ranges in implication from the utmost moral reprehensibility to a force so weakened that it is interchangeable with naughty (see below), or is even applied to animals; as, "Almost as bad, good mother, As kill a king, and marry with his brother" (Shak.); "Young people... are often corrupted by bad books" (J. Fordyce); "Johnnie's been a bad boy today: he's emptied the cookie jar; Bad dog! you've torn up my scarf! Evil, a stronger term than bad often is, is not often applied, in present usage, to persons, and frequently has a more or less sinister or baleful connotation; as, evil deeds, an evil life, the evil eye. "He knew nothing bad about him, but he felt something evil" (Cather). Ill, as a synonym for evil, occurs in modern usage chiefly in a few combinations, such as ill will, ill temper, ill nature. Its chief use is adverbial; as, ill disposed. Wicked implies the actual contravention or violation of moral law; as, "God is angry with the wicked every day" (Psalms vii. 11); wicked designs. It is sometimes used with weakened, even jocular, force. "You are the wickedest witty person I know" (Lytton). Naughty was once serious ("A most vile flagitious man, a sorry and naughty governor as could be"—Barrow) but is now trivial in its application. Most commonly it implies mischievousness on the part of a child too young to have any or a very lively sense of right and wrong. "Charles never was a naughty boy. He never robbed birds' nests, or smoked behind the barn, or played marbles on Sunday" (Deland). Sometimes it expresses charitable censure of a person of responsible age who has done wrong, or is applied to what is amusingly risqué. "It was only one naughty woman out of the world. The clergyman of the parish didn't refuse to give her decent burial" (Meredith). "Euphrosyne... had neglected the study of the lives of the saints, and turned her attention to the naughty reading in the Greek classics" (G. Finlay).

Ana. Iniquitous, *vicious, villainous: *base, low, vile. *immoral, unmoral, amoral.

Ant. Good. — Con. Righteous, virtuous, *moral, ethical, noble.

2 Bad, poor, wrong come into comparison only in their most general senses when they mean not measuring up to a standard of what is satisfactory. Bad (as opposed to good) implies a failure to meet one's approval; it may or may not imply positive condemnation, but it always suggests that the thing so described falls below the mark or is not up to what one would call good; as, he is a bad correspondent; her handwriting is very bad; it's a bad day for a long walk. In richer use it often also implies positive harmfulness; as, a bad light for the eyes; bad food for the young; a bad book for a depressed person; a bad environment; it is bad for her to live alone. Sometimes it suggests corruption, pollution, or the like; as, this meat is bad; bad air; bad water. Often also it may suggest unpleasantness in any degree, in this sense ranging from that which is merely displeasing to that which is offensive, or painful, or a cause of unhappiness; as, it leaves a bad taste in the mouth; to have bad news; a bad prospect; he always comforted himself when things were bad by thinking how much worse they might have been. Poor (also as opposed to good) also implies a failure to reach a satisfactory point, but it usually imputes to the thing so described a deficiency in amount or in returns, or a lack of a quality or qualities essential to excellence; thus, a poor crop is one that is relatively scanty; poor land is wanting in fertility; a poor book may be devoid of interest or artistic quality; a poor carpenter is one lacking in skill; so, business was poor this year; a poor dancer; poor bread; a poor return for one's effort. Wrong (as opposed to right) in all of its senses (see FALSE) implies a failure to conform to a strict standard: as here compared, it suggests deviation from a standard of what is satisfactory or, more specifically, fit, appropriate, proper, orderly, or the like; as, I know that something is wrong with this suit; do not make a wrong choice in selecting your profession; to hang a picture in the wrong light; there is nothing wrong in this arrangement of the furniture.

Ant. Good. — Con. Excellent, perfect, meritorious (see corresponding nouns at EXCELLENCE): right (see GOOD).

badge. *Sign, token, mark, note, symptom.

badger, v. *Bait, hound, chevy, hector, ride, heckle.

Ana. *Annoy, vex, bother, irk: harass, harry, *worry, pester, plague, tease.

badinage. Badinage, persiflage, railery agree in denoting a kind of banter. Badinage is applied to banter that is playful and delicate, persiflage to that which is derisive but not cutting, and railery to that which is keen and often sarcastic in its ridicule. "Love... permits itself even gentle mocking and friendly badinage" (Mrs. H. Ward). "I have the fresh and charming letter she wrote to her husband on the occasion... with a trace of gay persiflage of all the old people at Sudbury and their meeting-house" (H. Ellis). "A company in which you have been galled by the railery of some wag by profession" (J. Beresford).

Ana. Bantering or banter, chaffing, rallying, kidding, joshing, jollyng (see corresponding verbs at BANTER): *fun, game, jest, sport.

badlands. *Waste, desert, wilderness.

baffle. Balk, circumvent, outwit, foil, thwart, *frustrate.

Ana. *Puzzle, mystify, confound, dumfound: discomfit, rattle, faze, *embarrass, disconcert: *confuse, addle, muddle, bemuddle: *hamper, fetter, hog-tie: *hinder, impede, obstruct, block.

bag, n. Bag, sack, pouch are general terms denoting a container made of a flexible material such as paper, cloth, or leather, and open or opening at the top. Bag is the widest in its range of application for it is referable to anything that comes under this general description and is used to hold something; as, a money bag; a traveling bag; a paper bag; a trapper's bag; a saddlebag; a mail bag. It is also referable to such a container and its contents; as, a bag of flour; a bag of money; a bag of game. Sack is usually more restricted in its application than bag: within these limits, however, the terms are interchangeable. For sack commonly suggests oblong shape, a coarse material and, often, crude workmanship; as, a gunny sack; a paper sack; flour sacks. It is probably more often used than bag when it refers to containers and their contents being stored, marketed, transported, or the like; as, to deliver 1000 sacks of grain; sacks of potatoes; to sell coal in sacks. Pouch is applied chiefly to a small bag which is carried on the person or in the hand and which serves as a substitute for a pocket. In current use, it specifically designates a bag or sack that is opened or closed by means of a gathering string, zipper, or the like; as, a tobacco pouch; a pouch for bullets; a pouch-shaped handbag; a mail pouch.

bag, v. Capture, trap, snare, entrap, ensnare, *catch, nab, cop.

baggage, n. 1 Baggage, luggage, impedimenta come into comparison as denoting the trunks, valises, etc., containing personal effects, carried by one who is traveling, or transported for him in a railway train or other conveyance (as in a baggage car, a luggage van). Baggage is the usual term in the United States and in Canada, and luggage in Great Britain. However, baggage is occasionally used in Great Britain in its older sense of army equipment that is being moved (in a baggage, or supply, train), and luggage is coming into common use in the United States as a collective term for trunks, valises, suitcases, and the like, thought of as merchandise, and not as filled containers of personal property. Impedimenta is used humorously in all English-speaking countries for baggage or luggage regarded as an encumbrance; it is, however, the technical military term for baggage as the entire equipment of a moving army.

2 Minx, hussy, *wench.

bail, n. Bond, surety, security, *guarantee, guaranty.

bail or bale, v. Lade, *dip, ladle, scoop, spoon, dish.

bailiff. 1 Agent, factor, *steward, reeve, seneschal, major-domo, oeconomus.

2 Constable, catchpole, officer, *policeman, bobby, peeler, copper, cop, bull.

balliwick. Province, domain, territory, *field, sphere.

bait, n. *Lure, snare, trap, decoy.

Ana. Allurement, attraction (see corresponding verbs at ATTRACT): enticement, temptation (see corresponding verbs at LURE).

bait, v. Bait, badger, heckle, hector, chevy (also chivy or chivvy), hound, ride agree in meaning to torment or harass another person by efforts to break him down. Bait derives its implications from its original and still frequent reference to the action of dogs set on to bite and worry an animal such as a chained bear, boar, or bull. Both in this and in extended use it suggests wanton cruelty or malicious delight in persecution. "A stone post ... to which the oxen had formerly been tied for baiting with dogs to make them tender before they were killed in the adjoining shambles" (Hardy). "The diversion of baiting an author has the sanction of all ages" (Johnson). Badger is more specific than bait. Literally it means to bait a badger that has been trapped in a hole or barrel and can neither escape nor adequately defend himself from attack; in extended use as referred to persons, it implies pestering or persecuting that drives the victim into a hopelessly confused or frenzied state of mind; as, to badger a witness being cross-examined. "I'm so pressed and badgered, I don't know where to turn" (Thackeray).

Heckle implies persistent questioning of a speaker (as a candidate for election, or a legislator discussing a bill before the house, or a person advocating or condemning a movement or cause) and an attempt to bring out his weaknesses or to destroy the effect of his argument. In current use it carries a weaker implication of catechizing than formerly, and suggests an intent to harass and confuse a speaker by frequent interruptions and by inconvenient or embarrassing questions; as, the advocates of any unpopular cause must learn to endure heckling; British legislators are more accustomed than American legislators to being heckled. Hector always carries a suggestion of bullying, but its original implication of brutality or intimidation has grown increasingly weaker and the implication of spirit-breaking scolding or of maddening domineering treatment has taken its place. "We are . . . not to be heced, and bullied, and beat into compliance" (Fielding). "They had hard times when they were little . . . and were heced and worried when they ought to have been taking some comfort" (H. B. Stowe). "Mrs. Morel shifted in her chair, angry with him [her son] for his hced" (D. H. Lawrence). Chevy (a predominantly English word) and hound both stress relentless chasing and pursuing. Chevy, however, often also suggests teasing or annoying past the endurance of the victim (as, he was so chevied by the older boys that he ran away from school), and hound implies persistent and long-continued persecution till the tormentor's end is achieved or the victim acknowledges himself defeated; as, he was hounded by reporters until he made his stand known. "Grandfather had been hounded out of his congregation because he couldn't hold her to their standards of behavior for a minister's wife" (M. Austin). Ride often carries a step further its earlier meaning of to ride hard or exhaust, so that it not only suggests reference to a horse or idea, but also to a person. In such use, which is chiefly colloquial, it implies persistent goading, pricking, or spurring, as by criticism, ridicule, or onerous impositions; as, a hard taskmaster rides those who serve him; he was ridden so hard by the coach that he was no longer fit to remain on the team.

Ana. *Worry, annoy, harass, harry: torment, rack, torture, try, *afflict.

bake, v. 1 Bake, roast, broil, grill, barbecue come into comparison as meaning to cook by exposure to dry heat. Bake implies cooking in an oven or a similar enclosure with heated sides or walls so that the surfaces of the food are browned or toasted and the inside is thoroughly cooked but not hardened; as, to bake a cake, a fish, a pie, sausages, beans, a custard, a soufflé. Bake is also used of batters or soft mixtures that are quickly cooked on a hot griddle, usually without fat, and turned as soon as brown on one side; as, to bake pancakes or scones. Roast originally implied and still often implies exposure to an open fire or flame or other form of radiant heat; as, to roast chicken on a spit; to roast ears of corn. However, it now more often implies oven cooking, but at a heat intense enough to cook the surfaces so quickly that the juices are in part imprisoned and the natural flavor is retained; it often also connotes basting with the juices that have escaped; hence, it is more often used of meats than bake, which usually connotes more or less drying of the insides; as, to roast beef or lamb. It is also used of foods susceptible of being cooked in a bed of hot ashes, sand, stones, and the like, such as potatoes or apples. Roast is idiomatically used of coffee berries, chestnuts, and the like, which are cooked quickly, often in revolving ovens, so as to bring out flavors not apparent in their green state. Broil implies exposure to fire, as to hot coals, a flame, or other form of radiant heat, or rapid cooking on a grill or gridiron, so as to give very brown surfaces and juicy insides. The word is occasionally used without connoting use of radiant heat but these instances are few and commonly imply the use of a very hot, often red-hot, griddle or spider. Broil is used chiefly in reference to meats, fish, and the like, that come in slices, steaks, or slabs; as, to broil a chop or chicken in preference to frying it; to broil tomatoes; to broil mushrooms. Grill (as here compared: see AFFLICT), a close synonym of broil, is now often preferred to broil in modern use when it is the intention to imply cooking over hot coals on a grill or gridiron; as, to grill a steak; to grill a cutlet. Barbecue usually suggests roasting or grilling of an entire carcass or of a large portion or large pieces of it before an open fire, on a gridiron or revolving spit, or in a trench: in modern use basting with a highly seasoned sauce made with vinegar is also usually implied; as, to barbecue a hog or an ox.

2 Parch, *dry, desiccate, dehydrate.

balance, n. 1 Balance, scale (or scales) come into comparison when they mean a device for weighing ponderable things. Balance usually suggests the primitive instrument with a beam or lever supported exactly in the middle, and carrying at either end a suspended dish or pan (a scale), each of which is exactly the same weight as the other. When a weight is put into one pan, the other rises and is not again brought to its normal horizontal position until something that is of equal weight is put into it. The forms of balances have changed much in the course of time, but whatever form is indicated by the word, the term implies an equalization of a pull on one side and a pull on the other, with resulting equilibrium and rest. Scale (etymologically, a cup or bowl), or the more frequent scales, though originally applied to the pan (or pans) of a balance, and later to the balance itself, is now more often used of an apparatus for discovering the exact weight of a thing (rather than for finding its equivalent in weight). This apparatus usually has only one dish, pan, or, for larger things, platform, in or on which the thing to be weighed is placed. In some cases, it has a visible beam which is inscribed with a graduated scale (see SCALE, n.) of weights, and which drops slightly when a sliding weight, or poise, drawn across it reaches the figure which shows the exact weight. In other forms no mechanism is visible, the weight of that on the platform or in the pan being indicated by a hand pointing to a figure on a dial. Since both of these types of instrument are in common use today, scales is now more often employed than balance except in their extended senses. When the idea of weighing or evaluating one thing in terms of another is emphasized, balance is the preferred word; when that of determining the exact value or importance of a thing or the exact point as in a course, development, or the like, where there is neither excess nor deficiency or where the odds are for or against a thing, or where change occurs and an issue is determined, scale or scales is the preferred word. This is evident in idiomatic expressions; as, he was weighed in the balance (not scales) and found wanting (compare the original: "Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting."—Daniel v. 27); that one word was sufficient to turn the scale (or scales: but not balance) in his favor. "Poetic Justice, with her lifted scale, Where, in nice balance, truth with gold she weighs, And solid pudding against empty praise" (Pope). "Let none presume to measure the irregularities of Michael Angelo or Socrates by village scales" (Emerson).

2 Balance, equilibrium, equipoise, poise, tension come into comparison when they denote the stability or the efficiency which results from the equalization or the exact adjustment of two or more opposing or opposite forces affecting a thing. Balance implies a state in which no one part, element, factor, or influence overweighs another or is out of due proportion to the others. It therefore suggests a steadiness or well-being that is usually not outwardly evident until a disturbance occurs, as by a maladjustment of weight or energy or by a change in the due proportions; thus, a man loses his balance and falls when by slipping on the ice his weight is shifted and his legs no longer support him; one's mental balance depends not only on not allowing one's emotions or imagination to get the better of one's reason, but also on one's ability to keep all three powers working effectively in co-operation with each other; a balance of power is said to exist among neighboring nations or groups of allied nations when no one nation or group is decidedly stronger (especially in a military sense) than any of the others. "Can we spoil the balance [between negative and positive electricities]? Indeed we can! That is precisely what we are doing by rubbing amber on cloth. We rub some of the negative electrons out of the cloth and into the amber" (Karl K. Darrow). Equilibrium is often used interchangeably with balance when the latter implies equality in weight or energy of forces that exert a pull on each other. Equilibrium, however, has a different range of application and is often more restricted in its implications. Except when it denotes a mental characteristic it commonly suggests a mechanically produced or producible, rather than an organic or inherent, property which is dependent either on a thing's shape or construction with reference to its resistance to pressure, strain, or stress, or on a thing's support with reference to its center of gravity or to conditions in its supporting medium (air, water, etc.). The term also implies, as balance does not, a tendency to return to the original position after a disturbance or displacement, or the extent to which this tendency exists; hence, when displacement is suggested, stable equilibrium implies power of recovery, unstable equilibrium, the tendency to move further from its original position, and neutral equilibrium, the remaining in equilibrium despite a change of position. Thus, a naval architect must give thought in designing to the ship's equilibrium (that is, not only to its ability to move on even keel through the water, but also to its ability to regain its position when buffeted by heavy seas); a flying airplane maintains its equilibrium so long as there is fuel to propel it and there is sufficient support from the pressure of air or wind against its wings; a knife may be held aloft by some slight support, such as a pencil, without losing its equilibrium if its center of gravity rests on the support. Equipoise usually implies either perfection of balance or stability of equilibrium; as, in a properly constructed girder there are two strains, tension and compression, which, because of their equipoise, offset each other; in an ideal democracy, the executive, legislative, and judicial powers are held in equipoise. "By Art alone can true harmony in human affairs be fostered, true Proportion revealed, and true Equipoise preserved" (Galsworthy). "There is here [in Marvell's poetry] an equipoise, a balance and proportion of tones, which, while it cannot raise Marvell to the level of Dryden or Milton, extorts an approval which these poets do not receive from us" (T. S. Eliot). Poise, as here compared (see also TACT), is a shortening of the phrase equal or even poise, which denoted equality of poise (that is, of weight, which is a pull downward) of two opposed or different things. In current use, equipoise names the quality characteristic of something which maintains its equilibrium or balance, and poise names the state (often temporary) or the appearance of perfect equilibrium or balance. Poise therefore often suggests suspension, or seeming suspension, of motion or effort; as, the poise of a gull in its flight. "The Central Powers, which hold the lasting Orbs [the celestial bodies] in their just Poise" (Shafesbury). "No trepidation... should imperil from its poise The ball o' the world" (Browning). Poise is also preferable to equipoise when mental equilibrium is implied and the emphasis is upon the state of mind rather than on the mental characteristic. "Dreadful things should not be known to young people until they are old enough to face them with a certain poise" (B. Russell). Tension in this, its least common sense, as in its other sense (see STRESS, 1), implies strain—either a pull from both ends or outward pressure in every direction. It comes into comparison with words of this group only when it implies such equality in the force of the pulls or outward pressures that there is tautness without danger of breaking apart or there is expansion to the limit without undue strain at any one point. Oftentimes tension, when it is used with these implications, is modified by proper, due, or a similar word; however, it is employed with increasing frequency without such a qualifier with the same meaning; as, the warp threads on the loom must be held in tension; in a healthy living cell, the cell wall is in a state of tension. In extended use, tension is often employed in reference to a mental or spiritual condition in which opposing or opposite powers, or qualities, or moods, are not only balanced but have full play. Tension in this sense implies far more vitality, tone, and energy than balance. "The youthful intellect is thus held in full tension, and its developing energy directed into all sorts of new channels" (H. Ellis). "In letting the whole physical system lose tone for lack of the tension which gayety imparts" (Brownell). "Faraday's first great characteristic was his trust in facts, and his second his imagination. . . . it was because . . . they were held together in vital tension that he became so potent an instrument of research into Nature's secrets" (H. Ellis).

3 *Symmetry, proportion, harmony.

4 *Remainder, rest, residue, residuum, leavings, remnant, remains, relics.

balance, v. 1 Counterpoise, counterbalance, *compensate, countervail, offset.

Ana. Attune, *harmonize, tune: correspond, accord, square, *agree.

2 Poise, ballast, trim, *stabilize, steady.

Ana. Settle, firm, *set: waver, sway, oscillate, fluctuate (see SWING): rock, *shake.

Con. *Overturn, upset, capsize: *tip, tilt, cant, careen, list, heel.

balcony. Balcony, gallery, loggia, veranda (or verandah), piazza, porch, portico, stoop are here compared as denoting a platform, usually with a balustrade, extending from an outside wall of a building and serving either a decorative or utilitarian purpose, or both. The words are not commonly used with precision, and some historically incorrect applications are now so firmly established in various localities that they have been accepted as good, though not the best, usage. It is the intent of this article only to indicate the applications which meet approval on historical and architectural grounds, so far as these can be determined. Balcony is applicable to any such structure, large or small, which is unroofed, supported by brackets, corbels, consoles, or the like, and enclosed by a balustrade or railing; thus, a balcony may be outside a window or a door, or it may extend along the front or side, or part of the front or side of a building.

The term usually implies elevation. Gallery here, as in all of its senses (see PASSAGE, MUSEUM), connotes length and narrowness. It may be applied to a long narrow balcony extending along an outer wall, but it is also applied to a similar structure that has a roof upheld by pillars or columns and is supported on projecting members such as brackets, or on a foundation as of stone, bricks, or wood. Gallery, unlike balcony, does not invariably suggest openness on three sides; a gallery may be in a wall's recess and open only at the front. Loggia, in technical architectural use, is applied only to a balcony or a covered gallery that is an integral part of a building's design or an essential decorative feature. In current nontechnical use, it is applied chiefly to such a structure in a magnificent or pretentious house, which is used for out-of-door living in mild or warm weather, whether or not it is technically describable as a balcony or gallery. The approved term for a covered out-of-door structure attached to a house, open to the air except on one or two sides, often protected by screens or lattices, and used as though it were a living room, is veranda. Except in certain localities, this term carries none of the definite implications of shape, construction, placing, or the like, which are so strong in nearly all the other words of this group but it commonly suggests openness, airiness, and suitability for out-of-door living. Piazza is often loosely applied, especially in the English-speaking parts of the Western Hemisphere, to a veranda. Historically, the word means an open square in a city, often one surrounded by important buildings, such as in European cities a church, a hall of justice, a palace, and the like. Porch is also used loosely in place of veranda; in strict use, however, a porch is a roofed entrance to a building more or less open at the sides, but designed chiefly for the protection from the weather of those who are entering or leaving a building. Such porches are characteristic of some of the older churches in Great Britain, France, and other European countries, their place often being taken in modern churches by vestibules (in some localities called porches); they are also common in house construction, especially in countries having rainy or wintry seasons; thus, a front, side, or back porch leads to a front, side, or back door. Because porch in sun porch and sleeping porch does not imply entrance from without, these structures are by some preferably called verandas. Portico, like porch, suggests a structure before an entrance; the term, however, is applied chiefly to a gallerylike colonnade which fronts a building in a classic style of architecture and which serves chiefly as an ambulatory. Stoop, which is of Dutch origin, was originally used in and around New York City and is now used elsewhere to designate a small porch, flanked by seats or benches, at the entrance to a house; it is now also applied to any platform, at the entrance to a house, which one ascends by a step or two, or more often by a flight of steps (as in houses having a high basement); as, rows of brownstone houses with high stoops.

bald. *Bare, barren, naked, nude.

Ana. Austere, *severe: unembellished, unadorned, unornamented (see affirmative verbs at ADORN): *colorless, uncolored.

Con. *Ornate, florid.

bale, *n.*¹ *Evil, ill.

Ana. Harm, hurt, *injury, mischief, damage: woe, dole, anguish, *sorrow, grief: *disaster, calamity: misery, *distress, dolor.

Ant. Bliss. — Con. *Happiness, felicity, beatitude, blessedness: joy, *pleasure, delight.

bale, *n.*² *Bundle, package, pack, fardel, parcel, bunch, packet.

bale, v. Variant of BAIL, v.

baleful. Malefic, malign, *sinister.

Ana. Threatening, menacing (see THREATEN): *ominous, portentous, fateful: hellish, *infernal: diabolical, *fiendish, devilish.

Ant. Beneficent. — Con. *Beneficial, advantageous: salutary, wholesome, *healthful: benign, *favorable, propitious, auspicious.

balk, v. 1 *Frustrate, thwart, foil, baffle, circumvent, outwit.

Ana. Defeat, beat, lick, *conquer, overcome: block, obstruct, impede, *hinder: *prevent, forestall.

Ant. Forward. — Con. Further, promote, *advance: abet (see INCITE): assist, aid, *help: *support, uphold, back.

Con. Amenable, docile, tractable, *obedient, biddable: submissive, subdued, *tame.

ball, n. *Sphere, globe, orb.

ballast, v. *Stabilize, steady, balance, trim, poise.

balloon, n. *Aerostat, blimp, dirigible, airship, zeppelin.

ballot, n. Vote, *suffrage, franchise.

ballyhoo, n. *Publicity, promotion, propaganda.

Ana. Advertisement, broadcasting (see under DECLARE).

balm. Balm, salve, emollient, demulcent come into comparison chiefly in their figurative and extended senses rather than in their literal senses, though in the latter they all come under the description of remedies that ease pain and soothe. A balm literally is an aromatic preparation, especially one that cools and refreshes as well as soothes. Hence, in its extended sense, the word is applied to that which delights, refreshes, or comforts almost in the same degree that it relieves. "Sleep... sore labour's bath, Balm of hurt minds" (Shak.). "We are denied the one thing that might heal us and keep us, that might bring balm to the bruised heart" (Wilde). A salve is a waxy or greasy substance applied to sores or wounds, especially (and always in older medical use) to cover and protect them and keep them from becoming painful or inflamed. Figuratively, the term is applied to anything laid on to quiet disturbance, prevent an outbreak or outburst of feeling, or the like. "When mamma asks I will tell," was the salve that he laid upon his conscience" (Kipling). "All your processes of election, your so-called democratic apparatus, are only a blind to the inquiring, a sop to the hungry, a salve to the pride of the rebellious" (Galsworthy). An emollient is a preparation applied to the skin and mucous membranes that are dry, harsh, irritated, and the like, in order to soothe, soften, or sometimes relax, the tissues. Figuratively, it is more often used as an adjective than as a substantive, and it frequently adds to the implication of soothing a hint of enervation. "For the business of poetry... is to set up a sweet denial of the harsh facts that confront all of us—to soothe us in our agonies with emollient words" (Mencken). A demulcent is an oily or mucilaginous substance used on abraded or inflamed mucous membranes as a protective film and a soothing agency. It is not so frequent as the others in figurative use, even as an adjective, but has sometimes been thought of as a counteractant or a salve to acrimony; thus, one who "pours oil on troubled waters" in a controversy may be said to exert a demulcent influence.

Ana. Comfort, solace, consolation (see corresponding verbs at COMFORT): refreshing or refreshment, renewing or renewal, rejuvenation (see corresponding verbs at RENEW).

Ant. Irritant.

balmy. 1 Aromatic, fragrant, *odorous, redolent.

Ana. Refreshing, restoring, rejuvenating (see RENEW): pleasing, grateful, welcome, *pleasant.

Ant. Rank, noisome. — Con. *Malodorous, fetid, stinking, fusty, musty, putrid.

2 *Soft, gentle, bland, mild, lenient.

Ana. Agreeable, *pleasant, gratifying, grateful: gladdening, delighting, rejoicing, regaling (see PLEASE): assuaging, allaying, lightening, relieving (see RELIEVE): salubrious, salutary (see HEALTHFUL).

Con. *Intense, vehement: vexing, bothering or bothersome, irking or irksome, annoying (see corresponding verbs at ANNOY).

bamboozle. Trick, hoodwink, *dupe, gull, hoax, befool.

Ana. Delude, *deceive, beguile, mislead: outwit, circumvent (see FRUSTRATE): defraud, cozen, overreach, *cheat, swindle.

ban, v. 1 Anathematize, curse, damn, objugate, *excommunicate.

Ana. Denounce, condemn, reprobate, censure (see CRITICIZE): *disapprove, deprecate: *malign, asperse, vilify.

Ant. Bless. — Con. Extol, laud, *praise, acclaim: applaud, *commend.

2 Prohibit, *forbid, interdict, inhibit, enjoin.

Ana. Bar, block, *hinder: *prevent, proclude: *exclude, debar, rule out.

Con. Allow, permit, suffer, *let: tolerate, abide, suffer (see BEAR).

banal. Flat, jejune, inane, vapid, wishy-washy, *insipid.

Ana. *Trite, hackneyed: *simple, fatuous, silly, asinine: commonplace, platitudinous, bromide (see corresponding nouns at COMMONPLACE).

Ant. Original: recherché. — Con. Fresh, *new, novel, pithy, terse, succinct (see CONCISE): stimulating or stimulative, provoking or provocative, exciting, piquing (see corresponding verbs at PROVOKE).

band, n. 1 *Bond, tie.

Ana. Connection, link, joining (see corresponding verbs at JOIN): *joint, articulation, suture.

2 *Strip, stripe, ribbon, fillet.

3 Troop, troupe, *company, party.

Ana. Coterie, clique, *set, circle: horde, mob, *crowd: society, club, *association, order.

bandit. *Brigand, highwayman, footpad, marauder.

bandy, v. *Exchange, interchange, swap.

bane. *Poison, venom, virus, toxin.

baneful. *Pernicious, noxious, deleterious, detrimental.

Ana. Harmful, injurious, mischievous, hurtful (see corresponding nouns at INJURY): malign, *sinister, baleful: *poisonous, venomous, toxic.

Ant. Beneficial. — Con. Advantageous, profitable (see BENEFICIAL): salutary, wholesome, *healthful.

banish. Banish, exile, expatriate, ostracize, deport, transport, extradite agree in denoting to remove by authority or force from a country, state, or sovereignty. To banish is to compel, by public edict or sentence, to leave a country (which may or may not be one's own) either permanently or for a fixed time, and with or without restriction to a given place. To exile is to banish or cause to remove under constraint from one's own country; it may connote either expulsion by formal sentence or decree or the compulsion of circumstances and an enforced absence, or sometimes, prolonged voluntary absence. Thus, Russians and foreigners alike may be banished from Russia, but only Russians exiled to Siberia; Dante was banished from his native Florence because of political troubles, but he exiled himself for the rest of his life as a protest against conditions there. Expatriate differs from exile sometimes in its implication of loss of citizenship in one's own country (as, to expatriate Jews from Germany), oftener in its implication of voluntary exile or naturalization in another country (as, Henry James expatriated himself). Exile often suggests a possibility of return with full rights to one's own country; expatriate, however, may imply, but often does not, the exclusion of that possibility. To ostracize, historically, was to banish temporarily and by popular vote from any one of certain cities in ancient Greece a person considered dangerous to the state. The term is now chiefly used in an extended sense which implies not expatriation, but a forced exclusion, by common consent, from recognition or acceptance by society; the society implied is usually, but not invariably, that which is comprised of the social circle or group of social circles leading a life marked by leisure and devotion to pleasure and fashionable sports; as, since his downfall, he has been completely ostracized. To deport is to send a person out of a country of which he is not a citizen, either because his presence is considered inimical to the public welfare or because he has not lawfully entered that country. It often, but not necessarily, implies return to the country of which the deported person is a citizen or subject, or from which he has emigrated, especially if he is without funds to go where he chooses. To transport, as here compared, is to banish to a penal colony or the like a person convicted of a crime; as, convicts were transported to Australia. To extradite is to deport an alleged criminal at the request of the sovereignty or state having jurisdiction to try the charge; as, the United States refused to extradite certain persons on the ground that they were allegedly guilty of political offenses which are not extraditable; the escaped prisoner was extradited by the State of Illinois at the request of the State of Georgia.

Ana. *Eject, expel, oust: *exclude, debar, eliminate, shut out.

Con. Admit, *receive, accept: *harbor, shelter, entertain: protect, shield (see DEFEND).

bank, n. 1 Embankment, terrace, *mound, dune, tumulus, barrow.

2 *Shoal, bar, reef.

3 *Shore, ripa, strand, coast, beach, foreshore, littoral.

4 Mass, heap, pile, stack, shock, cock. See under HEAP, v.

Ana. *Aggregate, aggregation, conglomerate, conglomeration: assemblage, assembly, collection, gathering (see under GATHER).

bank, v. 1 Mass, *heap, pile, stack, shock, cock.

Ana. Collect, assemble, *gather.

Con. *Scatter, disperse.

bank, v. 2 *Rely, count, reckon, trust, depend.

bankrupt, adj. Insolvent (see under INSOLVENCY).

bankrupt, v. Impoverish, exhaust, *deplete, drain.

Ana. Denude, *strip, bare: sap, cripple, disable, undermine (see WEAKEN).

banner, n. *Flag, standard, ensign, color, streamer, pennant, pennon, jack.

banner, adj. Pre-eminent, incomparable, superlative, surpassing, peerless, *supreme, transcendent.

Ana. Paramount, *dominant, predominant, sovereign:

outstanding, salient, signal (see NOTICEABLE).

banquet, n. Banquet, dinner are here compared only with reference to the propriety of their use in designating an elaborate meal (usually an evening meal) for the entertainment of guests, the members of an association, or the like. The choice of banquet in designating such a meal has frequently been criticized, the preference being given to dinner. Not only current good use but good usage in the past justifies the employing of banquet when there is the intent to suggest the sumptuousness of the meal, the magnificence of its setting, and often, the ceremonial character of the entertainment. Only in some American use is it thought of as a dinner held in a more or less public place, such as a hotel or an auditorium, and followed by speechmaking. "This is the feast that I have bid her to, And this the banquet she shall surfeit on" (Shak.). "Royal Maud... greets most noble Gloucester from her heart, Intreating him, his captains, and brave knights, To grace a banquet" (Keats). "Grandees who give banquets worthy Jove" (Browning). Because of its historical implications, banquet is now used with propriety only as a descriptive term. Dinner is the preferred designation, especially in invitations and in colorless reference to such an affair; as, the president and his wife plan to give several state dinners (not banquets) this season; he is in great demand as a speaker at public dinners; the annual dinner of the Chamber of Commerce.

banshee. Shee, faery, *fairy, fay, goblin.

banter, v. Banter, chaff, rally, quiz, kid, rag, guy, rib, josh, jolly agree in denoting to make fun of good-naturedly. The same distinctions in implications and connotations are found in their corresponding nouns. Typical methods of such funmaking are: reminding one of an actual fault, foible, failure, shortcoming, etc. (sometimes indirectly by bestowal of exaggerated praise obviously remote from the truth); playful imputation of undeserved success; attempting to dupe a person into believing what is untrue (esp., absurdly untrue) in order that one may laugh at his gullibility. Banter is the generic term, and may usually be substituted for any of the others, though not without loss of specificity. "Why didn't you get tipsy, Sir? Don't you ever intoxicate yourself but at lawful marriages?... Ripton endured his bantering that he might hang about Richard" (Meredith). To chaff is to tease with rough banter. "Have you ever been stuck with a horse?... What I resent is the chaff that follows, especially from the boy who stuck me" (Kipling). Rally implies greater keenness and sarcasm, and frequently a poking fun at matters so private as to cause extreme embarrassment or resentment. "He loved his mistress... no one dared... rally him on his weakness" (Shaw). To quiz is usually to banter by asking puzzling or embarrassing questions. "Attacked by the older students... with all sorts of quizzing questions" (C. C. Felton). Kid (slang) is frequently as general in meaning as banter. "He [Édouard Herriot] is very fond of placing his hand on his heart and declaiming about his warm virtues. He gets a lot of kidding for it" (John Gunther). More often than perhaps any other word in this group, however, it specifically implies an attempt at good-natured imposition on one's gullibility; thus, "No kidding?" is a common way of asking "Are you serious?" of one who has made a statement that sounds incredible. "She says he's going to do a portrait of her. I think he's kidding her" (Harper's Mag.). Used with a reflexive pronoun, kid implies a shutting one's eyes to the truth; as, if you think you can avoid hard work and long hours and yet write something memorable, you are just kidding yourself. To rag (slang) is to banter repeatedly or persistently and, often, annoyingly to the victim. "I won't rag you any more, if you'll tell me one thing" (M. Sinclair). "Baiting Penhale became a fashionable pastime... the small boys took up the ragging" (C. Garstin). Guy (colloq.) implies public, vociferous, often concerted, often merciless but nevertheless good-natured, banter. "If you heard all that gang guyin' me you'd think 'twas somethin'" (J. C. Lincoln). Rib (slang) implies bantering under conditions which make it impossible or inadvisable for the butt to retort or defend himself, and also often implies assumed identity, often specifically the enactment of a role, on the part of the ribber; as, high government officials are ribbed in the skits presented yearly before the Gridiron Club in Washington. "Tamara Geva [actress] ribs her fellow Russians as the temperamental ballerina who introduces her equals as her 'supporting cast'" (Time). Josh (slang, U. S.) and esp. jolly (colloq.) imply transparent good humor in the funmaker. Josh usually implies homeliness and unsophistication. "By the conclusion, in Gunch's renowned humorous vein, he was enchanted.... 'I've heard your business has been kind of under the eye of the gov'ment since you stole the tail of Eathorne Park and sold it!' 'Oh, you're a great little *josh*er, Verg'" (Sinc. Lewis). Jolly often implies an ulterior aim, such as putting the person bantered into good humor so that he will grant a favor; as, he was a good salesman who jollied his customers, but not too obviously.

Ana. Twit, rally, deride, *ridicule.

baptize. Baptize, christen agree in meaning to make one a Christian or to admit one to a Christian communion by a ceremony in which water is poured or sprinkled on the head or in which the body is immersed in water. Baptize is the precise term for this ceremony because it implies both the rite and its ends. The term may also be used in reference to infants and adults. Christen is the popular word (originally meaning to convert to Christianity or to make a Christian by baptizing), but for several centuries it has so emphasized the giving of a name, which is in some churches a part of the ceremony of baptism, that it now is used at times without any reference to the religious ceremony and even with reference to inanimate objects which are formally named, often with a ceremony analogous to that of baptism; thus, "the baby has not yet been christened" may mean either "not yet baptized" or "not yet named," though both are commonly implied; to christen a ship is to perform the ceremony of breaking a bottle of wine or other liquid against its sides while pronouncing its name.

bar, n. 1 Bar, barrier, barricade agree in meaning something which hinders or obstructs. As here compared, both bar and barrier apply to that which prevents free communication or passage; more specifically, in their literal uses, bar frequently suggests ingress or egress, barrier, rather advance, progress, or attack, as that to which the obstacle is opposed; as, the bars of a prison, of a gate; a harbor bar; a mountain barrier; to erect dikes as a barrier against the sea; a barrier reef. "Religious myths may come to be a bar to progress in science" (Inge). "A perpetual and impassable barrier... between the white race and the one which they had reduced to slavery" (Ch. Just. Taney). Barrier usually implies greater magnitude or extent than bar. Barricade is rarely used except in the sense of an obstruction thrown across a street or way to check a hostile advance; as, the fighting at the barricades in Paris during the Commune (March-May, 1871).

2 *Obstacle, obstruction, impediment, snag.

Ana. Hindrance, block, dam (see corresponding verbs at HINDER): *difficulty, hardship, vicissitude.

Ant. Advantage. — Con. Odds, edge (see ADVANTAGE): help, aid, assistance (see under HELP, v.).

3 *Shoal, bank, reef.

bar, v. Obstruct, block, dam, impede (see HINDER).

Ana. Shut out, debar, *exclude: *prevent, preclude, obviate: *forbid, prohibit, interdict: *close, shut.

Ant. Admit: open. — Con. Accept, *receive, take.

barbarian, n. *Obscurantist, Philistine.

barbarian, adj. Barbarian, barbarous, barbaric, savage denote in common uncivilized, or characteristic of uncivilized peoples. Barbarian expresses little more than the opposite of civilized. "She [Rome] saw her glories star by star expire, And up the steep, Barbarian monarchs ride" (Byron). "Without what we call our debt to Greece we should have neither our religion nor our philosophy nor our science nor our literature nor our education nor our politics. We should be mere barbarians" (Inge). The noun barbarian is sometimes used in the sense of one whose manners are so rude as to suggest those of an uncivilized person. "He'll grow up a barbarian, with no manners!" (Deland). See barbarian, n. at OBSCURANTIST. Barbarous is frequently used in the sense of barbarian, without further implication; as, "Civilized ages inherit the human nature which was victorious in barbarous ages" (Bagehot). It may also express the harsh and brutal side of uncivilized life; as, barbarous warfare. Barbaric refers to the crudeness of taste and fondness for gorgeous display characteristic of uncivilized peoples. "Or where the gorgeous East with richest hand Showers on her kings barbaric pearl and gold" (Milton). "The whole world seems to be growing increasingly barbaric in this matter of symmetry. I have actually heard the epithet beautiful applied to skyscrapers" (Babbitt). Savage comes into comparison with both barbarian and barbarous, but it usually suggests a more primitive state and less evidence of organizing power than barbarian, and it characteristically implies greater harshness or fierceness than barbarous. "The impossibility of reducing a huge, educated population to the spiritual homogeneity of a savage tribe" (A. Huxley). "With the disappearance of this distinction [between combatants and noncombatants] war becomes pure savagery" (Inge).

Ant. Civilized.

barbaric. *Barbarian, savage, barbarous.

Ana. *Showy, ostentatious: florid, *ornate, flamboyant: *gaudy, garish, flashy, meretricious.

Ant. Restrained: refined: subdued.

barbarism. 1 Barbarism, barbarity are frequently confused. Barbarism is used chiefly of a state of society or of a culture that may be described as barbarian, or as neither savage and crude nor civilized and highly refined. "Outside civilisation the divorce [between science and mysticism] is not found; the savage mystic is also the savage man of science, the priest and the doctor are one. It is so also for the most part in barbarism" (H. Ellis). "The human race... is as yet only a little bit civilized and... in time of serious trouble... has a very strong tendency to stampede back into barbarism" (Lippmann). Barbarity is used chiefly in reference to a temper or to practices that may be described as barbarous, or uncivilized, brutal, and inhumane; as, barbarity seldom equaled by the fiercest of savages; "to mitigate the barbarity of the criminal law" (Inge). Sometimes, however, barbarity denotes a taste that is barbaric; as, "the supposed influence of Seneca on the barbarity of Elizabethan tragedy" (T. S. Eliot).

Ant. Civilization. — Con. *Culture, cultivation, refinement.

2 Impropriety, *solecism.

barbarity. *Barbarism.

Ana. Barbarousness, savagery, ferociousness or ferocity, cruelty, inhumanity (see corresponding adjectives at FERCE).

Ant. Humaneness. — Con. Gentleness, mildness, lenity or leniency (see corresponding adjectives at SOFT).

barbarous. 1 Savage, barbaric, *barbarian.

Ana. *Rough, harsh: untutored, untainted, uneducated, illiterate, *ignorant: *rude, rough, crude.

Ant. Civilized: humane.

2 Savage, inhuman, ferocious, *fierce, cruel, fell, truculent.

Ana. Pitiless, ruthless, uncompassionate (see corresponding nouns at PITY): atrocious, monstrous, *outrageous.

Ant. Clement. — Con. Merciful, *forbearing, tolerant, lenient: *tender, compassionate, sympathetic: humane, humanitarian, benevolent (see CHARITABLE).

barbecue, v. *Bake, roast, broil, grill.

barbette. Parapet, bastion, breastwork, *bulwark, rampart.

bard, n. *Poet, scop, trouvère, scald, minstrel, gleeman, jongleur, troubadour, minnesinger, rhymist, rhymester, versifier, poetaster.

bare, adj. 1 Bare, naked, nude, bald, barren come into comparison when they mean destitute or divested of the naturally or conventionally appropriate covering or clothing. Bare strongly suggests the removal, or often the rejection, of that which is additional, superfluous, dispensable, acquired, or the like; thus, a bare head is one without a hat (especially under circumstances where hats are usually worn); bare legs suggest lack of socks or stockings; bare trees have lost all their leaves; to take one's bare word for a thing is not to ask for anything more, such as confirmation or documentary proof; a bare room has no furniture or, more often, only such furniture as is indispensable. "The bare statement that 'art is useless' is so vague as to be really meaningless, if not inaccurate and misleading" (H. Ellis). Naked suggests absence of all covering, especially in the way of protective or ornamental covering. When used with regard to persons, and implying absence of clothing, the word is not uniform in its pictorial and emotional evocations; it may suggest many conditions, such as a state of nature and of physical beauty, a state of destitution and of pitiful suffering, a state of privacy and of admirable modesty or purity, a state of shameful publicity or of wanton exhibitionism. "Eve... in naked beauty more adorned. More lovely, than Pandora, whom the gods Endowed with all their gifts" (Milton). "Poor naked wretches, wheresoe'er you are, That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm" (Shak.). "'But prove me [Godiva] what it is I would not do.' And from a heart as rough as Esau's hand, He answer'd 'Ride you naked thro' the town'" (Tennyson). In extended use, therefore, naked is preferred to bare when the emphasis is on revelation or exposure, or on the power of revealing or exposing something as it is in its severe outlines or structure, in its plain truth or without disguise, or in its hidden weakness or strength; as, "Craft must have clothes, but truth loves to go naked" (T. Fuller [1654-1734]); "the naked boughs of winter" (Binyon); "It is not asked that poetry should offer naked argument" (Day Lewis); "the power of striking out, in a few naked, simple words, a picture which is ineffaceable" (Loves). Nude and naked are very close synonyms when they are used in reference to persons, but nude, because of its association with the representation of undraped figures in art, tends to suggest little more than the absence of covering and to be comparatively a colorless word with little extended use and with few, if any, significant and distinctive implications.

Because of its unequivocal meaning, nude is preferred to naked when the mere fact of being without clothing is indicated and there is no intent to convey an aesthetic or ethical implication; as, the three nude statues in the exhibition; the residents of the houses along the river objected to nude swimmers. Bald implies absence of a natural covering, originally, and still chiefly, of the hair of the head or, by extension, of foliage, of feathers, or the like. Etymologically, however, the word suggests the conspicuous whiteness of a bald man's head and its lack of color as well as of its natural growth; it is therefore often applied to something white or gray at the top whether it is devoid of its natural covering or not; thus, the bald eagle is the common eagle after it has reached an age when its head and neck feathers are white; a bald tree is one that no longer bears leaves at its top; a bald mountain is one whose peak, usually rocky peak, is bare of vegetation. In extended use, bald implies austere or colorless bareness, a conspicuous absence of qualities that might add charm, vividness, interest, or the like; thus, a bare style is one that indicates economy of means or a meagerness of ornament; a naked style is one that disguises nothing and shows not the slightest obscurity or hesitancy in presenting the thought; a bald style is bare and plain to the point of severity. "His [Wordsworth's] expression may often be called bald...; but it is bald as the bare mountain tops are bald, with a baldness which is full of grandeur" (Arnold). "He was determined to put the case baldly, without vain recrimination or excuse" (E. Wharton). Barren, in this as well as in its more common sense (see STERILE, 1), implies a lack of fertility or productive power. As a synonym of the other words here discussed, it implies an absence of natural or appropriate covering that is the outward sign of impoverishment, impotency, or aridity; hence, barren lands are not only absolutely bare, but they are waste, desolate lands incapable of producing vegetation; a barren style is the style of a person who has not the mind, heart, or imagination to give his style any signs of life or vitality, any coloring of fancy, or the like; so, a barren life; "barren theoretic talk" (C. E. Montague); "the bright and barren stars" (R. Macaulay).

Ana. Stripped, divested, denuded (see STRIP, v.): unclothed, undressed, unrobed (see affirmative verbs at CLOTHE).

Ant. Covered.

2 *Mere.

bare, v. Denude, divest, *strip, dismantle.

Ant. Cover. — Con. *Clothe, dress, apparel, robe, attire: *disguise, cloak, mask, dissemble.

barefaced. Brazen, *shameless, brash, impudent.

Ana. Open, plain, *frank, candid: indecent, unseemly, *indecorous.

Ant. Furtive. — Con. Covert, surreptitious, stealthy, *secret.

barely. Scarcely, *hardly.

bargain, n. *Contract, compact, pact, indenture, mise.

barge, n. Termagant, scold, shrew, vixen, *virago, amazon.

bark, n. *Skin, rind, peel, hide, pelt, fell.

baroque, adj. *Ornate, florid, rococo, flamboyant.

barren. 1 *Sterile, unfruitful, infertile, impotent.

Ant. Fecund. — Con. *Fertile, prolific, fruitful.

2 Bald, *bare, naked, nude.

Ana. Arid, *dry: desolate, forlorn (see ALONE): impoverished, exhausted, depleted (see DEplete): austere, *severe, stern.

barricade, n. Barrier, *bar.

barrier, n. Barricade, *bar.

barrier, n. Lawyer, counselor, counsel, advocate, attorney, solicitor, proctor, procurator.

barrow. Tumulus, *mound, bank, dune, embankment, terrace.

barter, v. Trade, vend, *sell, auction.

Ana. Swap, *exchange, interchange, bandy.

basal. Basic, underlying, *fundamental, substratal, substrative, radical.

base, n. Base, basis, foundation, ground, groundwork agree in meaning something on which another thing is reared or built or by which it is supported or fixed in place. Base, in earliest use, was applied to the lowest part, or bottom, of something and carried no strong implication of purpose as a support or prop (as, at the base of a tree or a mountain); the term soon acquired specific reference to a broad bottom or to a substructure on which a thing rests (or seems to rest) for support, or by which it is kept upright or stable; as, the base of a pyramid; the base of a pillar; the base of a lamp; the base of a triangle; "The Great War shook civilisation to its base" (Inge). In its sense development the word often failed to stress a literal underlying, and so came to apply to something which serves either as a starting point of a development, an operation, or a process (as, a base of operations; a submarine base) or as the essential ingredient of a compound (as, lanolin is the base of many cosmetics; dynamite often has an absorbent base such as sawdust). Basis, like base (its close synonym historically) may be used in reference to something that underlies and supports or to something that serves as a starting point; the term, however, is rarely applied to a physical or material thing; thus, one may speak of the base (but not the basis) of a monument, or of the basis (not the base) for a certain belief; so, implicit trust is the basis of a lasting friendship; to phrase certain questions as a basis for discussion; "Tradition forms a basis for the acquiring of literary taste" (Day Lewis); "Darwinism... cannot be made the basis of a philosophy" (Inge). Foundation, in precise use, usually implies, as base or basis sometimes do not imply, solidity in that which underlies and supports, and fixity or stability in that which is erected on that support; thus, a house always has a base even if it rests directly on the ground, but may properly be said to have a foundation only when it rests on a substructure, such as a wall of stones or bricks, lining an excavation and usually rising above the surface of the ground. A report may be said to have its basis (not foundation) in speculation, but a report that is said to be without foundation has no basis in fact. "Let me pry loose old walls; Let me lift and loosen old foundations" (Sandburg). "As the happiness of the people is the sole end of government, so the consent of the people is the only foundation of it" (John Adams). "How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord, Is laid for your faith in His excellent Word!" (Old Hymn). Ground, in the sense here considered, implies something solid or firm beneath, or a substratum comparable to the earth or ground in its firmness and capacity for support; the term is therefore applied to a material, a substance, a surface, or the like, upon which another thing is built or against which it is displayed; thus, a piece of net may serve as a ground upon which a pattern is worked in lacemaking; before a decorative design is applied to a wall, the ground, or wall surface, must be treated and colored so that it will take the pattern and display it properly (see also ground under REASON). Groundwork is applied not to a substratum, but to a substructure; like foundation, the term suggests something built up before the superstructure is erected, but unlike foundation, it is used chiefly in a figurative sense; as, early training is the groundwork of good habits; to lay a groundwork in college for one's professional studies. "The groundwork of all happiness is health" (Hunt).

Ant. Top. — Con. *Summit, peak, apex.

base, adj. Base, low, vile agree in meaning contemptible because beneath what is expected of the average man. That is base which excites indignation because devoid of all nobility or even of humanity; the term usually implies the setting (as through cowardice or avarice) of self-interest ahead of duty to others. "He is not Talbot's blood, That basely fled when noble Talbot stood" (Shak.). "Peace had brought only the shabby, dispiriting spectacle of Versailles, with its base greeds and timidities" (C. E. Montague). That is low which outrages one's sense of what is decent or proper even for the most ignorant of men. The term, when implying moral contemptibility, often suggests a taking advantage of a person who is helpless or not in a position to defend himself, as by cunning, deceit, or other devious practice; as, no one thought he could be low enough to steal a nickel from a blind beggar's cup. "Whenever a dramatist wished to introduce intrigue, chicanery, or other dirty work, his dramatis personae included a low attorney" (Law Times). Low also is often used of persons, thoughts, language, actions, etc., that strongly offend one's sense of propriety; as, a low mind; "snot" is a low word. "They were low, those sensual feelings; they were ignoble" (A. Huxley). That is vile which is inexpressibly base or low; the word often implies disgusting foulness or depravity. "It was vile indeed to unaccustomed and unhardened senses. Every little habitation... left its own heap of refuse on its own landing, besides flinging other refuse from its own windows" (Dickens). "A place where every vileness of cruelty and lust was practised" (Cather). "The vilest epithet in the English language" (Freeman).

Ana. *Mean, ignoble, abject, sordid; *bad, evil, ill, wicked: ignominious, infamous, disgraceful (see corresponding nouns at DISGRACE).

Ant. Noble. — Con. *Moral, ethical, virtuous, righteous: honorable, *upright, honest, just.

bashful. *Shy, diffident, modest, coy.

Ana. Shrinking, recoiling (see RECOIL, v.): timorous, *timid: embarrassed, abashed (see EMBARRASS).

Ant. Forward: brazen. — Con. Brash, barefaced, impudent, *shameless: bold, intrepid (see BRAVE).

basic. 1 Basal, *fundamental, underlying, substratal, substrative, radical.

Ana. Principal, capital, *chief, main: primordial, *primary.

Ant. Top: peak (wage, price, etc.).

2 *Alkaline.

basal. *Base, foundation, ground, groundwork.

bathysmal. Bathybic, abyssal, pelagic, neritic, marine, oceanic, thalassic, *aquatic, lacustrine, lacuscular, fluvial, fluvatile.

batter, v. Mangle, *maim, mutilate, cripple.

Ana. *Beat, pound, pummel, thrash, buffet, belabor, baste.

battle, n. Battle, engagement, action, push agree in denoting a hostile meeting between opposing military forces. Battle is commonly used of a general and prolonged combat, and is distinguished, therefore, from skirmish, brush, etc. (see ENCOUNTER). Engagement stresses the actual encountering of forces, and may be applied to either a general encounter, as between entire armies, or a minor encounter, as between subdivisions or outposts. Action is often employed today in place of battle or engagement when the stress is on the idea of active, frequently sharp, offensive and defensive operations; as, to clear the warship's decks for action; Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, was killed in action at Lützen, 1632; a brisk action between scouting patrols. "How many gentlemen have you lost in this action?" (Shak.). Push, a slang term, is applied to a strongly organized offensive action in which large numbers of troops participate.

Ana. *Encounter, skirmish, brush: *attack, assault, onslaught, onset: combat, conflict, fight, *contest.

battle, v. War, fight, *contend, cope.

Ana. Combat, *oppose, resist, withstand: *attack, assail, assault, bombard: kick, protest, *object.

bawl out. Rate, berate, tongue-lash, upbraid, *scold, wig, rail, revile, vituperate.

Ana. Reprimand, rebuke, reproach, *reprove, chide: censure, denounce, condemn, reprehend, reprobate (see CRITICIZE).

bay, n. Embrasure, *recess, alcove, nook, niche, cubicle, carrell, carol.

be, v. Be, exist, live, subsist come into comparison only when they mean to have actuality or reality. Be (not considered here as a copula, or a verb expressing a relation between subject and predicate terms) applies to whatever has any place in the realm of things describable as real in a material or immaterial sense (see REAL); only its context makes clear whether it asserts physical or spiritual reality. "To be, or not to be: that is the question" (Shak.). "I think, therefore I am" (transl. from Descartes). "Whatever is, is right" (Pope). "To be, contents his natural desire" (Pope). Exist adds to be the implication of continuance in time; it also commonly implies a place in the realm of things which are describable as entities or as having independent, objective (though not necessarily sensible) being. "A fact which has existed cannot be made never to have existed" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "Everybody saw the drawings of the temples, strange walls and columns, but nobody believed these things existed" (Stark Young). Live, in its primary sense, implies existence in the realm of things which have the character called life, or the inner power manifest in plants and animals to maintain existence for a term, to grow, to perform natural functions, to reproduce their kind, and the like; as, many men live to be threescore and ten; plants cannot live without moisture; whatever lives must have sustenance. Live, however, is often used in an extended sense, as applied to immaterial entities, ideas, and the like; in this use, it often carries a suggestion of qualities associated with life, such as persistent existence, vigor, activity, and development; as, his name will live as long as his country lives; poems that live; a living church. Subsist may be used in place of be, or exist, or live, because it may imply the kind of reality or actuality connoted by one of those terms, but it always additionally suggests a relation to or dependence on something; thus, a thing that subsists by itself (or is self-subsistent) is not dependent on anything outside of itself and is independent and self-contained; an idea subsists, or maintains its existence, only so long as it appeals to the mind of thinking men. "Those secret distributions without which the body cannot subsist in its vigor" (Addison). In current philosophical use, subsist is used often in reference to purely mental conceptions, and implies logical validity or the character of being true or logically conceivable. "The round square does not subsist" is just as true as 'the present King of France does not exist'" (B. Russell).

beach, n. Strand, coast, foreshore, *shore, bank, ripa, littoral.

beachcomber. Comber, breaker, roller, billow, *wave, undulation, ripple.

beak. *Bill, nib.

beam, n. *Ray.

Ana. Flash, gleam, glint, scintillation, coruscation (see corresponding verbs at FLASH).

beaming, adj. Beamy, radiant, refulgent, effulgent, *bright, brilliant, luminous, lustrous, lambent, lucent.

Ana. Flashing, gleaming, glittering, glistening, glinting, sparkling, coruscating, scintillating (see FLASH, v.): glowing, flaming (see BLAZE, v.).

beamy. Beaming, radiant, refulgent, effulgent, brilliant, *bright, luminous, lustrous, lambent, lucent.

Ana. See those at BEAMING.

bear, v. 1 *Carry, convey, transport, transmit.

Ana. *Move, remove, shift, transfer: hold, *contain.

2 Bear, produce, yield, turn out come into comparison when they mean to bring forth as products. Bear usually implies a giving birth to offspring or a bringing of fruit to maturity, though it may be used somewhat figuratively in reference to something which tends to reproduce itself or to aid reproduction, such as the earth, a seed, money, or the like; as, she bore three children; the apple trees bear (i.e., bear fruit) every year; the soil is not rich enough to bear crops; the seed he sowed bore fruit; the deposit bears a low interest. Produce is far wider in its range of application, for it, unlike bear, carries no clear implication of a carrying during a period of development prior to the bringing forth; hence, it may be used in the widest sense of bring forth as by human or natural agency (as, he produced the book for his friends' inspection; nobody could produce the desired witness) and, as here especially considered, in the narrow sense of bringing forth as issue of one's body, one's mind, one's imagination, or as an output of labor or effort; as, it is necessary for the colleges to produce straight thinkers; the tree will produce no fruit this year; the plantation produces a vast amount of cotton; the factory produces more shoes than ever; Raphael produced an unusual number of widely known paintings; he feels he can never produce another book as good as the one he has just written; the glands produce secretions. "A plough is useful because it breaks up the ground. But breaking up the ground is... merely useful because it enables seed to be sown. This is useful because it produces grain, which is useful because it produces bread" (B. Russell). Yield (as here compared: see also RELINQUISH, YIELD) fundamentally implies a giving out, as of something within the confines of a thing or within one's power of production; it therefore stresses the outcome, result, return, reward, or the like, and not the previous effort or endurance; as, "The utmost care could not always secure the most valuable fruits. The pinery [i.e., a pineapple hothouse] had yielded only one hundred in the last year" (Austen); (cf. the annual yield of a field, orchard, tree, etc.); "two kinds of classics... those that yield their meaning at the first encounter and those that we have to discover by effort and insight" (Van W. Brooks); "The discovery of... its [calcium carbide's] reaction with ordinary water to yield a highly flammable gas, acetylene" (A. C. Morrison). Turn out, like yield, stresses the outcome or result, but it always implies previous labor or effort; as, the company promises to turn out 300 airplanes a month; "the main object is to turn out good Englishmen" (Inge).

Ana. Reproduce, propagate, breed, *generate.

3 Bear, suffer, endure, abide, tolerate, stand, brook, agree in denoting to sustain something trying or painful. Bear and suffer are also synonyms in their more comprehensive denotation to sustain whatever is imposed; as, this theory will bear examination; the stone suffers no alteration in a colder climate. Both verbs, however, are more often used in their specific senses because of their customary reference, in the case of bear, to things that are heavy or difficult, or, in the case of suffer, to things that are painful or injurious. Bear suggests more the power to sustain than the manner in which something is sustained; as, water as hot as one can bear it; to bear the brunt of battle; to bear affliction. Suffer more often implies acceptance of infliction than it implies patience or courage in bearing; as, to suffer fools gladly. "Authority... like that of a captain of a football team, which is suffered voluntarily in order to achieve a common purpose" (B. Russell). Endure and abide, in precise use, refer to long-continued trials or sufferings borne without giving in. Endure usually connotes stamina or firmness of mind; abide, patience and submission. "I am able now, methinks... To endure more miseries and greater far" (Shak.). "What fates impose, that men must needs abide" (Shak.). Tolerate and stand (the more colloquial term) imply overcoming one's own resistance to that which is distasteful or antagonistic. Tolerate often connotes failure to resist through indifference or, sometimes, through a desire for peace or harmony; as, to tolerate differences in opinion. "Archer's New York tolerated hypocrisy in private relations; but in business matters it exacted... impeccable honesty" (E. Wharton). Stand is often used in place of bear, but distinctively it implies the ability to keep from flinching; as, he can stand teasing; he stood the attack well. Brook, now rather literary and chiefly in negative constructions, implies self-assertion and defiance. "Restraint she will not brook" (Milton). The other verbs are also used commonly in negative clauses but with weakened emphasis; as, I cannot bear him, suffer him, endure him. In such constructions, bear (with the negative) commonly implies dislike, suffer rejection, endure intolerance, abide impatience, tolerate contempt, and stand repugnance.

Ana. Accept, *receive: *take, assume: *afflict, try, torment, torture.

4 Bear, relate, pertain, appertain, belong, apply come into comparison in their intransitive use when they mean to have a connection, especially a logical connection. One thing bears on or upon another thing when the former touches so directly upon the latter thing (usually something in question) as to carry appreciable weight in its solution or in the understanding of issues it involves; as, to ignore all facts except those that bear upon this particular case; this situation bears directly upon the question under discussion. One thing relates to another thing when the former has some connection with the latter which permits, or more often, requires, them to be considered together with reference to their effect upon each other. The connection implied is usually closer in the intransitive than in the transitive verb (see JOIN).

being commonly one of dependence or interdependence; as, in an organism each part relates to every other part; to show how the demand relates to the supply; an incident relates to the plot; a detail in a painting relates to the design of the whole. "The duties of the citizen, as he [T. Roosevelt] understood them, related not only to acts, but also to thoughts" (Mencken). One thing pertains or appertains to another when the former has any connection with the latter that permits their association in practice or thought. Both of these words are more widely applicable than bear and relate, for they cover not only the connections specifically implied in those words but others, such as those close connections implied by belong, and those remote connections implied by have to do with; thus, the things that pertain to happiness are all the things that can be thought of as causing happiness, contributing to it, preventing it, affecting its quality, and the like; moral philosophy is the branch of philosophy that deals with all problems pertaining to morals or ethics. Pertain more often implies a necessary connection or a very close relation than the more formal appertain, which commonly suggests an incidental or acquired connection; as, "a... faithful high priest in things pertaining to God" (Hebrews ii. 17); "It appertaineth to the discipline of the church, that enquiry be made of evil Ministers" (Bk. of Com. Prayer); "the crown And all wide-stretched honours that pertain By custom and the ordinance of times Unto the crown of France" (Shak.); "To that simple object appertains a story" (Wordsworth). One thing belongs to another thing when the former is a part or element without which the latter can not exist, function, have its true character or being, or the like. In this widest sense, a thing that belongs is a property, an attribute, a duty, a proper concern, or the like; as, "the Government of the United States... does not possess all the powers which usually belong to the sovereignty of a nation" (Ch. Just. Taney); "Nor does value belong to what concerns man only" (S. Alexander); "this comparative slightness [of Chinese and Japanese paintings] belongs... to the character of the medium and the fragility of the material employed" (Binyon). But belong also may be used of things as they pertain to persons, then implying possession (as, the watch belongs to James; this land belongs to the government) or, in colloquial use, of persons with reference to their qualifications for fitting into a group, especially a social group (as, "She's smart and jolly and everything, but she just doesn't belong"—E. Ferber). One thing applies to another thing when the former (a law, a principle, a rule, a theory, a general term) covers the latter (a specific instance), usually also explaining, interpreting, or describing it or having some clear bearing upon it. "The rules of addition apply to our debts as rigorously as to our assets" (W. James). "He really was the one child to whom the 'spare-the-rod' precept did not apply—he was naturally good" (Deland).

Ana. *Concern, affect: touch, influence, *affect: weigh (see DEPRESS).

bearing, n. Bearing, deportment, demeanor (or demeanour), mien, manner, carriage, port, presence, front come into comparison when they denote the way in which, or the quality by which, a person outwardly manifests his personality and breeding. Bearing is the most general of these words for it may imply reference to a person's mental attitude to others, his conduct in society, or, especially in current use, his characteristic posture or way of holding himself. "If 'twere so, She could not sway her house, command her followers... With such a smooth, discreet and stable bearing" (Shak.). "Verinder's bearing toward strangers is apt to be brutal"

(Quiller-Couch). " 'You should have seen him as a young man,' she cried...drawing herself up to imitate her husband's once handsome bearing" (D. H. Lawrence). Deportment applies especially to a person's actions in their relations to the external, often conventional, amenities of life; it so strongly suggests the influence of breeding or training that in current educational use it often means little more than behavior; as, lessons in deportment; the boy was rated 90 in deportment. "There is [now] little, in dress and outward deportment, to distinguish a Quaker from other people" (Inge). Demeanor applies rather to one's attitude as shown in one's behavior in the presence of others. "His demeanor in public was still, silent, almost sepulchral. He looked habitually upon the ground when he conversed, was chary of speech, embarrassed" (Molley). "The child who has been treated wisely and kindly has a frank look in the eyes, and a fearless demeanour even with strangers" (B. Russell). Mien implies reference both to bearing and demeanor; it is now chiefly a literary term. "For truth has such a face and such a mien, As to be lov'd needs only to be seen" (Dryden). "In his deportment, shape, and mien, appeared Elysian beauty, melancholy grace" (Wordsworth). Manner, as here compared (see METHOD), denotes characteristic or customary mode of acting, with special reference to a person's attitude, gesture, or address; as, I do not like his manner; he soon learned that he must change his manner if he would have friends; "the smooth manner of the spy" (Dickens). Usually in the plural, but sometimes in the singular, manner suggests reference to the outward signs of conformity to the conventions of polite intercourse, and, at times, denotes the deportment characteristic of the best society; as, he has no manners; to the manner born. "We country persons can have no manner at all" (Goldsmith). "Outward...looks, manners, accomplishments" (Arnold). Carriage narrowly implies reference to a person's bearing physically, or the way in which he holds himself, especially while standing or walking. "His carriage, conversation, and deportment combined aristocratic hauteur with...sarcastic wit" (Symonds). "A superb health in their [country women's] carriage princesses could not obtain" (Jefferies). Port was once a close synonym of bearing and carriage; it is now a literary term and is more specific than either, for it implies reference to physique, especially, through long association with adjectives such as majestic, regal, proud, etc., to a stately or dignified physique. "Pride in their port, defiance in their eye, I see the lords of humankind pass by" (Goldsmith). "People with a dignity of port, an amplitude of back, an emphasis of vocabulary" (L. P. Smith). Presence is more explicit than bearing, for it denotes a person's bearing with reference to its power to impress his personality on others or to attract their attention, interest, or admiration; as, "A graceful presence bespeaks acceptance" (J. Collier). "In mature life he [George Fox] became 'a bulky person,' with strong health and a commanding presence" (Inge). "Mr. Potter; a small, bird-like person, of no presence" (R. Macaulay). "Gossips...said, to distinguish them, that Henrietta Maria had a port, and Melchisedec a Presence.... By a Port, one may understand them to indicate something unsympathetically impressive; whereas a Presence would seem to be a thing that directs the most affable appeal to our poor human weaknesses. His Majesty King George IV., for instance, possessed a Port; Beau Brummel[I] wielded a Presence" (Meredith). Front, which is a more or less colloquial term, is applicable to a bearing that represents nothing deeper than a person's outward appearance or aspect, or the way he consciously presents his personality to others. "One sometimes feels that it is only with a front of brass and a lip of scorn that one can get through the day at all" (Wilde). The term usually suggests an assumed demeanor, often, specifically, an assumed dignity of manner, but only in some use does it connote pretense for the sake of giving a favorable impression; as, he is all front; many are impressed more by front than by deeper qualities of character.

Act. *Posture, attitude, pose: *behavior, conduct: attitude, stand, *position: poise, address (see TACT).

beast. Brute, *animal.

beat, v. 1 Beat, pound, pummel, thrash, thresh, buffet, baste, belabor (or belabour) come into comparison when they mean to strike repeatedly. Beat, the usual and general word of this group, often implies no more than the simple action with one's hands, or, sometimes, with one's arms or legs or feet, or with an implement, especially one devised for a certain purpose. The purpose is usually suggested by the object beaten, even when the manner of beating or the kind of implement used is not specifically stated; as, to beat a rug (i.e., with an implement, which, when so used, forces the dust out of the rug); to beat one's breast (by implication, with one's hands in sorrow or anguish); to beat a child (i.e., to punish by spanking or by raining blows upon him); to beat the ground (by implication, to strike the ground repeatedly, often rhythmically or restlessly, with one's foot or feet). Pound in earliest use implied beating with a pestle or the like to crush or reduce to a pulp or powder: this sense still occurs, though the method is no longer the most common one. In current English the term usually implies heavier, more damaging blows than beat: it may suggest repeated striking by a heavy hammer, strong doubled fists, the hoofs of horses, bombs, shells, and the like, and it often also suggests rhythmical, loud and heavy sounds; as, "The big boys who sit at the tables pound them and cheer" (T. Hughes); "the hoofs of the horses pounding on the bridge" (S. Anderson); his heart was pounding; he pounded the door (or on the door) in an effort to rouse the sleeping family; night after night the port was pounded by bombs. Pummel implies the beating of a person with one's fists: although it does not suggest as heavy blows as pound, it carries a stronger suggestion of continuous raining of blows and, often, of the infliction of injury, than beat; as, "a desire to pummel and wring the nose of the aforesaid Stiggins" (Dickens); "with Dick fastened on him, pummelling away most unmercifully" (Lover). Thrash and thresh in their earliest and still current senses mean to separate the grain, as of wheat, from the husks and straw by beating: the methods by which this was accomplished have changed through the ages, but the most important was striking with a flail. Consequently, thrash usually (for thresh, and not thrash, tends to retain the original meaning), means to strike repeatedly in a manner suggestive of strokes with a flail. When that which is thrashed is a person, the word usually implies a flogging with a stick or whip; when it is a thing, the word suggests motions and, sometimes, an implement comparable to those used in such flogging; as, to thrash a hedge with one's cane in order to drive out the rabbits; so poor a boxer that he spent much of his time thrashing the air with his arms; in the crawl stroke a swimmer's legs move up and down, thrashing the water. Buffet implies a repeated striking with or as if with an open hand: it therefore suggests a slapping, rather than a pounding, and in extended use is employed chiefly with reference to that which dashes against the face or the body in the manner of a slap, or which one fights as if by slapping; as, "the two hands of Madame Defarge buffeted and tore her face" (Dickens); buffeted by high waves; to buffet the waves which assail

one. Baste implies a sound vigorous thrashing with any weapon (including the tongue); as, to baste an employee for his negligence; "I took a broom, and basted her, till she cried extremely" (Pepys). Belabor implies a prolonged and mighty basting or buffeting; as, "He saw Virago Nell belabour, With Dick's own staff his peaceful neighbour" (Swift).

Ana. Slug, clout, swat, punch, *strike, hit, smite, slap, box, cuff.

2 Defeat, lick, *conquer, vanquish, subdue, subjugate, reduce, overcome, surmount, overthrow, rout.

Ana. Surpass, excel, outstrip (see EXCEED): confound, nonplus (see PUZZLE).

3 *Pulsate, throb, pulse, palpitate.

Ana. Quiver, quaver, quake (see SHAKE): vibrate, oscillate, fluctuate, pendulate (see SWING).

beat, n. Pulsation, pulse, throb, palpitation. See under PULSATE.

Ana. Accent, accentuation, stress (see EMPHASIS): *rhythm, cadence.

beatitude. Blessedness, bliss, felicity, *happiness.

Ana. Rapture, *ecstasy, transport: joy, fruition, enjoyment, *pleasure.

Ant. Despair: dolor. — Con. Tribulation, affliction, *trial, cross: anguish, woe, *sorrow, grief: suffering, agony, misery, *distress.

beau, n. *Fop, exquisite, élegant, dandy, coxcomb, dude, macaroni, buck, spark, swell, nob, toff.

beau ideal or beau idéal. Ideal, exemplar, pattern, *model, example, mirror, paradigm, standard.

beauteous. Pulchritudinous, fair, good-looking, handsome, pretty, comely, bonny, lovely, *beautiful.

Ana. Alluring, attractive, fascinating, charming (see under ATTRACT).

beautiful, adj. Beautiful, lovely, handsome, pretty, bonny, comely, fair, beauteous, pulchritudinous, good looking come into comparison when they express one's judgment of a person or a thing that one perceives or contemplates with sensuous or aesthetic pleasure. Although they differ widely not only in their implications and connotations but also in their range of reference, they carry in common the meaning very pleasing or delightful to look upon. Of all these adjectives, beautiful is usually the richest in significance: since the abstraction it represents (the beautiful) has been for many centuries the subject of discussion by philosophers, artists, and aestheticians, its content in a particular context often depends upon the speaker's or writer's cultural background, his chosen philosophy, or, in some cases, his own peculiar definition. In general, however, both in learned and in ordinary use, beautiful is applied to that which excites the keenest pleasure, not only of the senses but also, through the medium of the senses, of mind and soul. It commonly also suggests an approach to, or a realization of, perfection, often specifically the imagined perfection associated with one's conception of an ideal. That is why beautiful is applicable not only to things that are directly perceived by the senses (as, a beautiful woman; a beautiful scene; the beautiful "Winged Victory"; an exquisitely beautiful painting) but to things that are actually mental constructions formed in the mind through the instrumentality of language, as a result of inferences from certain outward manifestations, or the like (as, a beautiful poem; a beautiful thought; a beautiful character). Lovely, like beautiful, usually suggests a more than sensuous pleasure, but it implies keen emotional delight rather than profound intellectual or spiritual pleasure. It is applied therefore to that which is so pleasant to look upon, to hear, to smell, or to touch that the person affected dwells delightedly, almost amorously, upon it or the sensations it produces. "Why ever wast thou lovely in my eyes?" (Shak.). "In after years... thy mind shall be a mansion for all lovely forms" (Wordsworth). "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever: Its loveliness increases" (Keats). "A sailing ship—that loveliest of human creations" (H. Ellis). Handsome, on the other hand, carries little connotation of emotional or spiritual pleasure; it implies rather a judgment of approval occasioned by that which is pleasant to look upon because it conforms to one's conception of what is perfect in form and detail or in perfect taste, and pleasing because of its due proportions, symmetry, elegance, or the like. It is applied chiefly to that which can be regarded unemotionally and with detachment; thus, a man is usually described as handsome rather than beautiful; a woman who is described as handsome, rather than as beautiful or lovely is, by implication, one whose appearance aesthetically satisfies the observer but does not markedly stir his deeper feelings; so, a handsome dress; a handsome house; a handsome table. "They say I'm handsome." "You're lovely, Bella!" She drank in his homage" (Meredith). Pretty, in contrast to handsome, is applied largely to that which pleases by its delicacy, grace, charm, or the like, rather than by its perfection or elegance of form or style. It is seldom used to describe that which is large or impressive; consequently it often connotes diminutiveness, daintiness, exquisiteness, or the like; as, a group of pretty girls; a very pretty child; a pretty cottage. Pretty is often used depreciatively to suggest mere pleasingness of appearance and the absence of qualities that make for beauty, grandeur, or strength; as, a pretty poem; a pretty view. Bonny, though often employed as a close synonym of pretty by persons other than those who use it colloquially (as in Scotland and some parts of England), carries few of the connotations of the latter adjective. Usually, it implies approbation of a person's or thing's looks, but it may also imply sweetness, simplicity, healthiness, plumpness, and the like; as, a bonny baby. "Eh, Miss Baines, I haven't seen ye for over thirty years... and you're looking bonny" (Bennett). Comely was once a term of high praise when applied to persons, especially to ladies, of exalted station, and connoted rarity, delicacy, or distinction in beauty. In more recent use, the term is applied to persons of all classes and implies an opposition to that which is homely and plain rather than to that which is crude or ugly. The word suggests a measure of good looks or physical attractiveness but it carries few, if any, distinguishing connotations except of good proportions and wholesomeness of aspect; as, a comely barmaid; the comeliest women in the club. "Sarah Drew might be rather called comely than beautiful" (Gay). "Jack was so comely, so pleasant, so jolly" (C. Dibdin). "Once a moorland Helen, and still comely as a blood horse and healthy as the hill wind" (Stevenson). Fair applies especially to that which gives delight because of the purity, the flawlessness, or the freshness of its beauty. "Fair as a star, when only one Is shining in the sky" (Wordsworth). "Fairer than the lily, than the wild white cherry: Fair as in image my seraph love appears... Fair as in the flesh she swims to me on tears" (Meredith). Beauteous was once used in poetry and elevated prose in place of beautiful; at present it occurs chiefly in humorous or journalistic prose where it often carries a suggestion of derogation or implies an emphasis on mere physical attractiveness; as, beauteous candidates for the title of "Miss America"; a beauteous platinum blonde. Even in poetical and dignified use it often carries a stronger implication of opulence of charms than beautiful. "How beauteous mankind is! O brave new world, That has such people in't!" (Shak.). "It is a beauteous evening, calm and free" (Wordsworth). Pulchritudinous, a term first used in the early twentieth century, is sometimes employed humorously or disparagingly with much the same implications as beauteous; it is even more often used to describe persons who are strikingly good-looking, but who are not properly described as beautiful, lovely, handsome, or fair, because of the specific connotations of those terms; as, the pulchritudinous women of Arles; pulchritudinous chorus girls. Good-looking is a less expressive word than handsome or pretty, but is often used as a close synonym; as, the children of that family are all good-looking.

Ana. *Splendid, resplendent, glorious, sublime, superb: exquisite, elegant, *choice.

Ant. Ugly. — Con. Repulsive, repugnant, revolting, *offensive.

beautify. Embellish, deck, bedeck, *adorn, ornament, decorate, garnish.

Ana. Enhance, heighten (see INTENSIFY): primp, prink, prank, *preen, prune, doll up, perk up.

Ant. Uglify. — Con. *Deface, disfigure, disfigure: *deform, distort, contort: mar, spoil, *injure, damage.

because. Because, for, since, as, inasmuch as are the chief causal conjunctions in English. Because assigns a cause or reason immediately and explicitly; as, I hid myself, because [=for the express reason that, or as caused to do so by the fact that] I was afraid; he must have passed this way, because [=owing to the specific fact that] there is no other road; cf., he must have passed this way, because [=as is directly proved by the fact that] his footprints are here. For, in modern usage, is a particle of less immediate reference than because; it regards the statement to which it is subjoined as relatively independent, and proceeds to adduce for it some ground, reason, evidence, proof, explanation, or justification; as, I hid myself, for [=as I may add by way of explanation] I was afraid; he must have passed this way, for [=as you may readily see] here are his footprints; I like him, for [=I ask, in justification of the fact] who can help it? Since (originally denoting sequence in time) is less formal and more incidental than because; as assigns a reason even more casually than since; each of them frequently begins its sentence; as, Since (or As) I was afraid, I hid myself; I will come, since you ask me; As I knew him to be out of town, I did not call. Inasmuch as assigns a reason in a somewhat concessive or qualified fashion; as, Inasmuch as [=in view of, or considering, the fact that] I was afraid, I hid myself; I am ready to accept your proposal, inasmuch as [=seeing that] I believe it is the best you can offer.

bedeck. Deck, garnish, embellish, beautify, decorate, ornament, *adorn.

Ana. Doll up, primp, prink, prank, *preen, prune.

beer. Beer, lager, bock, ale, stout, porter denote in common a fermented liquor brewed from malt (and sometimes malt substitutes), hops, water, and yeast (and sometimes sugar). Beer in its widest sense denotes any kind of malt liquor; often, however, especially in the United States, it is equivalent to lager (or lager beer), which is a malt liquor made by bottom fermentation (a slow fermentation in which the yeast cells collect at the bottom of the liquid) and stored for several months before being marketed. Bock (beer) is a dark, less bitter kind of lager, having a higher content of alcohol and of extract (soluble constituents exclusive of alcohol and carbon dioxide), brewed in the winter and drunk in the spring. Ale is a malt liquor made by top fermentation (a rapid fermentation in which the yeast cells are carried to the top of the liquid) and marketed soon after fermentation takes place. In England, where lager beer is rarely produced, ale and beer are usually interchangeable terms. Stout differs from ale in having a dark color imparted by an admixture of roasted or charred malt, and, usually, in having a higher content of alcohol and extract. Porter is weak stout.

befall. Betide, occur, *happen, hap, chance, transpire.

befool. Trick, hoax, hoodwink, *dupe, gull, bamboozle.

Ana. *Cheat, cozen, overreach: *deceive, delude, beguile, mislead: blandish, cajole, wheedle, *coax.

before. Before, afore, ahead, forward are comparable when they mean in advance, especially in place or in time. Before, as an adverb, is now more commonly used in reference to time than to place. Its most frequent implication is previousness or priority; as, I have heard that before; the before-mentioned facts. "Not dead, but gone before" (S. Rogers). "Dreams no mortal ever dared to dream before" (Poe). Sometimes, however, it implies futurity. "We look before and after, And pine for what is not" (Shelley). This use is not a contradiction of the temporal sense, but a figurative application of the adverb in its less frequent meaning of in front or in the van. "Thou art so far before That swiftest wing of recompense is slow To overtake thee" (Shak.). Afore is obsolete in literary English except as an archaism or a dialectal form; it is, however, found in nautical language, to indicate a position relatively nearer the prow of the vessel and so is opposed to abaft. Though it occurs as an adverb, it, like before, is vastly more frequent as a preposition when it implies place; as, the sailors sleep afore (or more often, afore the mast). Ahead and forward are the commonest adverbs indicating position in advance or in front of something and have practically supplanted before; ahead, however, usually implies a position outside of a thing, often a moving thing, and forward frequently implies a front position in the thing itself. Thus, to send a group of scouts ahead implies their detachment from an advancing body of troops; to send a company forward usually means to send them to a position nearer the front or in the van of a regiment. In nautical language, ahead (opposed to astern) indicates a position or direction in front of and outside of the ship (as, breakers ahead; a sail ahead; full speed ahead); forward (opposed to aft), a position in front of the midships section of the vessel; as, the guns were placed forward. The same distinction is often found in figurative use; thus, one looks ahead who can foresee the remote consequences of a decision and ignore the immediate results; one looks forward who anticipates something likely or bound to occur. "No longer forward nor behind I look in hope or fear" (Whittier). There is no difference between ahead and forward in reference to mechanisms which can be reversed or the opposite, except as determined by usage; thus, the more common expressions are to set a clock ahead and to drive an engine forward. Forward is rarely used in reference to time except in its sense of onward (see ONWARD); ahead frequently is. Like before, it commonly implies previousness, but it may also, when there is an implication of position, imply the opposite. Thus, if the hour in mind is one o'clock, "to set the clock an hour ahead" means to set it so that it indicates two o'clock, and "to arrive an hour ahead" means to arrive at twelve o'clock.

intoxicate, inebriate (see corresponding adjectives at DRUNK).

Ant. Clarify, clear.

beg. Beg, entreat, beseech, implore, supplicate, adjure, conjure, importune agree in meaning to ask or request urgently. Beg suggests earnestness or insistence, especially in asking a favor. "Why, boy, before I left, you were constantly begging to see Town" (Meredith). Entreat implies an attempt to persuade or to overcome resistance in another, especially by ingratiating oneself. "He was accustomed to command, not to entreat" (Calder). Beseech implies great eagerness and often anxiety or solicitude. "She besought him, for his Soul's sake, to speak the truth" (Kipling). Implore, often used interchangeably with beseech, at times suggests even greater urgency in the plea or more manifest anguish. "The last look of my dear mother's eyes, which implored me to have mercy" (Dickens). Supplicate adds to entreat the suggestion of fervent prayer or of a prayerful attitude. "I have attempted, one by one, the lords... with supplication prone and father's tears, to accept of ransom for my son" (Milton). Adjure, when it retains its full historical significance, implies an injunction as well as a plea, and is strengthened by the expressed or implied invocation of something sacred. "I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ" (Matthew xxvi. 63). In its thinner modern sense, adjure often connotes peremptoriness. "So E company...doubled for the dear life, and in the rear toiled the perspiring sergeant, adjuring it to double yet faster" (Kipling). Conjure, historically a close synonym of adjure, is not often distinguishable from it. "I conjure thee to leave me and be gone" (Shak.). It is rarer in current English than adjure, but is preferred when a humorous warning is to be conveyed; as, do not forget your promise, I conjure you. Importune commonly suggests repeated attempts to break down resistance, and often, as a result, connotes annoying pertinacity; as, his father would not listen to importuning.

Ana. Solicit, request, *ask: plead, pray, petition, sue (see under PRAYER): *demand, exact.

beget. Get, *generate, sire, procreate, engender, breed, propagate, reproduce.

Ana. *Bear, produce, yield.

beggarly. Cheap, scurvy, sorry, *contemptible, despicable, pitiable.

Ana. Paltry, measly, *petty, trifling: *mean, abject, sordid.

begin, v. Begin, commence, start, initiate, inaugurate come into comparison when they mean to set something going or in progress or to take the first step or steps in a course, process, or operation. Begin, commence, and start are also used intransitively, with the activity, work, instrument, or the like, as the subject, in the sense of to get going or in progress; as, he began the letter; play begins when the whistle blows; to start a race; the race starts at ten. Begin (implying opposition to end) and commence (implying opposition to conclude) are identical in meaning; the former is often preferred because less formal than the latter; as, to begin work; the lecture began with an apology; well begun is half done. "Things never began with Mr. Borthrop Trumbull; they always commenced" (G. Eliot). Traditional good usage, however, supports the choice of commence in reference to court proceedings, religious or other ceremonies, military operations, and the like; as, to commence a lawsuit; divine service commences promptly at eleven; war was declared in 1939, but operations on a large scale did not commence at once. Start is often used as though it also were identical in meaning with begin and commence; the term, however, carries implications which distinguish it sharply from the other words. Start implies opposition to stop: it therefore suggests a setting out from a particular point, as on a journey, a race, or a course, often, but not necessarily, after inaction or waiting; as, the horses are ready to start (that is, to begin the race); the children like to see the train start (that is, set out from the station at which it has stopped); conversation started and stopped, and after an embarrassing pause, started again. Start also frequently takes as its subject, not the person or agency that begins a process or course, but the one that causes, enables, or permits him or it to begin; as, his father started him in business; he quickly started the engine working by pressing a button (cf. self-starter; an elevator or train starter). Initiate (see also INITIATE) suggests reference to the first step or steps in a process and carries no implication of an end or ending; it often suggests an opposition to carry on, continue, or maintain; thus, a person initiates (better than begins or starts except in informal speech) a custom or practice when he is its originator; a diplomat initiates negotiations between the government he represents and another when he takes the first step or steps leading to future discussions in which he may or may not take part, but he begins negotiations on behalf of his government when he enters into actual discussions which in the natural course of events, will end only when there is agreement or hopeless disagreement. "Taft had to make himself popular as a necessary incident to initiating a civil government [in the Philippines]" (V. Heiser). Inaugurate, in the sense here considered, retains, from its more frequent sense of to induct into office (see INITIATE), a hint of a ceremonial beginning. Often it is an inflated term for begin or commence; as, the Curies inaugurated a new era in science by their discovery of radium; to inaugurate proceedings on behalf of the heirs. The word sometimes takes as its subject the act, action, or incident that serves as the first step in a course, procedure, or the like; as, the discovery of radium inaugurated a new era in science. "Prayers and scripture inaugurated the official day" (H. G. Wells).

beguile. 1 Delude, *deceive, mislead, betray, double-cross.

Ana. *Dupe, gull, befool, trick, hoax, hoodwink, bamboozle: cajole, wheedle, blandish, *coax: *cheat, cozen: *lure, entice, seduce.

2 *While, wile, beguile, fleet.

Ana. Divert, *amuse, entertain: *comfort, solace: *speed, hasten, hurry.

behave. Behave, conduct, demean, deport, comport, acquit, quit come into comparison when they are used reflexively meaning to cause or to allow oneself to act or to do something in a way that evokes comment. Demean, deport, comport, and quit are now used less often than formerly and have a bookish or archaic flavor. One behaves oneself when one's actions meet a standard, usually a standard of what is proper or decorous; as, these children know how to behave themselves. "Those that behaved themselves manfully" (2 Maccabees ii. 21). One conducts oneself in a specified way when one's action on a particular occasion or one's behavior in some experience shows the extent of one's power to direct or control oneself; as, the soldiers conducted themselves bravely throughout the grilling shellfire; he knew how to conduct himself in an emergency. One demeans oneself in a given manner when one's conduct, one's bearing, one's mien, or one's attitude to others answers the given description. "They have demeaned themselves Like men born to renown by life or death" (Shak.). "It shall be my earnest endeavor to demean myself with grateful respect towards her Ladyship" (Austen). One deports oneself in a specified way when one's behavior shows how far one conforms to the rules of discipline, the conventions of one's group, or the accepted proprieties. "Dido and Æneas, in the 'Roman d'Encas,' deport themselves in accordance with the strictest canons of courtly love" (Loves). One comports oneself when one conducts oneself to the extent specified, the measure being what is expected or required of a person in one's class, one's position, or the like; as, he has not yet learned how to comport himself in good society. One acquits, or (archaic) quits, oneself well, admirably, or the like, when one conducts oneself so as to win approval or to meet expectations. "A border action in which the Dogra companies of the Loodhiana Sikhs had acquitted themselves well" (Kipling). "Quit you like men" (1 Corinthians xvi. 13). Ana. Bear, *carry: manage, control, direct (see CONDUCT).

Ant. Misbehave.

2 *Act, react, operate, work, function.

behavior or behaviour. Behavior (or behaviour), conduct, deportment are here compared only as denoting one's actions in general or on a particular occasion, so far as they serve as a basis of another's judgment of one's character, temperament, mood, manners, morals, or the like. Behavior may be used in reference to any human being regardless of age, state of development, social standing, or the like, for it may or may not imply consciousness of what one is doing. Behavior may be thought of as instinctive or as voluntary, as a spontaneous expression of one's personality or character, or as the result of training or breeding. "The captain's behaviour to his wife and to his wife's father . . . was as if they had been a pair of not very congenial passengers" (Conrad). "Courageous behaviour is easier for a man who fails to apprehend dangers" (B. Russell). "Grandfather had been hounded out of his congregation because he couldn't hold her to their standards of behavior for a minister's wife" (M. Austin). Since behavior is increasingly used in the various sciences in reference to animals and substances, the term as referred to human beings tends in present usage to become more and more sharply differentiated from conduct than in the past. The latter term has always, in discriminating use, carried a hint of moral responsibility, but since behavior does not rule out this suggestion, the words have often been used interchangeably. In current good speech and writing they are frequently distinguished; as, to dismiss a person because of his conduct (better than behavior because it implies violation of principles); what do you mean by such conduct (better than behavior)?; "No animal's behaviour is controlled by moral principles. Generally speaking, they do not rise from behaviour to conduct" (J. S. Clarke). Deportment (see also BEARING) is often used of behavior as taught or as the result of discipline; its strongest implication is that of degree of conformity to the accepted code of good manners or the conventions governing one's relations to one's fellows, one's superiors, or one's inferiors; as, children held up as models of deportment; his old-fashioned deportment marked him out from others.

belief. 1 Belief, faith, credence, credit come into comparison when they mean the act of one who assents intellectually to something proposed or offered for acceptance as true, or the state of mind of one who so assents. Belief is less restricted in its application than the other terms, for it may or may not imply certitude or certainty in the one who assents; it may even suggest nothing more than his mere mental acceptance; as, his conclusions are beyond belief; the theory merits belief; belief in God; nothing could shake his belief in the Bible as the word of God. "Hope is the belief, more or less strong, that joy will come" (Sydney Smith). "Belief consists in accepting the affirmations of the soul; unbelief, in denying them" (Emerson). Faith implies full assent of the mind, and therefore certitude, but it adds to this a strong implication of complete trust or confidence in the divinity, the institution, the person, or the like, that proposes something or offers itself for belief and confidence. Consequently, although belief may represent the mind's act or state when something is assented to, regardless of whether it is or is not fully supported by evidence, faith, in discriminating usage, represents the mind's act or state only when something is assented to on grounds other than merely those of the evidence of one's senses or of conclusions entirely supported by reason. "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen" (Hebrews xi. 1). "To believe only possibilities is not faith, but mere philosophy" (Browne). "Such tales, whether false or true, were heard by our ancestors with eagerness and faith" (Macaulay). "He's still touchingly full of faith, even after all that has happened, in a new heaven and a new earth" (R. Macaulay). In theological use, faith is variously defined, but the older implications are retained in general use. In current English, faith often carries a strong suggestion of credulity or overreadiness to accept authority; as, he takes everything on faith. Credence stresses mere intellectual assent, without implying weak or strong grounds for belief and without suggesting credulity or its absence. Consequently, it is seldom used in reference to religious or philosophical doctrines and is commonly employed in reference to reports, rumors, opinions, and the like. "There is no superstition too absurd to find credence in modern England" (Inge). "We are not now concerned with the finality or extent of truth in this judgment. The point is that it gained a widespread credence among the cultured class in Europe" (Day Lewis). Credit (as here compared: see also INFLUENCE) carries a weaker implication than any of the preceding words of certitude or of acceptance as a result of conviction: often, it specifically suggests as its ground a reputation for truth in the person who offers something for acceptance; as, anything he will tell you about the circumstances is entitled to credit; I can give no credit to the gossip she retails.

Ana. Certitude, assurance, *certainty, conviction: assenting or assent, acquiescing or acquiescence (see corresponding verbs at ASSENT).

bellicose. *Belligerent, pugnacious, contentious, litigious, quarrelsome.

Ana. Militant, *aggressive, assertive: antagonizing or antagonistic, combating or combative (see corresponding verbs at OPPOSE): rebellious, factious, seditious, mutinous (see INSUBORDINATE).

Ant. Pacific: amicable. — Con. Peaceful, pacifist, peaceable (see PACIFIC).

belligerent, adj. Belligerent, bellicose, pugnacious, quarrelsome, contentious, litigious agree in meaning having or taking an aggressive or fighting attitude. Belligerent usually implies actual engagement in hostilities; as, the belligerent powers in the World War; to define a nation's status as not neutral yet not belligerent. When applied to a tone, speech, gesture, or the like, the term implies an actively hostile mood or warlike temper; as, a belligerent reply to a diplomatic note. Bellicose applies usually to a state of mind or temper; it suggests a desire or readiness to fight or, sometimes, a disposition to stir up a fight; as, a bellicose tribe; an intoxicated man in a bellicose mood; an editorial in a bellicose vein. Pugnacious differs from bellicose (which is sometimes given a semihumorous or mock-heroic turn) in applying more commonly to disposition or character; it does not, however, convey the impression of pettiness or ill nature, or of readiness to fight without genuine cause, so frequently implied in quarrelsome. "The Scotch are certainly a most pugnacious people; their whole history proves it" (Borrow). "Soon every father-bird and mother Grew quarrelsome, and pecked each other" (Cowper). "On the days they worked they were good-natured and cheerful... on our idle days they were mutinous and quarrelsome" (Franklin). Contentious frequently suggests a certain perversity of temper and wearisome persistence in dispute. "A continual dropping in a very rainy day and a contentious woman are alike" (Proverbs xxvii. 15). Litigious is now commonly confined to fondness for legal contention; as, a litigious client. "He was apparently a lawyer, 'clerk in the King's Bench,'... with chambers in Fleet Street, himself most litigious, and not always strictly scrupulous" (H. Ellis).

Ana. Hostile, antagonistic (see corresponding nouns at ENMITY): fighting, warring, battling, contending (see CONTENT): warlike, *martial.

Ant. Friendly. — Con. Neighborly, *amicable: *neutral, indifferent.

belly. *Abdomen, paunch, stomach.

belong. Pertain, appertain, relate, apply, *bear.

belongings. *Possessions, effects, means, resources, assets.

below. Below, under, beneath, underneath, in their literal senses, agree in meaning in a lower position relatively to some other object or place. Below (opposed to above) applies to that which is anywhere in a lower plane than the object of reference; under (opposed to over), to that which is below in a relatively vertical line: it sometimes implies actual covering; as, below sea level, the valley far below us; under a tree, under the bed; to hide one's light under a bushel; the Whirlpool Rapids are below, the Cave of the Winds is under, Niagara Falls; the whole visible landscape is below, but only a small portion of it under, an observer in a balloon. Beneath is an equivalent of both below and, especially, under; as, "heaven above, or... the earth beneath" (Exodus xx. 4); "beneath the spreading tree" (Goldsmith). Underneath is often employed in place of under or beneath. It is, however, the preferred term when there is the intent to imply complete or nearly complete concealment; as, mines underneath the city; garments worn underneath a dress. In their figurative senses, below and under agree in expressing inferiority, but differ (like above and over) in the immediacy of the relation expressed; thus, one officer may be below another in rank, without being under him in immediate subordination. Similarly, with reference to deficiency, below is commonly used in general, under in more specific, relations; as, below the standard or average; under six years of age. Beneath frequently suggests social, moral, or general inferiority; as, to marry beneath one, beneath one's notice, beneath contempt. Underneath suggests not inferiority, but something underlying and not indicated clearly by that which is outwardly manifest; as, underneath his ingratiating manner, one felt a sinister intention; there is something underneath this announcement, I am sure.

Ana. *Gift, present, largess, boon: endowment (see corresponding verb at POWER): grant, subvention (see APPROPRIATION): *charity, philanthropy.

beneficial. Beneficial, advantageous, profitable are applied to that which brings good or gain. Beneficial refers to that which promotes health or well-being; advantageous, to that which more directly conduces to relative superiority or subserves a desirable end; profitable, to that which yields useful or lucrative returns; as, a climate beneficial to rheumatism; "measures . . . beneficial to the kingdom" (J. R. Green); the enemy were in an advantageous position on the hill; "you see . . . how swift and advantageous a harbinger it [a good reputation] is, wherever one goes" (Chesterfield); a profitable study, investment.

Ana. Salutory, *healthful, wholesome: *favorable, benign, propitious.

Ant. Harmful: detrimental. — Con. *Pernicious, deleterious, baneful, noxious.

benefit, v. Benefit, profit, avail, boot, bestead (or bested) agree in meaning to do good or to be of advantage to someone. Benefit and profit also come together in meaning to gain or derive advantage from something. Benefit usually implies personal betterment or improvement, as of one's physical, intellectual, moral, or spiritual condition, but it may suggest enrichment or a furtherance of one's ends; as, a summer at the seashore benefits the entire family; he will benefit more from two years of travel than from two years of college; the expansion of the city's industries benefits everyone indirectly. Profit carries a strong implication of gain, especially, but not invariably, material gain. It is, therefore, preferred when an increase or yield, as opposed to a decrease or loss, in one's wealth, one's power, one's knowledge, or the like is to be suggested; as, he always profits (not benefits, unless one wishes to imply a salutary effect) by the misfortunes of others; no one benefits from a war except those who seek to profit by it; it will profit you as a congressman to pay more attention to your constituency's wishes. "What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" (Matthew xvi. 26). "Do we not lose something . . . when we hurry by and disregard what does not seem to profit our own existence?" (Binyon). Avail, boot, bestead all have an archaic and literary flavor that makes them rare in speech except in historical novels or in sermons or orations. Avail stresses efficacy. "Ah wretched shepherd, what avails thy art. To cure thy lambs, but not to heal thy heart!" (Pope). "Say not the struggle nought availeth, The labour and the wounds are vain" (Clough). Boot is used chiefly in rhetorical questions and in negative assertions; in highly discriminating use it implies something "to boot" as in compensation for loss or deficiency, or in reward for effort. "Nor boots it me to say I honour him, If he suspect I may dishonour him" (Shak.). "Alas! what boots it with uncessant care To tend the homely, slighted, shepherd's trade, And strictly meditate the thankless Muse?" (Milton). Bestead usually implies relief or sustenance, as in distress or need. "Hence, vain deluding Joys, The brood of Folly without father bred! How little you bested, Or fill the fixed mind with all your toys!" (Milton).

Ana. Better, *improve, ameliorate: *help, assist, aid.

Ana. *Worry, annoy, harass, harry, pester, plague: assail, *attack, assault.

Con. Resist, withstand, combat, *oppose.

beside. Beside, besides in earlier English use often were interchangeable. In present usage, beside is employed, with rare exceptions (such as, he is beside himself with fear), only as a preposition in a local sense, meaning by the side of; as, he stood beside her; the house beside the river. On the other hand, besides has now almost entirely replaced beside as a preposition in the sense of other than, as a preposition in the sense of in addition to (as, he received other gifts besides the watch), and as an adverb in the senses of otherwise and moreover (see ALSO).

besides, adv. Moreover, furthermore, *also, too, likewise.

besides, adv. & prep. *Beside.

besprinkle. *Sprinkle, asperse, spatter, bespatter, splash.

bestead or bested, v. Profit, *benefit, avail, boot.

bestow. Confer, present, donate, *give, afford.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

Ana. *Distribute, dispense, divide: *grant, award.

bet, v. Bet, wager, stake, pot, blind, ante denote in common something of value, usually money, risked in the confidence or hope that something is true or will turn out in a certain way, something else of value being risked by at least one other party in support of an opposing confidence or hope. Bet and wager are used with little distinction of meaning either of what is risked or of the act of risking it. Stake implies money or valuables bet and actually produced, for example, entrusted to a neutral party (stakeholder), or placed in the pot in a card game. By extension, a stake is anything, material or nonmaterial, that one stands in jeopardy of losing. "And will probably always have the largest commercial stake in the African continent" (Livingstone). "With my most affectionate wishes for Dr. Johnson's recovery, in which his friends... have so deep a stake" (Sir A. Dick). Pot, in British use, often means a large bet; as, to put the pot on at cards. A blind is a compulsory stake, usually a predetermined small percentage of the betting limit, which the age (that is, player at dealer's left) puts into the pot before the deal, in draw poker. Among draw poker players who use the blind, an ante is a stake which each player who wishes to continue a particular hand puts up after he has seen his original five cards but before he draws other cards. Often, however, in stud poker, in draw poker when, as is often the case, the blind is not used, and in other games, as blackjack, the ante is a compulsory stake (in poker, of predetermined amount) put up by each player before the cards are seen. By extension, an ante is a price which must be paid before something desired can be obtained, or one of several payments made to a joint venture; as, Jones is asking only $5000 for the house; I'm afraid that if I don't buy right away, he'll raise the ante; the captain collected an ante of fifty cents from each member of the team.

bête noire. *Abomination, bugbear, anathema.

bethink. Recollect, remind, *remember, recall, reminisce, mind.

betide. Befall, hap, *happen, chance, occur, transpire.

better, v. *Improve, ameliorate, help.

Ana. *Correct, amend, reform, rectify, remedy, redress: enhance (see INTENSIFY).

Ant. Worsen. — Con. Impair, mar, harm, damage, *injure: *debase, vitiate, corrupt.

between. Between, betwixt, among come into comparison when they take as object two or more persons or things and indicate their relation in position, in a distribution, in participation, and the like. Between, and its archaic form betwixt, in their literal senses apply to only two objects; as, between Scylla and Charybdis; between two fires. When this word is used of more than two objects, it brings them severally and individually into the relation expressed; as, a treaty between three powers;

the three survivors had but one pair of shoes between them; "I hope that between public business, improving studies, and domestic pleasures, neither melancholy nor caprice will find any place for entrance" (Johnson). Among always implies more than two objects, which it brings less definitely into the relation expressed; as, among so many candidates one must find a good one; among the survivors were two boys; "Five barley loaves, and two small fishes: but what are they among so many?" (John vi. 9).

betwixt. *Between, among.

bevy, n. *Flock, drove, pack, herd, covey, gaggle, flight, swarm, shoal, school.

bewail. Lament, *deplore, bemoan.

Ana. Sorrow, *grieve, mourn: wail, weep, *cry.

Ant. Rejoice.

bewilder. Mystify, perplex, distract, *puzzle, confound, nonplus, dumfound.

Ana. *Confuse, addle, fuddle, muddle: fluster, flurry, perturb, agitate, upset (see DISCOMPOSE): baffle, foil (see FRUSTRATE).

bewitch. Enchant, captivate, fascinate, take, charm, allure, *attract.

Ana. *Thrill, electrify: delight, *please: infatuate, enamor (see corresponding adjectives at ENAMORED).

bewitching. Enchanting, captivating, fascinating, taking, charming, alluring, attractive. See under ATTRACT.

bewray. Betray, *reveal, discover, disclose, divulge, tell.

Ana. & Con. See those at BETRAY, 2.

bias, n. Prejudice, prepossession, partiality, *predilection.

Ana. Slant, standpoint, *point of view, viewpoint, angle: *leaning, propensity: inclining or inclination, predisposition, disposition (see corresponding verbs at INCLINE).

Con. Fairness, justness, impartiality, dispassionateness (see corresponding adjectives at FAIR).

bias, v. *Incline, dispose, predispose.

Ana. Sway, influence, *affect, impress.

bicker. Squabble, spat, tiff, quarrel, wrangle, altercation. See under QUARREL, n.

Ana. *Contend, fight, battle, war.

bickering. Spat, tiff, squabble, *quarrel, wrangle, altercation.

Ana. *Discord, contention, dissension, strife, conflict.

bid, v. 1 *Command, order, enjoin, direct, instruct, charge.

Ana. *Summon, call, cite.

Ant. Forbid. — Con. Prohibit, enjoin, interdict, inhibit (see FORBID).

2 *Invite, solicit, court, woo.

Ana. *Ask, request.

bid, n. Tender, *overture, advance, approach.

Ana. Offering or offer, proffering or proffer (see corresponding verbs at OFFER): *proposal, proposition: inviting or invitation, soliciting or solicitation (see corresponding verbs at INVITE).

biddable. Docile, amenable, tractable, *obedient.

Ana. *Compliant, acquiescent: obliging, complaisant, good-natured, *amiable: submissive, *tame.

Ant. Willful. — Con. Intractable, refractory, recalcitrant, headstrong, ungovernable, *unruly: *obstinate, stubborn, stiffnecked, mulish.

bidding. Behest, *command, order, injunction, mandate, dictate.

Ana. Direction, instruction (see corresponding verbs at COMMAND): summoning or summons, calling or call, citing or citation (see corresponding verbs at SUMMON).

big. *Large, great.

Ana. *Grand, magnificent, imposing, grandiose, majestic, august: huge, immense, *enormous, gigantic, colossal.

Ant. Little. — Con. *Small, diminutive, wee, tiny, petite, minute, microscopic, miniature.

bigot. Fanatic, *enthusiast, zealot.

bill, n.¹ Bill, beak, nib (or neb) denote in common the horny bipartite projection that serves a bird for jaws. In ornithology, bill and beak are used without distinction of meaning. Bill is decidedly more often used by American zoologists. Beak, if not more common than bill among British zoologists, at least occurs very frequently in their writings. In popular usage, bill is the usual term when the projection is flattened, or long and slender; as, the bill of a duck or swan, of a hummingbird, crane, heron, sandpiper, or snipe. Beak is associated with striking or tearing, and is the usual term for a projection, characteristic especially of birds of prey, in which the tip of the upper mandible has a sharp downward curvature and, usually, overhangs the lower mandible; as, the beak of an eagle, vulture, or hawk. "Although the kite soar with unbloody beak" (Shak.). Beak is more often used than bill for a conical projection having a basal circumference large in proportion to the length; as, the beak of a cardinal bird or hawfinch (cf. the term grosbeak often applied to either of these birds). A projection not of any of the extreme types mentioned above is called either bill or beak, though bill appears to be commoner in England, and is certainly much commoner in the United States; as, the bill (less often beak) of a sparrow, swallow, jay, or robin. "In his bill An olive-leaf he [the dove] brings" (Milton). Nib, meaning bill, or beak, now occurs chiefly in dialect or poetry or in an extended sense; as, the nib of a pen.

bill, n.² 1 Bill, act, statute, law are frequently confused when used to designate a legislative measure. Bill is properly applied only to the draft of a measure submitted to a legislature for its acceptance or rejection. The other terms are properly applied only to bills which have been passed. In actual use, they are practically identical. Strictly, however, a bill becomes an act when it is passed and duly signed by an executive officer; an act becomes a statute when it is legally effective and a part of the written law of the state; a statute is one kind of law (for fuller discrimination, see LAW).

2 Statement, *account.

billet. Berth, post, job, situation, *position, place, office, capacity.

billingsgate. Scurrility, vituperation, *abuse, invective, obloquy.

billow, n. *Wave, breaker, roller, comber, beachcomber, undulation, ripple.

bind. *Tie.

Ant. Loose: unbind.

biological, n. *Drug, simple, medicinal, pharmaceutical.

birthright. 1 *Right, appanage, prerogative, privilege, perquisite.

2 Patrimony, *heritage, inheritance.

bisexual, adj. Bisexual, hermaphrodite, hermaphroditic, androgynous, epicene agree in meaning combining male and female functions, characters, or qualities in the same individual. Bisexual usually (but not invariably) suggests normal or functional coexistence of the reproductive organs of both sexes in the same individual; it is employed chiefly in botany and in zoology; thus, most garden plants are bisexual in that they have both male and female organs in the same flower; some invertebrate organisms such as certain mollusks and worms are described as bisexual because each individual elaborates both male and female germ cells, and is adapted, in some cases, for self-impregnation; in others, for mutual impregnation; and in still others, for serving as male or as female to another organism of the same species. In the instances cited, hermaphrodite or hermaphroditic may also be used, though usage varies somewhat in the individual biological sciences. However, since the term is also applied to human beings or other vertebrates in which there is an abnormal combination of sex organs, or more often, an ambiguity of sex owing to such a combination with imperfect development of the organs, the word may, as bisexual seldom does, connote monstrosity. In general, as opposed to technical, use, androgynous stresses the union of the characters or qualities of the two sexes, is applicable chiefly to persons, their acts, their words, their clothes, etc., and conveys no suggestion of abnormality. "The truth is, a great mind must be androgynous" (Coleridge). In botany, however, androgynous is distinguishable from bisexual and hermaphroditic in being applied to plants that carry male and female flowers in the same cluster, or inflorescence. Epicene was originally applied to Greek and Latin words invariable in gender but applicable to either the male or the female of the species; thus, the Greek bous, which can be translated according to the context bull, ox, or cow, is an epicene noun. In literary use, epicene often implies ambiguity in sex, or sexlessness; thus, epicene garments may belong to either a man or a woman. Epicene, when applied to a man or his qualities, often suggests effeminacy or womanishness; as, epicene interests; "epicene Reforms of this or that" (E. L. Masters).

bishop, n. Bishop, archbishop, metropolitan, primate, ordinary are not always clearly distinguished as used in some churches, especially in the Roman Catholic Church and the Church of England. A bishop, in the Roman Catholic, Orthodox, and Anglican churches, is an ecclesiastic who has been consecrated for his office (in Anglican Churches, who has received the highest of Holy Orders), who is regarded by his church as a successor of the apostles and the inheritor of their powers and authority, who is the head of a diocese, and who is responsible for his episcopal actions only to that authority which is specifically designated by his church as a whole. Thus, the bishop of Rome, who is also the pope, is the only bishop of the Roman Catholic Church now having jurisdiction over other bishops. An archbishop, so far as the powers given at consecration are concerned, is no higher than a bishop; he has for his see an important diocese (an archdiocese). In the Roman Catholic Church he is usually the presiding bishop of a province or a group of dioceses but has no authority to interfere in the government of any of the suffragan dioceses. His powers are chiefly those that are the prerogative of his precedence, dignity, and leadership. In the Church of England, he is the head of one of the two most important dioceses from the historical point of view, Canterbury and York. He takes precedence over other bishops and may give them counsel, but he has no jurisdiction over them, except where the law provides for an appeal to the archbishop from the decision of a diocesan bishop. A metropolitan, historically, was the bishop of the chief city or diocese of a province (in this instance, a geographical province) who, in the early church, had some jurisdiction over other bishops in that province. In modern use, the term is applicable to any archbishop who is the head of a province, or group of dioceses. The term is used in the Orthodox Church where, in essential features, it is equivalent to archbishop, but implies jurisdiction over the suffragan dioceses. A primate, historically, was a bishop who had jurisdiction over all the bishops in a province, a group of provinces, or a nation, serving as a vicar of the Holy See. The bishops of such dioceses today are usually called primates, but in the Roman Catholic Church the title is largely honorary. Thus, England has two primates for the Church of England, the archbishop of Canterbury, who specifically is designated Primate of All England, and the archbishop of York, whose title is Primate of England. In Ireland, there are four primates, two for the Roman Catholic Church and two for the Church of Ireland. In each group, the archbishop of Armagh is called Primate of All Ireland, and the archbishop of Dublin, Primate of Ireland. An ordinary, in ecclesiastical use and in the phrase the ordinary of a diocese, is the person who has immediate or original jurisdiction in his own right in a diocese, and who has judicial power in all ecclesiastical cases. Since the bishop of a diocese possesses such jurisdiction, the ordinary of a diocese is, except in extraordinary circumstances, its bishop (or archbishop). If there is an auxiliary or suffragan bishop in the diocese, he is not the ordinary, except where the powers have been deputed to him. In case of a vacancy in a see, the temporary ordinary is usually the administrator of the diocese or the vicar-general, or, in the Church of England, the archbishop of the province.

bit. *Particle, mite, smitch, smidgen, whit, atom, iota, jot, tittle.

Ana. Piece, fragment, detail, fraction, *part, portion.

biting. Cutting, crisp, trenchant, *incisive, clear-cut.

Ana. *Caustic, mordant, mordacious, acrid: *pungent, poignant, piquant, racy.

bitter. Bitter, acid are applied to things that have an unpleasant taste (also smell, in the case of acid) that is neither sweet nor bland yet seldom distinctly acid or stinging. Bitter is traditionally associated with the repellent taste of wormwood, quinine, and aloes, but it is also used to describe the taste of beer, unsweetened chocolate, and the rind of citrus fruits. That which is bitter usually lacks the pleasant tang and freshness of pure acids such as lemon juice. Acrid implies bitterness in taste that has an astringent or irritating effect on the mucous membranes, such as the taste of choke cherries or of alum. It is also applied to that which is bitter and salty (sometimes in general, sometimes in chemical sense), as perspiration. An acid smell is a penetrating, suffocating, repugnant odor. It is especially associated with certain fumes, such as those emanating from burning sulphur or with certain noxious vapors, such as those of a heavy London fog.

Ana. *Sour, acid, acidulous, tart: *astringent, constringent: *pungent, piquant.

Anf. Delicious. — Con. Delectable, luscious, *delightful.

bizarre. Grotesque, *fantastic, antic.

Ana. Outlandish, erratic, eccentric, *strange, singular, odd, queer, curious: extravagant, extreme (see EXCESSIVE).

Anf. Chaste: subdued.

blab. Tattle, *gossip.

Ana. Babble, gabble, chatter, prate, *chat: divulge, disclose, betray (see REVEAL).

blackball, v. Debar, shut out, *exclude, eliminate, rule out, disbar, suspend.

Con. Admit, accept, *receive.

blame, v. Reprehend, reprobate, condemn, denounce, censure, *criticize.

Ana. *Accuse, charge, indict, impeach: impute, attribute, *ascribe: implicate, *involve.

Con. Exonerate, vindicate, *exculpate, absolve, acquit: *excuse, remit, forgive.

blame, n. Blame, culpability, guilt, fault come into comparison when they mean responsibility for misdeed or delinquency. Blame is a term of shifting denotations, sometimes, for example, meaning the reprehension, criticism, or censure of those who find fault or judge one's work or acts (as, "I have never desired praise... I have been indifferent to, if not indeed contemptuous of, blame"—H. Ellis), or sometimes, though now less often, a charge or accusation of some fault, misdeed, or delinquency (as, "fear of incurring blame in Wiltstocken for wantonly opposing her daughter's obvious interests"—Shaw). In all its other senses, as well as the one here considered, it implies also that the person criticized or accused is held responsible for the misdeed or delinquency in question. When the term denotes responsibility for wrongdoing or delinquency, it also implies the meriting of reproof, censure, or the appropriate penalty; as, to take on oneself all the blame for a project's failure; they tried to shift the blame for their defeat. Often, the term means ultimate rather than immediate responsibility; as, "The blame [for backwardness in American education] has sometimes been put, and with some justice, upon our migratory habits and upon the heterogeneous character of our population" (Grandgent).

Culpability is a much simpler term than blame, for it usually means little more or no more than the fact or the state of being responsible for any act or condition that may be described as wrong, harmful, or injurious; as, they could not prove his culpability for the accident; "As if the estrangement between them had come of any culpability of hers" (Dickens). Guilt, which originally denoted a crime or sin, in its current senses usually retains an implication of a connection with misdeeds of a grave or serious character from the moral and social points of view. Also, it usually implies a deserving of severe punishment (such as condemnation, loss of freedom or, in the case of sin, loss of salvation) or of a definite legal penalty (such as a fine, imprisonment, or death). Therefore, when the term denotes responsibility for a crime or sin, it also carries implications of need of proof before punishment can be determined or forgiveness granted; as, though she was strongly suspected of murder, her guilt was not established until after her death; since he admitted his guilt, he saved the state the cost of a trial; to confess one's sins is to acknowledge one's guilt for those sins. Fault (as here considered: see also FAULT, 1) is often used in place of culpability as a simpler word; as, the fault is her parents', not the child's; "The faull, dear Brutus, is not in our stars, But in ourselves, that we are underlings" (Shak.); "That you are thus, the fault is mine" (Wordsworth).

Ana. Responsibility, accountability, answerability (see corresponding adjectives at RESPONSIBLE): censure, condemnation, denunciation, reprehension (see corresponding verbs at CRITICIZE).

Con. Commendation, compliment (see corresponding verbs at COMMEND): *applause, acclaim, plaudits, acclamation.

blameworthy. Blameworthy, guilty, culpable come into comparison in the sense of deserving reproach and punishment for a sinful or criminal act, practice, or condition. A person or his act or work is blameworthy that deserves blame or criticism and must suffer or receive reproach, censure, or even more severe punishment. "Thee [England] therefore still, blameworthy as thou art ... Thee I account still happy, and the chief Among the nations, seeing thou art free" (Cowper). A person is guilty who is justly chargeable with responsibility for a delinquency, crime, or sin, either in his own knowledge or in that of others, by his confession or by proof (often legal proof) of his responsibility: the term may stress either the fact that guilt has been proved or the fact or the fear of resulting punishment; as, the defendant was found guilty; "Suspicion always haunts the guilty mind; The thief doth fear each bush an officer" (Shak.); "Let no guilty man escape, if it can be avoided" (U. S. Grant). Often, the term suggests merely a state of mind, such as a consciousness that one has committed a sin or a crime, or a fear that one is justly suspected of wrongdoing or of a misdeed; as, a guilty conscience; "there is no use in making the refractory child feel guilty" (B. Russell). A person is culpable in an older and now rare sense of the word who has been found guilty (as, "I pray you all, Proceed no straiter 'gainst our Uncle Gloucester Than from true evidence. . . He be approved [i.e., proved] in practice culpable"—Shak.) or, in the now more common sense, has been shown to be blameworthy and open to severe censure or condemnation (as, "prove the pair not culpable, Free as unborn babe from connivance at, Participation in, their daughter's fault"—Browning). The term is also applicable to a blameworthy act, condition, practice, or the like, for which one is responsible or which leads to an accident, crime, etc.; as, culpable ignorance; culpable neglect; culpable disregard of others' safety.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ant. Blameless. — Con. Faultless, *impeccable, flawless.

blanch, v. *Whiten, bleach, decolorize, etiolate.

bland, adj. 1 Smooth, *suave, urbane, diplomatic, politic.

Ana. *Neutral, indifferent: *temperate, moderate: *insipid, flat, vapid, wishy-washy.

Ant. *Pungent, piquant: savory, tasty (see PALATABLE). — Con. Stimulating, exciting, quickening (see PROVOKE): thrilling, electrifying (see THRILL, v.).

blandish. Wheedle, cajole, *coax.

Ana. Allure, charm, bewitch, captivate (see ATTRACT): *lure, entice, seduce: beguile, delude (see DECEIVE).

Con. Constrain, oblige, coerce, compel, *force: drive, impel (see MOVE): *intimidate, cow, bulldoze, browbeat, bully.

blank, adj. Void, *empty, vacant, vacuous.

Ana. *Bare, barren: *clean.

Con. *Expressive, meaningful, significant, pregnant.

blasphemous. *Impious, profane, sacrilegious.

Ana. Cursing, damning, execrating, anathematizing, objugating (see EXECRATE): *irreligious, ungodly, godless.

Ant. Reverent.

blasphemy. 1 Blasphemy, profanity, swearing, cursing are here compared only as meaning impious or irreverent speech. Blasphemy, the strongest term (for its looser use, see PROFANATION), applies strictly to any intentional or malicious utterance in which the Supreme Being is defied or offered indignity; as such it is regarded as a serious sin in theology and as a crime at the common law. "Genuine blasphemy, genuine in spirit and not purely verbal, is the product of partial belief, and is as impossible to the complete atheist as to the perfect Christian" (T. S. Eliot). Profanity has a wider range, and includes all irreverent reference to holy things; it is particularly applied to speech in which the names of God, Jesus, and the Virgin Mary are used lightly and irreverently, and often coarsely, especially in giving vent to rage or passion in oaths, curses, and imprecations. "He [Mark Twain] had what one might call a preliminary recourse in his profanity, those 'scorching, singeing blasts' he was always directing at his companions" (Van W. Brooks). Swearing and cursing, as here considered, are forms of profanity, the former stressing indulgence in profane and often meaningless oaths; the latter, indulgence in profane curses or imprecations, as by calling on God to damn or punish the object of one's wrath or hatred. "Among labourers and others, that ungodly custom of swearing is too frequently heard, to the dishonour of God and contempt of authority" (Sir C. Wren). "Why, what an ass am I! . . . That I . . . must . . . unpack my heart with words, And fall a-cursing" (Shak.).

Ana. Insult, *affront, indignity: scurrility, vituperation (see ABUSE, n.).

Ant. Adoration. — Con. Worship, reverence, veneration (see under REVERE): *blessing, benediction, benison. 2 *Profanation, desecration, sacrilege.

Ana. Debasement, corruption, perversion (see corresponding verbs at DEBASE): misrepresentation, falsehood, untruth, *lie.

blast, n. Gust, gale, *wind, breeze, flaw, zephyr, hurricane, whirlwind, cyclone, typhoon, tornado, waterspout, twister.

blatant. Clamorous, *vociferous, strident, boisterous, obstreperous.

Ana. Assertive, self-assertive, pushing, *aggressive, militant: *vocal, articulate, voluble, glib: vulgar, *coarse, gross.

Ant. Decorous: reserved. — Con. *Silent, uncommunicative, reticent, taciturn: subdued, *tame: discreet, prudent (see under PRUDENCE).

blaze, n. Flare, flame, glare, glow. See under BLAZE, v.

Ana. Firing or fire, kindling, enkindling, igniting or ignition (see corresponding verbs at LIGHT): effulgence, refulgence, radiance, brilliance or brilliancy (see corresponding adjectives at BRIGHT).

blaze, v. Blaze, flame, flare, glare, glow are here compared both as verbs meaning to burn or appear to burn brightly and as nouns denoting a brightly burning light or fire. Blaze implies great activity in burning, the thorough kindling of the burning substance or material, and the radiation of intense light and, often, heat; as, the blazing noonday sun; "in one of these [clefs] a pine-fire was soon blazing" (J. Tyndall); "A few withered dry sticks, with which they made a blaze" (Defoe); "her eyes blazing in her white face" (Stevenson). Flame suggests a darting tongue or tongues of fire, formed by rapidly burning gas or vapor; it therefore often connotes less steadiness than blaze and sometimes less heat and light; as, the burning house was soon a mass of flames; the torches flamed in the wind; the dry fuel soon burst into flame; "dimmed hope's newly kindled flame" (Shelley). Flare implies flame or flames, especially a flame darting up suddenly against a dark background or from a dying fire; as, "torches that guttered and flared" (Hewlett). "He . . . lighted a cigarette and then remembered that the flare of the match could probably be seen from the station" (S. Anderson). Glare (see also GAZE) emphasizes the emission or reflection of bright light; it sometimes connotes an almost unendurable brilliancy; as, "dazed by the lantern glare" (Kipling); the snow glares in the sunlight; the glare of a forest fire in the sky; "He [Dante] . . . lets the fire glare on the sullen face for a moment, and it sears itself into the memory forever" (J. R. Lowell). "His [Augustus's] days were passed in the glare of publicity" (Buchan). Glow also stresses the emission of light, but it suggests an absence of flame and therefore connotes steadiness, intensity, radiance without effulgence, and often, warmth and duration; as, the glow of coals; "her fine effect of glowing from within as a lamp glows" (M. Austin). "The fire that burned within him, that glowed with so strange and marvellous a radiance in almost all he wrote" (A. Huxley).

bleach, v. *Whiten, etiolate, decolorize, blanch.

Ant. Dye.

blemish, n. Blemish, defect, flaw agree in denoting an imperfection. Blemish applies to what is external or superficial, such as a spot or a stain, as marring or disfiguring the appearance of an object; as, "on their sustaining garments not a blemish" (Shak.); "a lamb without blemish and without spot" (1 Peter i. 19); a reputation without a blemish. Defect implies the lack or want (which may or may not appear superficially) of something which is essential to completeness or perfection; as, a defect in the mechanism; a defect in the organs of vision; the defects of this poem are not obvious; a defect in an argument. A flaw is a defect in continuity or cohesion, such as a break, a crack, or a fissure; as, a flaw in a crystal; "Or some frail China jar receive a flaw" (Pope); "My love to thee is sound, sans crack or flaw" (Shak.); a flaw (or defect) in his character. "Style is not a sheet of glass in which the only thing that matters is the absence of flaws" (H. Ellis).

Ana. Blot, stain, *stigma: tainting or taint, pollution, defilement (see corresponding verbs at CONTAMINATE): *fault, failing, frailty: *lack, want, privation.

Ant. Immaculateness. — Con. Purity, simplicity (see corresponding adjectives at PURE): cleanness, cleanliness (see corresponding adjectives at CLEAN): clearness, transparency, pellucidity (see corresponding adjectives at CLEAR).

blench. Quail, shrink, *recoil, flinch, wince.

Ana. Evade, elude, avoid, shun, eschew, *escape: tremble, quiver, shudder, quake, *shake.

Con. *Bear, suffer, endure, abide, stand.

blend, v. Fuse, *mix, merge, coalesce, mingle, commingle, amalgamate.

Ana. Combine, unite (see JOIN): *integrate: consolidate, unify, *compact.

Ant. Resolve. — Con. *Analyze, break down: *separate, part, divorce: decompose, disintegrate (see DECAV).

blend, n. *Mixture, admixture, compound, composite, amalgam.

blessed. *Holy, sacred, divine, spiritual, religious.

Ant. Accursed.

blessedness. Beatitude, bliss, *happiness, felicity.

Ana. Enjoyment, fruition, joy, *pleasure.

Ant. Misery, dolor. — Con. Suffering, *distress, agony: woe, dole, anguish, *sorrow, grief.

blessing, n. Blessing, benediction, benison are not always clearly distinguished when they denote the religious act or ceremony in which a person, often a clergyman, blesses someone or something. The chief distinction between blessing and benediction is that blessing carries both of the major meanings of the verb bless; benediction carries but one of them. Consequently, a blessing may take the form of (1) a prayer of consecration or dedication of something to religious uses or of offering something to God (as, the blessing of a bell; a blessing [of food] before meals), (2) a prayer invoking God to give happiness (usually spiritual happiness) to someone, or to guard him from harm (as, "calling down a blessing on his head" [Tennyson]); none of the children left home to seek their fortune without their father's blessing). In some churches, especially the Roman Catholic Church, each of these prayers also includes the making of the sign of the cross over the person or thing blessed. Benediction, on the other hand, applies only to a prayer or ceremony invoking a blessing or blessings upon a person or persons. In this sense, it may be used interchangeably with blessing. However, it is the customary term for certain ceremonial blessings of an audience or congregation, such as the concluding prayer at a public assembly, or the service, in some Christian churches, known more fully as the Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, in which the Eucharistic Host is exhibited in a monstrance that is moved by the officiating priest so as to make the sign of the cross over the congregation. Benison is now archaic for benediction or blessing in the sense of benediction; it has no currency in ecclesiastical use and is found chiefly in poetry and literary prose; as, "God's benison go with you" (Shak.); "I have slept sound under such a benison" (Scott).

Ant. Curse. — Con. Imprecation, malediction, malison, anathema (see CURSE).

blimp. Balloon, airship, *aerostat, dirigible, zeppelin.

blind, adj. Blind, sightless, purblind come into comparison because they mean or have meant lacking the power to see or to discriminate objects. Blind still is used to imply absence or deprivation of the power of vision, either by congenital defect or as a result of disease or of an injury to the organs of vision; as, Milton was blind when he wrote Paradise Lost; "if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch" (Matthew xv. 14). In current English it is as often employed in a figurative sense, especially as implying a lack of the mental, moral, or spiritual vision essential to the perception or discernment of that which actually exists or that which is really true. "His divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness. . . . But he that lacketh these things is blind" (2 Peter i. 3-9). "Human nature is weak, and I am not a blind woman to insist that he is perfect" (Hardy). Blind is also applicable to things devoid of intelligence or of ability to know whither they are moving or tending (as, blind agencies; "blind, mechanical forces of society"—Wilde), or to acts, emotions, attitudes, and the like, which are the result of or which produce mental, moral, or spiritual blindness (as, blind terror; a blind acceptance of authority), or to spaces, structures, and the like, that are so dark or obscure or obstructed that one cannot see through, into, or around them (as, "air. . . blind with snow"—Cather); a blind wall; a blind alley; a blind corner. Sightless is sometimes the preferred term when total blindness is implied; as, the sightless Homer; "his letter talks of a disjointed thumb, a contusion on the hip, and a sightless eye" (Lucas). The term may also be used in place of blind when impenetrability to the vision is implied; usually, however, it applies to that which is actually invisible, though its existence is otherwise known; as, "Drown'd in yonder living blue The lark becomes a sightless song" (Tennyson). Purblind in literal use has long been obsolete in the sense of totally blind (as, "Purblind Argus, all eyes and no sight"—Shak.), but it still occasionally occurs in the sense of nearly blind, or without sight enough to do one's work or make one's way successfully. For a long time the term was applied to those whose sight was dimmed through age or disease; as, "Old Nanon the cook, purblind, stone-deaf, and all but imbecile" (M. E. Braddon). In current use, purblind is chiefly used in a figurative sense, implying the imperfection, sometimes the absence, of mental, moral, or spiritual vision, and usually connoting obtuseness or short-sightedness that comes from ignorance, stupidity, indifference, or the like; as, "the intolerable narrowness and the purblind conscience of the society" (G. Eliot); "the moral purblindness that accompanies all economic activities" (J. A. Hobson).

Con. Seeing, perceiving, discerning, noticing, noting (see SEE): *aware, alive, conscious, sensible, cognizant, awake.

blind, n. Stake, pot, ante, *bet, wager.

blink, v. *Wink.

Ana. Ignore, disregard, overlook, slight, *neglect: evade, elude, avoid, shun (see ESCAPE).

Con. *Sec, note, notice, observe, remark.

bliss. Beatitude, blessedness, felicity, *happiness.

Ana. Check, *arrest, interrupt: *hamper, clog, trammel: prohibit, *forbid, inhibit: *frustrate, thwart, foil: *prevent, forestall.

Con. *Advance, forward, further, promote.

blockade, n. Blockade, siege are here compared as denoting an attempt of a belligerent force to break down the resistance of the enemy by preventing egress or ingress of men or entrance of supplies over a considerable period of time. Blockade (etymologically, a blocking or obstructing) is used commonly, but not invariably, of an attempt made to close a port, harbor, or coast, especially by effectively investing it with warships, and in recent years with mines, so that fresh supplies of food, fuel, ammunition, and the like, are cut off from the enemy; as, to run a blockade; to raise a blockade; the allied blockade of the North Sea avenues to the German coast during the World War. Siege (etymologically, a sitting down) is applied chiefly to a military (as opposed to a naval) attempt. The term implies investment, commonly with troops, on all sides of a fortified place (often a metropolis). It also suggests, as blockade does not, frequent assaults by the besieging forces, as efforts to compel surrender; as, the Siege of Paris (Franco-Prussian War, 1870-71); the Siege of Vicksburg (1863 in the American Civil War).

bloodless. Anemic, *pale.

Ana. *Colorless, uncolored: wishy-washy, vapid, inane (see INSIPID).

Ant. Sanguine: plethoric. — Con. Vital, alive, *living: vivid, *graphic: *vigorous, lusty, nervous.

bloody. Bloody, sanguinary, sanguine, sanguineous, gory come into comparison when they mean affected by or involving the shedding of blood. Bloody may be used in place of any of the succeeding words, but it specifically and distinctively applies to that which is covered with blood or is of the nature of blood; as, a bloody knife, wound, sweat. Sanguinary usually, and bloody also when a simpler, more forcible word is desired, apply to that which is attended by, or bent upon, bloodshed; as, a sanguinary conflict, disposition, code; a bloody battle. Sanguine and sanguineous are, as here considered, used chiefly in a literary context in place of either of the preceding words, or specifically, implying a literal or figurative association with bleeding or bloodthirstiness, or the color of blood. "To find his way through the sanguine labyrinth of passion through which he was wandering" (Wilde). "His passion, cruel grown, took on a hue Fierce and sanguineous" (Keats). Gory sometimes suggests clotted blood, but more often it suggests a profusion of blood that testifies to slaughter; as, a gory blade; "never shake Thy gory locks at me" (Shak.); "Mad Ambition's gory hand" (Burns).

bloomer. *Error, mistake, blunder, bull, howler, boner, slip, lapse, faux pas, floater.

blot, n. *Stigma, brand, stain.

Ana. Taint, defilement, pollution (see corresponding verbs at CONTAMINATE): *blemish, flaw, defect: shame, *disgrace, ignominy, obloquy.

blot, v. In form blot out. Delete, dele, obliterate, expunge, *erase, cancel, efface.

Ana. *Abolish, annihilate, extinguish: wipe out, *exterminate, extirpate.

Con. Preserve, *save, conserve: imprint, print, impress, stamp (see corresponding nouns at IMPRESSION).

blowzy. Frowzy, *slatternly, dowdy.

Ana. Flashy, tawdry, *gaudy, garish: slovenly, sloppy, unkempt, *slipshod: florid, flamboyant (see ORNATE): vulgar, *coarse.

Ant. Smart, spruce: dainty. — Con. *Neat, tidy, trim, trig: fastidious, particular, *nice.

blubber, v. *Cry, weep, wail, keen, whimper.

bluejacket. *Mariner, sailor, seaman, tar, gob, matlow, rating.

blueprint, v. *Sketch, draft, trace, plot, diagram, delineate, outline.

blues. Dejection, depression, melancholy, gloom, dumps, vapors, *sadness.

bluff, adj. Bluff, blunt, brusque, curt, crusty, gruff agree in meaning abrupt and unceremonious in speech or manner. Bluff, the only term of the group used in a complimentary sense, connotes outspokenness, rough good nature, and unconventionality which bespeak a sincerity that scorns the forms of politeness; as, "bluff King Hal" (Scott); bluff honesty; a bluff sea captain. "The old gentleman was burly and bluff, very kind and generous, but passionate" (Crabb Robinson). Blunt (see also DULL) implies such directness and plain-speaking as to suggest lack of consideration for the feelings of others, and some disregard for the amenities of life; as, a blunt reply; blunt manners; "That dog does smell," said Lily, bluntly" (Bennett). "One always feels that he [Charles Whibley] is ready to say bluntly what every one else is afraid to say" (T. S. Eliot). Brusque suggests a certain (real or apparent) sharpness of manner and ungraciousness of speech; as, a brusque refusal. "I was nettled by her brusque manner of asserting her folly" (Conrad). "He [Augustus] could be trusted to deal fairly with opponents, and there was a brusque kindness even in his reproofs" (Buchan). Curt implies disconcerting shortness, or rude conciseness; as, a curt answer, nod. "Octavia . . . felt it to be her duty to join him [her husband, Antony], but a curt message from him bade her return at once to Rome" (Buchan). Crusty (literally, having a hard crust) implies a forbidding exterior and a manner marked by asperity or acerbity that sometimes belies real kindness of heart; as, a crusty bachelor; "He was a crusty old fellow, as close as a vise" (N. Hawthorne); "An old English gentleman, of great probity, some understanding, and very considerable crustiness" (Irving). Gruff carries a stronger implication of (real or seeming) surliness and roughness than crusty and distinctively suggests curt and hoarse or guttural utterance; as, "Gruff, disagreeable, sarcastic remarks" (Thackeray).

Ana. Hearty, *sincere: plain, open, *frank, candid: abrupt, *precipitate.

Ant. Suave, smooth. — Con. Urbane, diplomatic, bland (see SUAVE): courteous, courtly, gallant, polite, *civil.

blunder, n. Mistake, *error, bull, howler, boner, bloomer, slip, lapse, faux pas, floater.

Ana. *Fault, failing, frailty, vice: *anachronism, solecism: aberration, *deviation: transgression, violation, *breach.

blunt, 1 *Dull, obtuse.

Ant. Keen, sharp. — Con. Acute (see SHARP): penetrating, piercing, probing (see ENTER).

2 Brusque, curt, *bluff, gruff, crusty.

Ana. Plain, candid, *frank: *rude, discourteous, ungracious, uncivil, impolite: *forthright, downright.

Ant. Tactful: subtle. — Con. Diplomatic, politic, smooth, *suave, urbane.

blurb. Puff, review, critique, *criticism.

board, v. House, lodge, *harbor, shelter, entertain.

Ana. *Feed, nourish.

boast, v. Boast, brag, vaunt, crow, gasconade agree in meaning to give vent in speech to one's pride in oneself (or one's family, one's connections, one's race, one's accomplishments, or the like). Boast and vaunt are often used transitively as well as intransitively; the other words are chiefly intransitive in current good use. Boast is the general term; it may or may not carry a suggestion of contempt, or impute exaggeration, ostentation, vain-gloriousness, or the like, to the boaster; as, "what folly then To boast what arms can do!" (Milton); "The wretch... Abhors the craft he boasted of before" (Cowper); "And these dull swine of Thebes boast their descent" (Shelley); "He was childishly anxious to boast that he had walked the whole of the six or seven miles" (C. Mackenzie). Brag is more colloquial than boast, and carries a stronger implication of exaggeration and conceit; it often also implies glorying in one's superiority, or in what one can do as well as in what one is, or has, or has done. "Why, what are you?" "One, sir, that for his love dares yet do more Than you have heard him brag to you he will" (Shak.). "That we may brag we hae a lass, There's nane again sae bonie" (Burns). Vaunt is more literary than either of the preceding terms; it usually connotes more pomp and bombast than boast and less crudeness or naïveté than brag. "Charity [in R. V., love] vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up" (1 Corinthians xiii. 4). "And ye vaunted your fathomless power, and ye flaunted your iron pride" (Kipling). Crow (a colloquial term) usually implies exultant boasting or especially blatant bragging, in a manner suggestive of the triumphal crowing of a cock; as, the Blues were wont to crow over any team that met defeat at their hands; to crow over one's success in a competition. Gasconade (literally, to boast as the Gascons, a proverbially boastful people, do), the least common of these terms, implies habitual or extravagant self-vaunting. "The English reproach the French with gasconade, but they never gasconaded as the English do now" (J. Q. Adams).

Ana. Flaunt, parade (see SHOW): *pride, plume, pique, preen: *exalt, magnify, aggrandize.

Ant. Depreciate (oneself, one's accomplishments). —

Con. *Decry, disparage, belittle, minimize: deprecate (see DISAPPROVE).

boat. Boat, vessel, ship, craft, argosy come into comparison when they denote a floating structure designed to carry persons or goods over water. Boat is used as a general designation of such a structure only in extended use. Originally it was, and it still is, applicable chiefly to a small, typically open structure (such as might have been constructed by hollowing out and shaping the trunk of a tree) operated by oars, paddles, or poles (as a row-boat, a canoe, or a punt) or by sails or a power mechanism (as, a sailboat, a motorboat). Vessel etymologically suggests a purpose as well as a form, the term, in general, applying to anything hollowed out so as to serve as a receptacle. Hence, vessel is commonly preferred when the containing and transporting of goods and persons is stressed; it is applied chiefly to large boats, especially seagoing boats, in the business of carrying passengers or freight or serving as a base of operations at sea, as in fishing or in war; as, steam vessels; a fleet of war vessels including dreadnoughts, cruisers, destroyers, and submarines; fishing vessels; a line owning fifty vessels. Ship is the preferred term for the large seagoing vessel, especially when its navigation rather than its business is emphasized; as, a sailing ship; a steamship; a battleship; the captain stands by his ship (not vessel) or is the last to leave his ship. Ship also suggests more personality, more romance, and more beauty than the other words and therefore is far more common in poetry and in figurative use. "Sailing, Like a stately ship... Sails filled, and streamers waving" (Milton). "O Captain! my Captain! our fearful trip is done! The ship has weather'd every wrack, the prize we sought is won" (Whitman). Craft may be used as a singular or collective noun and is now applicable to any type of boat or ship that plies the water. Originally it was found only in the phrase small craft, and was applied to smaller vessels, especially to those in the service of ships, such as lighters, tugs, and fireboats, or to those forming part of a navy or fleet. The word has now nearly displaced the phrase, and although it is often used in the sense of small craft, it tends to become a comprehensive term covering all kinds of boats and vessels; as, the harbor is filled with craft. As a singular, craft unqualified is often a vague and general term. "For me, my craft is sailing on, Through mists to-day, clear seas anon" (J. K. Bangs). However, for that very reason, craft is often, when it is qualified, a better choice than boat, ship, or vessel; as, a huge, lumbering craft. "For she is such a smart little craft!" (W. S. Gilbert). Argosy, though it actually designates an old type of merchant vessel sailing the Mediterranean, is now a poetic or literary term for ship or vessel or, more rarely, for a fleet of ships. Usually it carries one or more of the poetic connotations of ship, but it also implies the transportation of treasures. "Venetian merchants with deep-laden argosies" (Longfellow).

bobby. *Policeman, officer, constable, peeler, copper, cop, bailiff, catchpole, gendarme, bull.

bock. *Beer, lager, ale, stout, porter.

bodily. Bodily, physical, corporeal, corporal, somatic are comparable when used narrowly and mean of or pertaining to the human body. Bodily suggests opposition to mental or intellectual; as, so engrossed in thought as to be unaware of his bodily needs; he has never known bodily pain. "Bodily illness is more easy to bear than mental" (Dickens). Physical (for more inclusive use, see MATERIAL), though often used interchangeably with bodily, does not carry so strong a suggestion of organic structure as the latter; thus, bodily suffering implies some disturbance within the organism or, if external, some stimulus directly affecting the organism; physical suffering may also mean this, but often it is vaguer and less explicit in its implications or reference; as, bodily pains induced by physical exhaustion; a sense of physical well-being is often the result of freedom from bodily ailments. Corporeal refers more specifically to the substance or matter of which the body is composed; like physical it has a more inclusive sense (see MATERIAL) but when used with reference to the human body, it implies an opposition to immaterial or to spiritual as applied to substance or nature; as, most Protestants do not believe in the corporeal presence of Jesus in the consecrated bread and wine. "Until, the breath of this corporeal frame... Almost suspended, we are laid asleep In body, and become a living soul" (Wordsworth). Corporal, originally synonymous with bodily in all its senses (as, "corporal soundness"—Shak.; "corporal servitude"—Milton), in present usage applies almost exclusively to things that have for their object an effect (painful or otherwise) upon the body; as, corporal works of mercy (that is, the seven duties of a Christian to others, so far as they affect the body, such as "to feed the hungry" and "to clothe the naked"); corporal (never corporeal) punishment; "He publicly professed his resolution of a violent and corporal revenge" (Johnson). Somatic, because of its freedom from theological and poetic connotations, is now preferred to bodily and corporeal by physiologists, psychologists, and the like, with an implied opposition to psychical; as, somatic reactions to a stimulus; a somatic disturbance; somatic behavior.

Ana. *Carnal, fleshly, animal, sensual.

Con. *Mental, psychic, intellectual: spiritual (see HOLY).

body. Body, corpse, carcass (or carcase), cadaver, stiff are terms used to denote the physical organism of a man or animal (especially one of the larger animals). Body refers to the animal organism, living or dead, but its commonest use is in reference to man, then often implying an opposition to mind or soul; as, "absent in body, but present in spirit" (1 Corinthians v. 3); men take great care of their bodies; they removed the body to a morgue. Corpse and carcass (of man and beast respectively) refer to the dead body; as, "Make a ring about the corpse of Caesar" (Shak.); "There was a swarm of bees and honey in the carcase of the lion" (Judges xiv. 8). Carcass is also used as a term of contempt for the human body, dead or alive; as, "On the bleak shore now lies th' abandoned king. A headless carcass, and a nameless thing" (Dryden); "to pamper his own carcass" (South). Cadaver (but cf. cadaverous at HAGGARD), and the slang term stiff apply to a corpse used for the purpose of dissection in a laboratory. In humorous use, cadaver is sometimes applied to living men, suggesting the appearance of a skeleton.

Con. *Soul, spirit: *mind, intellect, psyche, intelligence.

boggle. v. Stickle, stick, strain, scruple, *demur, balk, jib, shy.

Ana. *Object, protest, kick, remonstrate, expostulate: *recoil, shrink, flinch, wince, blench, quail.

Ant. Subscribe (to). — Con. Acquiesce, accede, *assent, agree: accept, admit, *receive.

bolsterous. Obstreperous, clamorous, blatant, *vociferous, strident.

Ana. Sporting, disporting, rollicking, frolicking, gambling (see under PLAY, v.): *unruly, ungovernable: *indecorous, unseemly.

Con. Quiet, noiseless, *still: peaceful, *calm, tranquil, serene, placid: staid, sedate, *serious, sober.

bold. Audacious, intrepid, dauntless, undaunted, *brave, courageous, valiant, valorous, doughty.

Ana. Daring, reckless, venturesome, *ad-venturous, daredevil, rash, foolhardy, temerarious: mettlesome, *spirited: fearless, unapprehensive, unafraid (see affirmative adjectives at FEARFUL).

Ant. Cowardly. — Con. *Timid, timorous: pusillanimous, craven, dastardly, recreant (see COWARDLY): quailing, flinching, shrinking, recoiling (see RECOIL).

Bolshevist. Communist, socialist, *collectivist, nihilist, anarchist.

bolt, v. Winnow, screen, *sift, sieve, riddle.

bombard. Assail, storm, assault, *attack.

bombast, n. Bombast, rhapsody, rant, fustian, rodomontade are all terms designating a kind of high-flown high-sounding speech or writing. All of them are derogatory in some degree; some of them are frankly contemptuous. Bombast does not necessarily connote emptiness of thought, but it always implies inflation, or a grandiosity or impressiveness in language and style which so outruns the thought that the attention is distracted from the matter and concentrated upon the manner of expression. When used in description rather than in censure, bombast often additionally suggests a soaring eloquence or a kind of oratorical grandeur, such as is found in Marlowe's Tamburlaine the Great or is characteristic of Elizabethan drama in comparison with modern realistic drama; when used in depreciation, it suggests padding, windiness, verbosity, "tall talking," and the like. "To outbrave better pens with the swelling bombast of a bragging blank verse" (Nash). "Their eloquence is all bombast" (Kingsley). "It [the verse of Jonson's Volpone] looks like mere 'rhetoric,' certainly not 'deeds and language such as men do use.' It appears to us [at first consideration], in fact, forced and flagitious bombast" (T. S. Eliot). Rhapsody, like bombast, may be scarcely or obviously derogatory. It designates a kind of ecstatic or effusive utterance or writing in which the language or style is governed by the feelings rather than by logical thought. It may, at one extreme, suggest inspired utterance as in rapture or, at the other, an almost maudlin loquaciousness. "O then my breast Should warble airs, whose rhapsodies should feast The ears of seraphims" (Quarles). "After some wild and vehement rhapsodies... he was easily persuaded to retire" (G. P. R. James). In learned use, however, it is often applied to a kind of writing that has no perceptible argument and is seemingly incoherent, yet moves, by a kind of logic of its own, from one expression of feeling or one image to another. "The poem [Hopkins's The Leaden Echo and the Golden Echo] must be read aloud, and with an unprejudiced intellect, for it is a sustained sensual rhapsody; something for which our acquaintance with civilized poetry leaves us unprepared" (Day Lewis). Rant and fustian, on the other hand, are definitely terms of derogation. Both are applicable to bombast and rhapsody at their worst, but rant stresses its extravagance or violence of expression or utterance, and fustian the banality of its quality or the preposterousness of its character. "Spend all the powers Of rant and rhapsody in virtue's praise; Be most sublimely good, verbosely grand, And with poetic trappings grace thy prose, Till it outmantle all the pride of verse" (Cowper). "He, whose fustian's so sublimely bad. It is not poetry but prose run mad" (Pope). "Romantic fustian; which may be defined as the enormous disproportion between emotion and the outer object or incident on which it expends itself. Victor Hugo abounds in fustian of this kind" (Babbitt). Rodromontade is applied especially to the rant of the braggart, of the demagogue, or of anyone given to bluster and magniloquence. "Until the general public can no longer be stampeded by rodomontade into actions contrary to self-interest no less than to common humanity, all sane advances towards true democracy will be very difficult" (Survey Graphic).

Ant. Counterfeit, bogus. — Con. Simulated, feigned, pretended, affected, shammed, assumed (see ASSUME).

bond, adj. *Bound, indentured, articulated.

Ant. Free. — Con. Emancipated, manumitted, liberated. (see FREE, v.): independent (see FREE, adj.).

bond, n. 1 Bond, band, tie are here considered as comprehensive terms which denote something which serves to bind or bring two or more things firmly together, and which differ from each other not only in implications but in their specific applications. Bond still often carries its original implication of restraint upon the freedom of the individual. In early use it was applied to any restraining device, such as a rope, a chain, a fetter, or a manacle which prevented a prisoner from escaping; in figurative use, it is still applicable to anything that interferes with one's liberty and holds one down; as, it has been said that only the dying man is free, for death breaks every bond. But bond also was applied early in its history to something that connects or brings together two individuals (persons or things), or all the individuals comprising a group or mass, into a stable union. In this sense the term may and often does refer to a connection that is primarily spiritual; occasionally, especially when the plural is used, there is also a hint of restraint or constraint; as, the bond (or bonds) of marriage; the bond of faith; the bond of fellowship; the bonds of a common tradition. "The religion of the Greeks [was]... the bond of their political life" (G. L. Dickinson). But the term is also used in reference to a connection that is purely material, especially by bricklayers, slaters, and others. In each trade where the term is used, it means a way of arranging the individual bricks, slates, blocks, or the like, so that the vertical joinings do not follow a straight line and the points of strain are precisely distributed, thereby producing a compact, thoroughly integrated wall or structure; thus, in bricklaying, the term "English bond" designates a way of arranging bricks in alternate rows so that the face of the wall presents one row in which the bricks are laid lengthwise, and a second row in which they are laid endwise, and so on. Band also in its history has carried some of these senses of bond, for in Middle English bond was a variant form of band when used in reference to something that restrains or something that unites. These uses of band are now largely archaic; as, to unite in the bands of marriage. On the other hand, band, which has a very complicated etymology, its meanings being derived not from one but from several sources, acquired the meaning of a strip of material (for its synonyms in this sense see STRIP). Therefore, when band now retains its earliest implications of a restraint, a fastening, a connection, it usually also implies something material in the form of a flat and narrow piece of material, sometimes one that is perfectly straight but often one that is rounded and forms a hoop, ring, or the like; thus, a band around the hair is worn to confine the hair and may be a ribbon with ends tied together, a metallic hoop or half-hoop, or the like; an endless strip of rubber or elastic material is called a rubber band; a hooplike piece which holds together two parts of a structure, such as the barrel and stock of a gun, two sections of a pillar, or the like, is called a band; also, a straight member of a wall, such as a continuous molding, a frieze, a strip of brickwork in a different pattern, often serves not only as an ornament but also as a union or connection between two sections of the wall or structure, and is therefore called in architecture a band. Tie was originally applied to a bond or band (for fastening or restraining) which was of a flexible substance, such as a rope, cord, or string, and could be secured by knotting the loose ends together or one end to the thing fastened and the other to its support. Consequently, in its extended and figurative use, tie tends to suggest a less integral union and often more flexibility in the connection than bond, which it otherwise closely resembles; thus, one breaks the bond of friendship but one severs the tie of friendship; the ties of blood suggest the pull exerted by blood relationship, but the bond of blood suggests an obligation or a duty. Tie, as applied to specific fastenings or connections, is used chiefly when the object of the connection is not, as in bond, to form into an integral unit or, as in band, to keep closely united or together, but to bring together two things that are affected by common forces so that when they are subjected to strain or tension they will not spread, pull apart, or the like; thus, the transverse bars on which rails rest and which serve to keep the rails equidistant from each other are in the United States called ties (in Great Britain sleepers); a beam, a post, a rod, or any piece which connects two parts or sides of a structure, such as the ribs of a vessel, the two sides of a pointed arch, and serves to brace and stay the whole, is called a tie. "The tie between the Dagonets, the du Lacs of Maryland, and their aristocratic Cornish kinsfolk, the Trevennas, had always remained close and cordial" (E. Wharton).

2 Surety, security, bail, *guarantee, guaranty.

bondage. *Servitude, slavery.

bookkeeper. Bookkeeper, accountant, auditor. A bookkeeper keeps a regular, concise, and accurate record of business transactions by making the proper entries in the various books of account for that purpose. An accountant is a person skilled in the art of bookkeeping and may be employed either to organize and set up a system of records suitable to the needs of a particular organization or to investigate and report upon the financial condition of an organization by a study and analysis of its books of record. An auditor is an examiner who checks and verifies the financial records of an organization to see that these records correctly represent its condition.

boon. Favor, *gift, present, gratuity, largess, fairing.

Ana. Benefaction, *donation, contribution: *blessing, benediction.

Ant. Calamity. — Con. *Misfortune, mischance: *trial, cross, tribulation, affliction.

boor. Boor, churl, lout, clown, clodhopper, bumpkin come into comparison as meaning an uncouth, ungainly fellow. Most of these words were applied originally to one of the lowest class of rustics or countrymen, but in present usage they imply reference to breeding, manners, and appearance oftener than to social status. The same distinctions in connotations and implications are apparent in the adjectives derived from the first four of these nouns, boorish, churlish, loutish, clownish. Boor, literally a peasant, implies an opposition to gentleman; originally, the contrast implied was in reference to social status; in current usage, the contrast is between characteristics, boor suggesting qualities that are the reverse of the good breeding and fineness of feeling now commonly implied by the term gentleman. As a rule, boor and boorish imply variously rudeness of manner, insensitivity, lack of ceremony, or unwillingness to be agreeable in the presence of others. "Love makes gentlemen even of boors, whether noble or villain, is the constant moral of mediaeval story" (H. Adams). "Comparing . . . a polished rascal with a boorish good man" (H. B. Stowe). Churl which originally meant man in the sense of husband, and somewhat later simply a free man without rank and therefore not of gentle, noble, or royal birth, has retained in modern usage this suggestion of low birth and, often, of independence of spirit, especially in one's attitude to social superiors. This latter implication is far more common in the adjective churlish, which characteristically implies surliness, irresponsiveness, or ungraciousness. "[He] warns all whom it concerns, from King to churl" (J. Morley). "By what magic was it that this divine sweet creature could be allied with that old churl!" (Meredith). "Who are the present tenants? I hear that they object to the dairymaids and men crossing the elm vista . . . It seems churlish, Lydia" (Shaw). "When she rebelled he disclosed the merest hint of his sullen-churlish side, and she at once yielded" (Bennett). Lout and loutish apply especially to hulky youths or men and usually suggest stupidity, clumsiness, and sometimes, abjectness of bearing or demeanor. Both words are terms of contempt frequently applied to idlers or loafers of particularly unprepossessing appearance. "It was inevitable that the older boys should become mischievous louts; they bullied and tormented and corrupted the younger boys because there was nothing else to do" (H. G. Wells). Clown, as here compared (see also fool, 2), and clownish applied originally, like boor and boorish, to a countryman, especially to one who works the soil, but their connotations are closer to those of lout and loutish. Instead of stupidity, however, the terms often connote ignorance or simplicity and instead of hulkeness they suggest the ungainliness of a person whose body and movements reveal hard plodding labor. "The clown, the child of nature, without guile" (Cowper). When used in reference to those who are not countrymen, the terms still imply general uncouthness and awkwardness, and often, by association with the other sense of clown, a propensity for absurd antics. "He was the sort of boy that becomes a clown and a lout as soon as he is not understood, or feels himself held cheap" (D. H. Lawrence). Clodhopper distinctively suggests the frame and the heavy movements generally associated with plowmen, but is not restricted in application to rustics; bumpkin implies a loutishness suggestive of unfamiliarity with city ways and manners; as, she indignantly referred to her partner in the dance as a clodhopper; "bashful country bumpkins!" (Irving).

Ant. Gentleman.

boorish. Churlish, loutish, clownish. See under boor.

Ana. *Awkward, clumsy, maladroit, inept: *rude, discourteous, ungracious, uncivil, impolite, ill-mannered.

bootlicker, bootlick. Sycophant, toady, lickspit, hanger-on, *parasite, favorite, leech, sponge.

booty. *Spoil, loot, plunder, pillage, prize, swag.

border, n. 1 Border, margin, verge, edge, rim, brim, brink agree in meaning the line or relatively narrow space which marks a (or the) limit or outermost bound of something. A border (see also BOUNDARY) is that part of a surface which is just within its boundary line; it is sometimes the boundary line itself; as, the border of a rug, of a flower bed; "I had at last reached the border of the forest" (Hudson). Margin denotes a border of definite width, or distinguished in some way from the remaining surface; it also applies to the space immediately contiguous to a body of water; as, the margin of a page; the margin of a lake or river. "They wandered onward till they reached the nether margin of the heath, where it became marshy, and merged in moorland" (Hardy). Verge applies chiefly in literal use to the line (sometimes to a very narrow space within that line) which sharply marks the limit or termination of a thing, such as a surface or an expanse; as, "The sky was clear from verge to verge" (Hardy); "the child . . . was balanced on the very verge [of the roof]" (Jefferies). Verge in figurative use is frequently applied to the extreme limit of something. "It is not enough that a statute goes to the verge of constitutional power. We must be able to see clearly that it goes beyond that power" (Justice Holmes). Sometimes, however, it refers to what is on the far (rather than the near) side of that line; as, he is on the verge of ruin or of suicide. An edge is a sharply defined terminating line made by the converging of two surfaces, as of a blade, a dish, a plank, a box, or the like. In strict use, edge often implies sharpness (as opposed to bluntness) and therefore power to cut; as, "A tool with a fine edge may do mischief" (Godwin); put an edge on this knife. It is this implication that comes out strongest in figurative use, where it often suggests asperity, trenchancy, keenness, and the like; as, there was an edge in his tone; "the edge had gone from his spirit, and he shrank from the long, toilsome road in front of him" (Buchan). Rim usually applies to the verge or edge of something circular or curving; as, the rim of the moon; the rim of a bucket, the rim of a wheel. Brim applies to the inner side of the rim of a hollow vessel (as, fill the pot to the brim) or to the topmost line of the basin of a river, lake, or other body of water (as, the river has risen to the brim). Brink denotes the edge of something steep; as, the brink of a precipice; on the brink of the grave; the river's brink (which differs from the river's brim in stressing the abruptness of the bank or shore rather than the close approach of the water to the basin's rim).

Ana. *Limit, bound, confine, end.

Con. Inside, interior (see corresponding adjectives at INNER).

2 *Boundary, march, frontier.

bore, v. *Perforate, drill, puncture, punch, prick.

Ana. Penetrate, pierce, *enter.

boredom. *Tedium, ennui, doldrums.

Ant. Amusement. — Con. Diversion, entertainment, recreation (see under AMUSE).

Ana. *Worry, harass, harry, pester, tease, tantalize; interfere, *meddle, tamper: *puzzle, perplex, distract; molest, trouble, *inconvenience, incommode, discom-mode.

Ant. Comfort. — Con. Solace, console (see COMFORT): appease, placate, *pacify, mollify, propitiate.

bough. Branch, limb, *shoot.

boulevard. Avenue, street, *road, roadway, highway, highroad, parkway, drive, terrace, thoroughfare.

bounce, v. *Dismiss, sack, fire, discharge, cashier, drop.

bound, n. *Limit, confine, end, term, bourn.

Ana. *Boundary, border, frontier, march: *border, verge, edge.

bound, v. *Skip, ricochet, hop, curvet, lope, lollap.

Ana. Dart, skim, scud (see FLY): *rebound, recoil, resile.

bound, adj. Bound, bond, indentured, articled are synonyms when they mean obliged to serve a master or in a clearly defined capacity for a certain number of years by the terms of a contract or mutual agreement. Bound not only stresses the obligation, but it also often connotes a condition of or approaching servitude. It frequently implies the status of an apprentice, that is, one obliged to serve a master for an agreed term in return for being taught a trade, a craft, an art, or a profession. It may, however, imply the status of an unskilled laborer, such as a domestic servant, who agrees to serve, as in a distant colony, in return for transportation, keep, and, in some instances, a wage; as, he emigrated from England to the American colonies as a bound servant. When the condition of servitude is emphasized, and service without a wage is implied, bond (placed before the noun) is often used in place of bound; as, bond servants; bondslaves. Indentured implies apprenticeship and emphasizes the fact that the agreement is in writing, has been executed in duplicate, and has legal validity. Usually it carries the implication of fairness and equity to both parties to the agreement; as, a tailor's indentured employees; a solicitor's indentured clerk. Sometimes, especially in reference to an apprentice in a law office, articled is preferred to indentured, though there seems to be no clear distinction between the two; as, he started out as an articled clerk in an attorney's office.

boundary. Boundary, border, march, frontier come into comparison when they mean a territorial dividing line, especially one between two states or countries. Boundary implies a fixed geographical limit so clearly ascertained and charted, and so definitely indicated by a line on maps, that its exact location is known and observed by parties on either side; as, he stood at the boundary, one foot in Massachusetts and the other in Connecticut; the president of the United States and the governor-general of Canada met at the boundary between the two countries; the boundary between France and Germany has shifted several times in the course of 150 years; so, in figurative use, "the arts have each their boundaries" (Binyon). Border (see also BORDER) is often used in place of boundary, but historically it is an older term, and seldom carries the connotations of exactness of location or of clear definition so strong in the latter term. Because of the use of border in reference to the entire district on both sides of the boundary between England and Scotland (called, especially by the Scots, The Border), the scene of many conflicts between the two peoples, the term now suggests the territory adjoining a boundary on both sides; as, border raids; fighting along the Mexican border; a strongly fortified border. March, which is now a historical or archaic term, is even less explicit in its connotations of exact location than border. It is never interchangeable with boundary because it does not suggest a clear dividing line, but rather a district in which lie the more or less debatable limits of each country's territory. Historically, it has been used chiefly by the English in reference to the borders between England and Wales, and England and Scotland. "He craved a fair permission to depart, And there defend his marches" (Tennyson). Frontier, etymologically the part of one country that fronts an adjoining country, is correctly applicable in this sense only to one side of a boundary or of a border; thus, one does not in very precise use say the frontier between France and Italy, but France's Italian frontier or Italy's French frontier. Frontier, in the United States, came to be associated with the imaginary or theoretical line marking the outmost bound of settled territory, a line that was constantly being advanced as the population increased and territory, especially to the west and south, became colonized. Consequently, in American use, a frontier is thought of as a shifting line, capable of being advanced or pushed forward by those willing to pioneer in unsettled territory or to venture beyond the lands already explored; as, in 1860 the American frontier was a line approximately corresponding to the present western boundaries of Minnesota and Iowa, and one drawn southward through the center of Kansas down through the middle of Texas; in 1940, the American frontier has practically disappeared. Frontier, in this sense, is now common in figurative use in reference to the advance of knowledge. "The frontiers of knowledge [are] being pushed farther into the unknown in the fields of the infinitely great (astronomy) and of the infinitely small (microscopy)" (A. C. Morrison).

Ana. *Limit, bound, confine, end, bourn: *border, verge, edge.

boundless. *Infinite, uncircumscribed, illimitable, eternal, sempiternal.

Ana. Vast, immense, *enormous: *monstrous, prodigious, tremendous, stupendous.

Con. Circumscribed, limited, confined, restricted (see LIMIT, v.).

bountiful. Generous, munificent, *liberal, handsome.

brash, adj. Brazen, barefaced, impudent, *shameless.

Ana. Bold, audacious (see BRAVE): temerarious, rash, reckless (see ADVENTUROUS): impetuous, headlong, abrupt, *precipitate: intrusive, officious, *impertinent.

Ant. Wary. — Con. *Cautious, chary, circumspect: *timid, timorous: reserved (see SILENT): discreet (see under PRUDENCE).

bravado. *Bravery, bravura.

Ana. Pompousness, pretentiousness, ostentatiousness or ostentation (see corresponding adjectives at SNOWY): *display, parade, pomp: vainglory, vanity, *pride: gasconading, vaunting, bragging, boasting (see BOAST): strutting, swaggering (see STRUT).

Ant. Diffidence, modesty.

brave, adj. 1 Brave, courageous, bold, audacious, dauntless, undaunted, intrepid, valiant, valorous, doughty come into comparison in the sense of having or showing fearlessness in meeting that which is dangerous, difficult, or unknown. Brave usually implies resolution and self-control in meeting, without flinching, a situation that inspires fear, rather than a temperamental liking for danger. "The brave man is not he who feels no fear ... But he, whose noble soul its fear subdues, And bravely dares the danger nature shrinks from" (J. Baillie). Courageous stresses stoutheartedness and firmness of temper: it therefore implies either a temperamental readiness to encounter dangers or difficulties that test one's spirit or resolution, or an ability in the face of actual danger or difficulty to do what is required of one; as, few were courageous enough to answer the call for volunteer rescuers; courageous in telling the truth. "A man is courageous when he does things which others might fail to do owing to fear" (B. Russell). "His mother was so strong, so courageous, the only strong and courageous influence he [Mark Twain] knew" (Van W. Brooks). Bold implies either a temperamental liking for danger or a willingness to court danger or to dare the unknown, especially when something important is at stake. There is nearly always in bold a connotation of pushing forward without hesitation, sometimes courageously, always daringly, sometimes presumptuously, and sometimes defiantly; as, only a bold man would beard the lion in his den; "What makes robbers bold but too much lenity?" (Shak.); "penalties...not immediate enough nor real enough to deter a bold child" (Shaw). Audacious, in contrast with bold, gives greater emphasis to the idea of recklessness or imprudence in daring, and when it implies presumptuousness, usually adds a suggestion of effrontery. "This seems a fairly obvious notion, as I write it down in the spring of 1936; but in the spring of 1926 it was audacious" (Karl K. Darrow). "The compound insolence of this amused the Strong Man, and...he listened to the proposals of the audacious Tarrion" (Kipling). Dauntless and undaunted imply such boldness and fearlessness that, in the case of the first, one cannot be intimidated, cowed, discouraged, or subdued, or, in the case of the second, one has either come out uncowed, undefeated, or unsubdued from a violent struggle or great dangers or hardships, or has shown no fear in the anticipation of such struggle, dangers, or hardships; as, "Helen Keller...the product of a miracle of human love and dauntless patience" (Times Lit. Sup.); "To war they follow their undaunted King" (Dryden). Intrepid etymologically implies complete absence of fear: it is often so used, especially in its derivative noun intrepidity; the adjective, however, commonly stresses dauntlessness and the capacity for meeting courageously and enduring with fortitude whatever happens; as, an intrepid explorer or pioneer; the intrepid prosecutor of graft. Valiant originally implied conspicuous physical strength or the might of a hero: it now stresses heroic courage and fortitude, not only in meeting danger but sometimes in achieving one's ends; as, "the valiant champions of new ideals" (S. Alexander); "Against all these...forces the critic and historian must make a valiant struggle" (L. P. Smith). "Cowards die many times before their deaths; The valiant never taste of death but once" (Shak.). Valorous differs from valiant chiefly in its weaker implication of fortitude and in its stronger suggestion of illustriousness. Though not limited in their applications, valorous more often qualifies accomplishments, and valiant qualifies persons or their exertions; as, "valorous feats of arms" (Caxton); the valorous deeds of the valiant defenders of Troy; "The whole universe will acknowledge those valorous efforts" (Wellington); "I, therefore, made him of our Table Round...One of our noblest, our most valorous" (Tennyson). Doughty adds to valiant the implication of formidableness: it is now seldom used except when an archaic flavor or a burlesque effect is desired; as, the doughty deeds of doughty knights of old; a doughty critic. "Its heroes [those of the heroic age] were doughty men to whom diabolic visitors were no more unusual than angelic ones" (J. W. Krutch).

Ana. Daring, venturesome, venturesome, daredevil, *adventurous: heroic, gallant (see corresponding nouns at HEROISM): plucky, gritty (see corresponding nouns at FORTITUDE).

Ant. Craven. — Con. *Cowardly, pusillanimous, poltroon, recreant: *timid, timorous: shrinking, flinching, blenching (see RECOIL, v.).

2 *Stylish, braw, smart, fashionable, modish, dapper, dashing, spruce, natty, chic, nifty, nobby, posh, toffish.

bravery. Bravery, bravado, bravura are here compared only as meaning a dashing or showy style or manner. All three words in this sense bear little relation to the adjective brave in its sense of courageous (see BRAVE), but come closer to the implications of its secondary sense: marked by fine show or display. In such use, bravery refers chiefly to dress, trappings, furnishings, or the like, and implies splendor or gorgeousness, or a showy, dandyish appearance. "The Queen's three thousand robes were rivalled in their bravery by the slashed velvets, the ruffs, the jeweled purpinks of the courtiers around her" (J. R. Green). "In the bravery of light gloves, buff waistcoats, feathers, and frocks" (Galsworthy). Bravado has reference to the manner and spirit of a person rather than to his appearance; it implies swaggering, defiance, daring, and usually, an affected display of outward signs of power and wealth or of courage. "In those days she was completely reckless; did the most idiotic things out of bravado" (V. Woolf). "When he spent money furiously, he did it with bravado, too conscious of grandeur and too conscious of the difficulties of acquiring that which he threw away" (Bennett). Bravura has reference chiefly to style of singing, playing, painting, and the like; it connotes spirit, brilliancy, or dash of execution, but often carries a suggestion of pretentiousness rather than power. In music, the term is often applied to a type of composition intended for bravura performance. "Listening to a lady amateur skylark it up and down through the finest bravura of Rossini or Mozart" (Irving). The word is, however, used of other arts than those of music or painting. "Occasionally he writes in simplicity as well as sincerity, without labored linguistic bravuras" (The Nation).

Ana. Stylishness or style, fashionableness or fashion, smartness, dashingness or dash, modishness (see corresponding adjectives at STYLISH): ostentatiousness or ostentation, showiness or show (see corresponding adjectives at SHOWY): parade, array, pomp, *display.

bravo. *Assassin, cutthroat, gunman, trigger man, finger man.

Ana. *Ruffian, thug, Mohock, desperado, gangster, apache.

bravura. *Bravery, bravado.

braw. Brave, *stylish, dashing, dapper, fashionable, modish, smart, chic, spruce, natty, nifty, nobby, posh, toffish.

brawl, n. Brawl, broil, fracas, melee, row, rumpus, scrap are here compared as meaning a noisy fight or quarrel. Brawl implies angry contentions, blows, and a noisy racket; it usually suggests participation by several persons; as, a family brawl that kept the neighbors awake; a drunken brawl; street brauls. Broil stresses disorder, confusion, and turmoil among the combatants more than the disturbance they cause others. The term may be used contemptuously in place of war, conflict, or controversy (as, "plunging us in all the broils of the European nations"—Jefferson), but it is more often used of a violent fight or quarrel where the issues are not clear or significant or where the opposing parties are not clearly distinguished, "O, how this discord doth afflict my soul! . . . Who should study to prefer a peace, if holy churchmen take delight in broils?" (Shak.). "But village mirth breeds contests, broils, and blows" (Shelley). Fracas is applicable to any noisy quarrel, especially to one that leads to blows; the term does not suggest as much vulgarity or as many participants as brawl, but it may imply as much noise and excitement. "There was suddenly a fracas, and one of them clenched his fists and hit another full in the face" (Lucas). Melee is still, as originally, applied chiefly to a more or less disorganized hand-to-hand conflict, especially between soldiers, or to a dispute which resembles such a combat in disorderliness or in violation of parliamentary rules. "Lacey's pistol was in his hand, David's sword was gripped tight as they rushed upon the mêlée. Lacey's pistol snapped, and an Arab fell" (G. Parker). However, in current use, the emphasis is increasingly on confusion and mix-up, and often the implication of combat or contention is weakened or lost. "The calmness of the platform was transformed into a mêlée. Little Constance found herself left on the fringe of a physically agitated crowd which was apparently trying to scale a precipice surmounted by windows and doors" (Bennett). Row is a colloquial term applicable to any fight, whether a quarrel, a squabble, or a dispute, that is so public or so noisy as to attract attention; as, the school bully kicks up a row every time he forces himself into a game; there is no sense in making a row when you are not properly served, for it ends only in making all the waiters hate you. Rumpus, also a colloquial term, suggests even greater agitation and disturbance than row, for it usually connotes an uproar. "You incur my serious displeasure if you move one inch in this contemptible rumpus" (Scott). Scrap is a slang term; originally, it seems, a boxer's term, applicable to any fight or fracas. It usually suggests a physical tussle but often, in ordinary use, it implies little more than a noisy, sharp quarrel; as, the boys are good friends but they have many a scrap.

Ana. Conflict, fight, fray, affray (see CONTEST): contention, dissension, strife, *discord: wrangle, altercation, *quarrel, squabble: uproar, racket, *din, hubbub.

brawny. *Muscular, burly, husky, sinewy, athletic.

Ana. Stalwart, *strong, sturdy, stout, tough: *fleshy.

Ant. Scrawny. — Con. Lanky, lank, gaunt, rawboned, *lean, spare, skinny: *thin, slender, slight, slim.

brazen. *Shameless, brash, impudent.

Ana. Callous, *hardened, indurated: insolent, arrogant (see PROUD): temerarious, rash, reckless (see ADVENTUROUS): bold, audacious (see BRAVE).

Ant. Bashful. — Con. *Shy, diffident, modest, coy: *timid, timorous: stealthy, surreptitious, underhand, *secret.

breach, n. Breach, infraction, violation, transgression, trespass, infringement, contravention are here compared as denoting the act or the offense of one who fails to keep the law or to do what the law, one's duty, or an obligation requires. Breach (etymologically, a break) occurs rarely by itself, except in phrases such as "a law more honored in the breach than in the observance." The word is usually followed by of and a noun or pronoun which indicates the thing which is broken or not kept; as, a breach of discipline; his action constitutes a breach of faith; he was found guilty of a breach of the peace (i.e., of noisy, disorderly, or annoying conduct); to be sued for breach of promise or breach of contract. Infraction is now more often used than breach (except in certain time-honored idioms) for any breaking of a law or obligation; as, an infraction of the school rules; an infraction of a treaty; an infraction of canon law. "We have scrutinized the case, but cannot say that it shows an infraction of rights under the Constitution of the United States" (Justice Holmes). Violation adds to breach and infraction the implication of flagrant disregard of the law or of the rights of others and often suggests the exercise of force or violence; thus, the violation of a treaty suggests positive, often aggressive and injurious, action rather than a mere failure to keep one's engagements; so, a violation of military discipline; the police interference was a violation of the right to free assembly. "When more of the people's sustenance is exacted through the form of taxation than is necessary to meet the just obligations of Government . . . such exaction becomes ruthless extortion and a violation of the fundamental principles of a free Government" (G. Cleveland). Transgression (etymologically, a stepping across) is applied to any act that goes beyond the limits prescribed by a law, rule, order, or the like; often the term is used specifically of an infraction of the moral law or of one of the commandments; as, "for sin is the transgression of the law" (1 John iii. 4); "'I was forgetting,' she said. 'I am forbidden tea.' . . . She looked at the cup, tremendously tempted. . . . An occasional transgression could not harm her" (Bennett). Trespass also implies, etymologically, an overstepping of prescribed bounds, but it carries in addition a strong implication of encroachment upon the rights, the comfort, or the property of others. In Scriptural and religious use, a trespass is particularly an offense against God or one's neighbor; as, "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses" (Matthew vi. 15). In law, a trespass is an unlawful act, involving force or violence, committed against the person, the property, or the rights of another; thus, the passing through another's premises against his wish or without his invitation constitutes a trespass; a burglar who is frightened away before he actually enters a house is liable to arrest for trespass. Infringement is sometimes used as though it were identical in meaning with infraction; as, an infringement of the law; an infringement of a treaty. In current use, however, it implies trespass more often than violation, and therefore is the idiomatic term when trespass involving an encroachment upon a legally protected right or privilege is implied; thus, the unauthorized manufacture of something which has been patented constitutes an infringement of a patent; the unauthorized reproduction and sale of matter already copyrighted by a publisher or by an author, engraver, photographer, or the like constitutes an infringement of the copyright; so, an infringement upon the rights of property owners; an infringement on the liberty of the American people. Contravention applies specifically to a going contrary to the intent of the law or to an act in defiance of what is regarded as right, lawful, obligatory, or the like; as, "Warrants in contravention of the acts of Parliament" (Macaulay); "if there is in a work of art a contravention of nature" (Lowes).

Ant. Overtreach.

bread or bread and butter. Sustenance, *living, livelihood, subsistence, maintenance, support, keep.

break, n. Chance, *opportunity, occasion, time, tide, hint.

breakdown, n. Analysis, resolution, dissection, anatomy. See under ANALYZE.

break down. *Analyze, resolve, dissect, anatomize.

breeding. Cultivation, *culture, refinement.

Ana. *Tact, address, poise, savoir-faire: *courtesy, amenity, gallantry: grace, dignity, *elegance.

Ant. Vulgarity. — Con. Boorishness, churlishness (see primitive nouns at BOOR): grossness, coarseness (see corresponding adjectives at COARSE): rudeness, discourteousness or discourtesy, ungraciousness (see corresponding adjectives at RUDE).

breeze. *Wind, gust, flaw, zephyr, blast, gale, whirlwind, cyclone, typhoon, tornado, waterspout, twister.

bridle, v. 1 Check, curb, *restrain, snaffle, inhibit.

Ana. Repress, *suppress: *govern, rule: control, direct, manage (see CONDUCT).

Ant. Vent. — Con. *Express, utter, air, voice, ventilate.

2 Bristle, ruffle, *strut, swagger.

Ana. Posture, attitudinize, pose (see under POSTURE, n.): plume, preen, pique, *pride.

Con. Grovel, *wallow: cringe, cower (see FAWN): wince, flinch (see RECOIL).

brief, adj. Brief, short are the most comprehensive adjectives in English meaning not long. Brief refers primarily to duration; short, to either duration or linear extent; as, a brief interview, discourse; a short sermon, time, distance; short legs or grass. As applied to duration, brief and short are sometimes complete synonyms (as, a brief, or a short, battle). But short frequently (not always) suggests incompleteness, curtailment, or sudden stoppage; brief sometimes (but not always) implies condensation; as, he cut his speech short; he made his speech as brief as possible. As applied to linear extent, brief is chiefly humorous and means extremely short; as, a brief skirt.

Ana. *Transient, fleeting, passing, momentary, short-lived: *concise, terse, succinct, laconic, pithy: compacted or compact, concentrated (see corresponding verbs at COMPACT): shortened, abbreviated, abridged, curtailed (see SHORTEN).

Ant. Prolonged, protracted. — Con. Lengthened or lengthy, extended or extensive, elongated (see corresponding verbs at EXTEND).

brief, n. Abstract, epitome, *abridgment, synopsis, conspectus.

brigand, n. Brigand, bandit, highwayman, footpad, marauder come into comparison as more or less literary (sometimes journalistic) terms denoting a person who roves about in search of plunder. Brigand was originally applied to one of a class of lightly armed foot soldiers, many of whom exercised their wartime right of pillage and plundering in times of peace. Later, it was applied to any of the armed rovers who, working singly or in bands, infested lonely places, especially the mountainous districts of the Mediterranean countries, and robbed travelers or held them for ransom. In current extended use, it is applied to any armed robber who preys on travelers or defenseless persons, especially in unpopulated or sparsely populated sections of a country. "François, with his belt, sabre, and pistols, had much the aspect of a Greek brigand" (B. Taylor). In current newspaper use, brigand is often applied to any person who, in effect, preys upon the weak and defenseless, by unscrupulous use of wealth or power. Strictly, a bandit is an outlaw or proscribed person; in actual use, however, the word is applied to any of an organized band or gang of outlawed, lawless, or hunted men who infest certain districts, especially remote districts, indulging not only in terrorism and brigandage but also in other lawless acts and depredations. In current newspaper use, bandit is often employed as the equivalent of gangster (as, the bank was held up by armed bandits). Brigand and bandit overlap in implications, but they differ widely in their historical connotations. A highwayman is a robber who roves over a highway or post road waylaying carriages and stagecoaches and forcing their occupants to surrender their valuables. In strict use, a highwayman is commonly distinguished from a footpad, the former term being applied to a highway robber on horseback, the latter to a highway robber on foot. Marauder is usually applied to a plunderer or robber whose method is incursion or raid rather than waylaying or ambushing; it often connotes the lawless actions of vagabonds, nomads, undisciplined soldiers, or camp followers; as, the inhabitants of the Scottish Border in the late Middle Ages were at the mercy of English marauders; marauders descended on the caravan by night and carried away everything of value; the marauder who had visited the henhouse nightly turned out to be a fox.

Ana. Gangster, desperado, *ruffian.

bright, adj. 1 Bright, brilliant, radiant, luminous, lustrous, effulgent, refulgent, beaming, beamy, lambent, lucent come into comparison when they mean actually or seemingly shining or glowing with light. Bright implies an opposition to dim or dull; it applies chiefly to things that vary in the degree in which they shed light or are pervaded by light, according to circumstances; thus, when used in reference to a fire, burning coals, or the like, it suggests a good draft and flames; when used in reference to a day, it implies lack of clouds, fog, smoke, or other obstacles to the passage of sunlight; so, a bright sky; a bright star; a bright sword; bright eyes; a bright color. Brilliant (see also INTELLIGENT) implies conspicuous or intense brightness; it also often connotes scintillating or flashing light; as, a well-cut diamond is the most brilliant of gems; the sun is too brilliant for the human eye; a brilliant smile; "Madame Olenska's face grew brilliant with pleasure" (E. Wharton). "What one saw when one looked about was that brilliant blue world of stinging air and moving cloud" (Cather). Radiant, in contrast with bright and brilliant, stresses the emission or seeming emission of rays of light; it suggests, therefore, a property or power possessed by a thing rather than a quality ascribed to it because of its effect on the vision; thus, a celestial body is properly described as radiant only when it emits rays of light; a planet, no matter how bright it appears to the eye, is preferably described as bright or brilliant because it shines by reflected light. "Virtue could see to do what Virtue would. By her own radiant light, though sun and moon. Were in the flat sea sunk" (Milton). The term, however, is used loosely, but still correctly, of anything that seems to give out light in the manner of the sun or a star. "In warlike armour drest, Golden, all radiant!" (Shelley). "Just bagged a splendid bird!" radiant Richard informed him" (Meredith). Luminous, like radiant, suggests emission of light, but unlike it, seldom implies the sending forth of rays; also, it is applicable to anything that shines by reflected light or that shines (brightly or dimly) in the dark because of some chemical, physiological, or other cause; as, all celestial bodies are luminous, but only self-luminous bodies (stars in the strict astronomical sense) are also radiant; phosphorus is a luminous substance. As applied to color or to colored things, the term implies more than bright for it usually suggests a jewel-like quality (as, the luminous green of the emerald) or iridescence. "The blue off Nantucket is not the miracle of luminous, translucent color off Sardinia" (Lowes). "He [Audubon] painted a tall sandhill crane. . . finding a posture that displayed the rich luminous gray feathers" (C. Rourke). As applied to ideas or their expression, the term implies crystalline clearness and the absence of all obscurity; as, a luminous treatment of a subject; "A luminous statement" (Brougham). Lustrous is applied only to an object (often an opaque object) whose surface reflects light; it therefore seldom implies pervading light, but rather a brilliant or iridescent sheen or gloss; as, the lustrous brass of a burnished lamp; the lustrous surface of an enameled vase; lustrous satin. Effulgent implies excessive radiance; it is often used as an intensive of radiant, especially in the looser senses of the latter term; as, an effulgent smile; her effulgent beauty. Refulgent etymologically suggests light cast back; the term, in very precise use, implies brilliant reflected light or a radiance emanating from something not seen; as, a refulgent crystal chandelier. "We gazed, in silence hushed, with eyes intent On the refulgent spectacle [of rays of light shooting up from the sunken sun]" (Wordsworth). Beaming and beamy (the rarer and poetical form) literally imply emission of a beam or beams (see beam under RAY). "The . . . rising moon, Fair beaming, and streaming Her silver light the boughs amang" (Burns); "beamy radiance" (Wordsworth). In commonest use, however, as applied to looks or expression, beaming suggests a display (often a naïve display) of happiness, satisfaction, or the like; as, the beaming eyes of children greeting Santa Claus; "broad beaming smile" (G. Eliot). Lambent is applied to a thing, such as a flame or a luminous body, which throws a play of light over an object or surface without rendering it brilliant or lustrous. "The lambent flame of genius . . . lights up the universe" (Hazlitt); "lambent lightning-fire" (Shelley). Often, lambent suggests the emission of soft gleams of light. "Kind, quiet, near-sighted eyes, which his round spectacles magnified into lambent moons" (M. Deland). Lucent, a highly poetical or literary adjective, approaches luminous or, less often, lustrous, in its meaning: it is usually applied to that which is transfigured by light from the sun, a fire, or the like; as, "the lucent fume of the city's smoke rising up [in the early morning sky]" (C. Mackenzie); "Till every particle glowed. . . And slowly seemed to turn To lucent amber" (W. W. Gibson).

Ana. Illuminated, illumined, lighted, lightened, enlightened (see ILLUMINATE): flashing, gleaming, glistening, sparkling (see FLASH, v.): glowing, flaming (see BLAZE, v.)

Ant. Dull: dim. — Con. Dusky, murky, gloomy, *dark, obscure, dusk, darkling, opaque: *colorless, uncolored: *pale, pallid, ashen, livid.

2 Smart, quick-witted, brilliant, clever, *intelligent, knowing, alert.

Ana. *Sharp, keen, acute: *quick, ready, prompt, apt: precocious, advanced (see PREMATURE).

Ant. Dense, dull (mentally). — Con. *Stupid, crass, dumb: *lethargic, sluggish: phlegmatic, stolid, *impassive.

brilliant. 1 Radiant, luminous, *bright, effulgent, lustrous, refulgent, beaming, beamy, lambent, lucent.

Ana. Flashing, scintillating, sparkling, gleaming, glittering, coruscating (see FLASH, v.): blazing, flaming, flaring, glowing (see BLAZE, v.).

Ant. Subdued (of light, color, etc.). — Con. Gloomy, murky, obscure, dim, dusky (see DARK)

2 *Intelligent, clever, bright, smart, alert, quick-witted, knowing.

Ana. Erudite, *learned, scholarly, polymathic: sage, sapient, *wise.

Ant. Crass. — Con. *Stupid, dull, dense, dumb.

brim. Rim, edge, brink, *border, verge, margin.

bring. Bring, take, fetch are not synonyms, but in the sense of to convey from one place to another they are often misused. Bring implies carrying, leading, or transporting from a distance to the point where the speaker or agent is or will be; take a carrying, leading, or conducting to a point away from the one where the speaker or agent is or will be; thus, a mother asks her boy setting out for school to take a note to the teacher and to bring home a reply; a farmer takes his cattle to the market and brings back a supply of sugar, flour, and fresh meat. Fetch implies going to a place where something is to be found, getting it, and bringing it back to the starting point; as, please fetch me a chair from the next room; I shall fetch whatever you need. "He called to her, and said, Fetch me, I pray thee, a little water in a vessel, that I may drink. And as she was going to fetch it, he called to her, and said, Bring me, I pray thee, a morsel of bread in thine hand" (1 Kings xvii. 10, 11).

Ana. Bear, *carry, convey: obtain, procure, *get.

Ant. Withdraw, remove.

brink. Verge, edge, *border, rim, margin.

Ana. *Limit, bound, end, confine, bourn: *shore, strand, coast.

brisk. Nimble, *agile, spry.

Ana. *Fast, quick, rapid, fleet, swift, speedy: ready, prompt, *quick: dynamic, live, *active.

Ant. Sluggish. — Con. *Lethargic, torpid, comatose: *lazy, indolent, slothful, fainéant: *inactive, inert, idle.

bristle. v. Bridle, ruffle, *strut, swagger.

Ana. Preen, plume, *pride, pique: evince, manifest, *show, evidence: flaunt, parade, display, exhibit (see SHOW).

Con. Conceal, *hide, bury.

British. *English, Anglican, Anglo-Saxon.

brittle. Crisp, *fragile, frangible, short, friable.

Ana. *Hardened, indurated.

Ant. Supple. — Con. *Elastic, resilient, springy, flexible: tough, tenacious, *strong, stout.

broach. v. Voice, utter, *express, vent, air, ventilate.

Ana. *Reveal, disclose, divulge: *introduce, interject, interpose.

broad. adj. Broad, wide, deep come into comparison chiefly when they mean measuring so much (inches, feet, meters, etc.) horizontally. Broad, wide, and often, deep (see also DEEP) apply to surfaces or areas as measured from side to side. Broad and wide, however, suggest a measurement from one side to the other of a surface, when the length is the same as the height; as, a picture two feet wide; a screen five feet broad. Broad and wide always, and deep only in some instances, may be used of surfaces that spread away from one; thus, a river may be a half mile wide or broad (but not deep, which would here refer only to vertical distance) at a given point, but a flower border may be four feet wide, broad, or preferably, deep. When a plot of ground or similar area is measured, broad or, especially, wide is used of the distance from one side to the other and deep of that from front line to back line; as, the lot is 33 feet wide and 100 feet deep. Broad and wide are frequently interchangeable when used descriptively to mean having relatively great extent across or from side to side; as, a broad or wide street, ribbon, margin. But broad commonly applies only to surfaces or areas as such; as, a broad leaf, a broad-headed tack, broad-shouldered. Wide applies also to apertures, or to that which (literally or figuratively) opens or spreads. Wide, therefore, is the preferred term when the emphasis is upon the distance between limits rather than on the extent of the intervening surface; as, a wide wound; a wide opening; a wide view. Deep, in similar descriptive use, when it carries an implication only of horizontal extent, is applicable only to something that has great extent backward as from an opening or from the front; as, a deep forest; a deep cavern; a deep lot.

Ana. Extended or extensive (see EXTEND): *spacious, capacious, commodious, ample: vast, immense (see ENORMOUS): expanded, dilated (see EXPAND).

Ant. Narrow. — Con. Strait (see NARROW): confined, circumscribed, limited, restricted (see LIMIT, v.).

broadcast. v. Promulgate, publish, advertise, announce, *declare, proclaim.

broadcasting. Promulgation, publication, advertisement, announcement, declaration, proclamation. See under DECLARE.

Brobdingnagian. *Enormous, immense, huge, vast, gigantic, giant, gigantean, colossal, mammoth, elephant-tine, titanic, herculean, Cyclopean, Antaeon, Gargantuan.

Ant. Lilliputian.

broil. v. Grill, barbecue, *bake, roast.

broil. n. Fracas, melee, row, *brawl, rumpus, scrap.

Ana. Fray, affray, fight, conflict, combat, *contest: altercation, wrangle, *quarrel: *contention, strife, dissension, conflict (see DISCORD).

bromide. Cliché, platitude, truism, *commonplace.

brook. v. Stand, abide, *bear, tolerate, suffer, endure.

browbeat. Bulldoze, bully, *intimidate, cow.

Ana. Terrorize, terrify, *frighten, scare.

Con. *Coax, cajole, wheedle, blandish.

brownie or browny. Gnome, dwarf, puck, *fairy, faery, fay, elf, sprite, pixy, goblin, nix, shee, leprechaun, banshee.

brume. *Haze, mist, fog, smog.

brunt. n. *Impact, impingement, jar, jolt, collision, clash, shock, concussion, percussion.

Ana. Strain, *stress, pressure, tension: burden, *load.

brush. n. Skirmish, *encounter.

Ana. *Contest, conflict, combat, fight, fray: engagement, action, *battle, push: *attack, assault, onset, onslaught.

brusque. Curt, blunt, gruff, *bluff, crusty.

Ana. Ungracious, *rude, impolite, uncivil, discourteous: *rough, harsh.

Ant. Unctuous: bland. — Con. *Suave, urbane, smooth: *gracious, cordial, affable, genial: courteous, gallant, polite, *civil.

brute. n. Beast, *animal.

buck. n. Dude, swell, macaroni, spark, *fop, dandy, beau, nob, toff, exquisite, élégant.

buffoon. Clown, antic, zany, *fool, jester, merry-andrew, pantaloone, harlequin, comedian, comic, stooge.

bugbear. Bête noire, *abomination, anathema.

building. n. Building, edifice, structure, fabric, pile come into comparison when they mean a construction of wood, brick, stone, or the like, intended to house a family, a business, an institution, or the like. Building is the common, and in most cases the adequate, term; as, "the buildings of the temple" (Matthew xxiv. 1). Edifice usually applies to large and elegant buildings only; as, "Should I go to church And see the holy edifice of stone...?" (Shak.). Structure retains more frequently than the others the sense of something constructed, often in a particular way; as, a tumble-down structure; a modern steel structure. Like edifice, structure is often used of buildings of some size or magnificence; as, "many a towered structure high" (Milton). Fabric, which is now archaic in this sense, implies architectural design. Consequently, the term is applied chiefly to great edifices, especially to Norman and Gothic cathedrals or other buildings of similar construction; as, "The august fabriq of Christ Church" (Evelyn); "The ruinous fabric was very rich in the interior" (Dickens). In current use, especially in Great Britain, fabric denotes the construction and maintenance of the church building; as, contributions for the fabric. Pile is usually a literary, but sometimes a humorous, term for a very large building (or, sometimes, a mass of buildings), especially one of stone: it usually suggests a palace, a cathedral, a government building, or the like; as, "Philip testified his joy ... by raising the magnificent pile of the Escorial" (Prescott).

bulge, n. Protuberance, *projection, protrusion.

Con. Cavity, hollow, *hole, pocket.

bulk, n. Bulk, mass, volume come into comparison when they mean an aggregate, accumulation, assemblage, or the like, that forms a body or unit. Bulk is applied mainly to an object that is inordinately large or heavy (as, "the bulk Of ancient minster"—Wordsworth) and, often, more or less shapeless or unshapely. "On the living sea rolls an inanimate bulk" (Shelley). "A blue night set with stars, the bulk of the solitary mesas cutting into the firmament" (Cather). "Dr. Lanskill sank his gouty bulk into the armchair behind his desk" (E. Wharton). Mass is applied mainly to something (not necessarily a concrete object) built up by the piling or gathering together of things of the same kind, so that they cohere and have a real or apparent unity; as, the towering mass of the Jungfrau [the mountain]. "Pieces of obsolete science, imprisoned ... in the solid mass of a religious creed" (Inge). "The mass [that is, of people] never comes up to the standard of its best member, but on the contrary degrades itself to a level with the lowest" (Thoreau). Volume usually applies to that which flows, rolls, or the like, and is therefore without outline, and often continuous in extent; as, a tremendous volume of water; a volume of gas poured into the room. "It [the voice] rose through progressive gradations of sweetness and power, until its volume seemed to envelop her" (N. Hawthorne). These three terms also come into comparison when they designate the quantity or amount. But the bulk and the mass mean the greater part or a large majority of something objective. "Some must know medicine, but for the bulk of mankind it is sufficient to have an elementary knowledge of physiology and hygiene" (B. Russell). "The great mass of the articles on which impost is paid is foreign luxuries" (Jefferson). Volume, on the other hand, denotes the total amount or quantity, especially of something subject to seasonal, periodic, or other fluctuations; as, the volume of travel increases greatly in the vacation season; to enlarge the volume of the currency; the volume of business in certain lines has decreased since the beginning of the war.

Ana. *Form, figure, shape.

bulky. *Massive, massy, monumental, substantial.

Ana. Huge, gigantic, colossal, mammoth, elephantine, *enormous: corpulent, obese, portly, *fleshy: burly, husky (see MUSCULAR).

Con. Petite, diminutive, *small, little.

bull, *n.*¹ Blunder, howler, boner, bloomer, mistake, *error, slip, lapse, faux pas.

bull, *n.*² *Policeman, officer, constable, bobby, peeler, copper, cop, bailiff, catchpole, gendarme.

bulldoze. Bully, browbeat, *intimidate, cow.

Ana. *Threaten, menace: terrorize, terrify, *frighten: *worry, harass, harry.

Con. Cajole, wheedle, blandish, *coax.

bullheaded. Pigheaded, stiffnecked, stubborn, mulish, *obstinate, dogged, pertinacious.

bully, v. Bulldoze, browbeat, *intimidate, cow.

Ana. Torment, grill, rack, torture (see AFFLICT): *threaten, menace: terrorize, terrify, *frighten, scare.

Ant. Coax. — Con. Wheedle, cajole, blandish (see COAX): *lure, entice, inveigle, decoy.

bulwark, n. Bulwark, breastwork, rampart, parapet, barbette, bastion come into comparison when they denote a structure above the ground that forms part of a fortification and is specifically intended for purposes of defense. Bulwark is the most general and the least technical of these terms. It is or has been applied to various types of structures, such as a wall intended to keep out an enemy, or a structure of logs, earth, stones, or the like, from behind which the defenders can safely attack besiegers or an assaulting force, and to a breakwater or sea wall. In current use it is chiefly figurative, being applied to any person or any thing regarded as a firm, steadfast, or powerful defense or defender; as, "He stood, the bulwark of the Grecian band" (Pope). "A mighty fortress is our God, A bulwark never failing" (Luther, transl. by F. H. Hedge). "The support of the State governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies" (Jefferson). "Britannia needs no bulwarks, No towers along the steep; Her march is o'er the mountain waves, Her home is on the deep" (Campbell). Breastwork applies chiefly to a structure of earth or the like, which is often hastily thrown up and is usually only a few feet in height, and behind which defenders may crouch or stand so as to fire their guns from a concealed position; as, "the mud breastworks had long been levelled with the earth" (Irving). Rampart and parapet are the common technical terms, especially when fortifications of the type that prevailed before the World War are under consideration. In this sense a rampart is an embankment round a place, often, especially in old castles, built inside the moat and rising high enough to conceal the forces lying behind it, yet broad enough on its top level to permit the movement of men and of guns when they are needed in action. A parapet, in contrast with a rampart, is a structure rising above the top level of a rampart and serving as a breastwork for those aiming and firing guns and as a bulwark against the missiles of the enemy. But, in less technical use, rampart is applied to any wall or to any elevation or level on which defenders may operate when in action, or which may be thought of as suitable for such action, and parapet is applied to any structure resembling a parapet of a fortification, such as a low wall, a balustrade, or the like. "Art thou [Nineveh] better than populous No [= Thebes], that was situate among the rivers, that had the waters round about it, whose rampart was the sea ...?" (Nahum iii. 8). "On a summer's day Wolstanbury Hill is an island in sunshine; you may lie on the grassy rampart, high up in the most delicate air" (Jefferies). "The terrace surrounded with a stone parapet in front of the house" (G. Eliot). Barbette applies to a part of a fortification that is typically a platform behind a parapet on which guns are mounted so that when fired, their missiles fly over the parapet. Barbette is also applicable to a similar arrangement on a warship, when the guns are mounted so that their armor, or barbette, protects the loading platform. The term is chiefly found in phrases such as "barbette guns" or "guns mounted in barbette." Bastion applies to a projection extending from the main wall of a fortification: typically, a bastion is a four-sided projection ending in an acute angle and providing a means whereby the enemy may be covered in several directions and the fortification protected from at least four angles. In figurative use, bastion differs little from rampart except in carrying a stronger suggestion of attack than of defense. "They build each other up ... As bastions set point blank against God's will" (Cowper).

Ana. Stronghold, fortress, *fort, citadel.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

bum, n. *Vagabond, vagrant, tramp, hobo, truant, stiff, swagman, downowner.

Ana. Sot, toper, *drunkard, inebriate, alcoholic, soak. bumpkin. Clodhopper, clown, lout, *boor, churl.

bunch, n. *Bundle, bale, parcel, pack, fardel, package, packet.

Ana. Collection, assemblage, gathering (see under GATHER): quantity, number, aggregate (see SUM).

bundle, n. Bundle, bunch, bale, parcel, pack, fardel, package, packet denote a thing or things done up for storage, sale, or carriage. A bundle is a collection of articles bound or rolled together, often loosely; as, a bundle of papers, of kindling wood, of groceries; a bundle for the laundry; a bundle of old clothes. A bunch is a collection of things, usually of the same sort, fastened closely together in orderly fashion; as, a bunch of violets, of radishes, of asparagus, of keys. Bale, originally any large bundle of goods bound up for storage or transportation, now applies to one composed of materials such as rags, hay, straw, cotton, wool, and the like, which are closely pressed together so as to form a mass, usually rectangular, tightly bound with stout cord or wire, and, often, wrapped in paper, burlap, or the like. Because there is in various localities a uniform size for a bale of a certain commodity, the word often also implies an average or approximate weight; thus, in the United States a bale of cotton weighs approximately 500 lbs., and in Brazil and Peru, 250 lbs. Parcel, as here considered (see also PART), no longer carries its original implication of a number of things detached from a larger group or whole and bound together; it now implies a state of being wrapped and tied and a small or moderate size, and it carries no suggestion of the number or kind of things so wrapped and tied; as, a shopping bag for parcels; loaded down with parcels; to send parcels through the mail. Pack now implies more careful and more compact arrangement than bundle; specifically, it denotes a conveniently packed bundle of goods or supplies that is carried on the back, as by a peddler, by a soldier on the march, or by a boy scout on an expedition. Fardel, now archaic or dialect, sometimes comes close to pack in its meaning and sometimes to bundle. It tends, however, to imply, more than either of these terms, either a burdensome or a miscellaneous character, and is often used figuratively. "Who would fardels bear. To grunt and sweat under a weary life...?" (Shak.). "A fardel of never-ending misery and suspense" (Marryat). A package is specifically something packed (as in a box or receptacle of moderate size, or in a compact bundle), especially for convenience in sale or transportation; as, an express package; a package of envelopes; candy in the original package; package goods. A packet is a small package or parcel; as, especially, a packet of letters or dispatches.

Ana. Collection, assemblage, gathering (see under GATHER): *bag, sack.

buoyant. Volatile, expansive, resilient, effervescent, *elastic.

Ana. *Spirited, high-spirited, mettlesome, gingery: *lively, vivacious, animated, sprightly: jocund, blithe, *merry: optimistic, *hopeful.

Ant. Depressed, dejected. — Con. Doleful, lugubrious, *melancholy: *sullen, morose, glum, dour: *despondent, despairing, hopeless, forlorn.

burden, n. *Load, cargo, freight, lading.

burdensome. Oppressive, *onerous, exacting.

burglarize. *Rob, plunder, thief, rifle, loot.

Ana. *Steal, pilfer, filch, purloin, lift, pinch, snitch, cop, swipe: sack, pillage, *ravage, despoil.

burglary. *Theft, larceny, robbery.

burlesque, v. Caricature, parody, travesty. See under CARICATURE, n.

Ana. Mimic, ape, mock, imitate, *copy: *ridicule, deride.

burlesque, n. *Caricature, parody, travesty.

Ana. Mimicry, mockery, imitation (see corresponding verbs at COPY): *fun, jest, sport, game: satire, sarcasm, humor, *wit: derision, ridicule (see corresponding verbs at RIDICULE).

burly. Husky, *muscular, brawny, athletic, sinewy.

Ana. Corpulent, *fleshy, portly: bulky, substantial, *massive: *vigorous, lusty: *powerful, forceful, potent.

Ant. Lanky, lank. — Con. *Lean, spare, gaunt, raw-boned, angular, scrawny, skinny.

burn, v. Burn, scorch, char, sear, singe, as here compared, agree in meaning to injure by exposure to fire or intense heat. Burn is the most comprehensive of these terms, for it is applicable regardless of the extensiveness or the slightness of the injury, or of whether fire or heat is the destructive agency; as, the cake was burned to a crisp in the oven; only the lower edge of his coat was burned by the flames; the grass was badly burned by the sun; the child's hand was burned by touching the hot stove; to burn steel in forging. Burn is also applicable when a similar injury or similar effects are produced by another agency; as, to burn plants by using too strong a fertilizer; a sharp wind burns the face. Scorch implies superficial burning that changes the color (especially to brown or black) or texture of something; as, to scorch a dress in ironing it; the paint of the house was badly scorched by the flames from the grass fire. Char usually implies complete carbonization (or reduction to coal) by fire; as, charred wood; to char coffee berries in roasting them; the lower parts of the rafters were charred in the fire. Sear, in literal use, applies only to the burning or scorching of animal tissues by fire or intense heat; specifically, it is used of cauterizing a wound, of branding an animal, and of quickly browning the outside of roasting or broiling meats so that they will retain their juices in later and slower cooking; as, to sear a wound; to sear beef as the first step in roasting it. Singe strictly implies a very superficial burning (as, the fire next door merely singed our house); sometimes such burning is intentional, as when the short hairs or bristles covering a carcass being prepared for the market or for cooking are quickly destroyed by a flame; as, to singe the ends of one's hair to prevent their breaking; to singe a chicken before broiling it.

Ana. Kindle, enkindle, fire, ignite, inflame, *light: *blaze, flame, glow.

burnish. *Polish, shine, buff, furbish.

bursal. Fiscal, *financial, monetary, pecuniary.

bury. Secrete, cache, *hide, conceal, screen, ensconce.

Con. Expose, display, parade, flaunt, exhibit, *show: unearth, *discover, ascertain, learn, determine.

business, n. 1 *Work, occupation, pursuit, calling, métier, employment.

Ana. *Trade, craft, handicraft, art, profession.

2 *Affair, concern, matter, thing.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

Ana. *Function, office, duty, province: *task, job, assignment, chore, stint.

3 Business, commerce, trade, industry, traffic are here compared chiefly in their most inclusive senses in which they denote one of those forms or branches of human endeavor which have for their objective the supplying of commodities. Business, as here compared, specifically applies to the combined activities of all those who are engaged in the barter, purchase, or sale of commodities of any sort, either in wholesale or retail transactions, or in financial transactions connected with them: in this sense, business is thought of as the combined activities of merchants, bankers, and the like, as opposed to those of agriculturists, manufacturers, and others whose immediate end is production. The term, however, is also used to include the activities of producers as well as of merchants and bankers, and also of those engaged in the transportation of goods, since all these have for their ultimate aims the supplying of commodities and the increase of private wealth; as, there should be no conflict between government and business; business is greatly depressed throughout the world; business is improving everywhere. Commerce and trade, on the other hand, apply to the activities of those who are engaged in the exchange of commodities, especially such exchange as involves transactions on a large scale and the transportation of goods from place to place. The words are often used interchangeably (as, foreign commerce [or trade] has been much affected by the war); but in general commerce is preferred when different countries or states are involved, when transportation is across seas or by sea, and when the dealings are not only in merchandise, but also in money, bills of exchange, and the like, and trade, when different business organizations in the same country are involved or when the dealings are in merchandise; as, laws regulating interstate commerce; ships engaged in commerce with the West Indies; a slump in the sale of automobiles has adversely affected the trade between the manufacturers and the steel companies; "free trade" designates a policy of permitting entry of natural and manufactured products from foreign countries without duties or tariff restrictions. In the United States, the Interstate Commerce Commission regulates common carriers of all kinds (rail, water, motor) engaged in interstate transportation of passengers or goods; the Federal Trade Commission was created to prevent use of unfair methods of competition in interstate commerce and to investigate trade conditions in and with foreign countries. Industry applies chiefly to the activities of those who are engaged in production, especially in the processing of natural products, the manufacture of artificial products, the erection of buildings and other structures, on so large a scale that problems of capital and labor are involved. The term may be used generally to include all activities covered by this definition; as, the replacing of hand tools by machines has revolutionized industry. It may also be used more narrowly of any branch of industry as determined by the thing produced; as, the sugar industry (that is, all the business organizations devoted to the manufacture of sugar); the steel industry; the automobile industry; the building industry. Traffic, in the sense here considered (see also BUSINESS, 4; INTERCOURSE), applies to the activities of those who are engaged in the operation of public carriers, such as vessels, railroads, bus lines, and systems of trucking, and who are, therefore, primarily responsible for the transportation not only of commodities and articles of manufacture but also of persons from one part of a country or of the world to another; as, the traffic interests were also represented at the conference.

4 Business, trade, traffic are here compared in a narrow sense, in which they agree in meaning the pursuit or occupation of a person or group of persons engaged in the buying and selling of commodities for profit. Business was formerly more often used in the United States than in Great Britain in this restricted meaning, trade being once the usual but now the literary term in the latter country, especially for the carrying on of mercantile or commercial transactions in a store or shop; thus, when an American says "Jones has decided to engage in business," he often means that Jones has decided to open a store or shop, or, as a Briton might put it, "Jones has decided to go into trade." But the American may mean that Jones plans to engage in some mercantile or commercial enterprise. "Every trade... is a business, but every business is not a trade. To answer that description, it must be conducted by buying and selling, which the business of keeping a lunatic asylum is not" (Baron Denman). Traffic (see also BUSINESS, 3; INTERCOURSE) is now used chiefly when something underhand or venal is implied; as, to engage in traffic in narcotics, or in liquor, or in votes; "Engaged in a low, clandestine traffic, prohibited by the laws of the country" (Burke); the white-slave traffic.

Ana. Selling, vending, trading, auctioning, bartering, (see SELL, v.).

bustle, n. Flurry, *stir, ado, fuss, pother.

Ana. *Business, commerce, trade, industry, traffic: movement, *motion: hubbub, racket, babel, *din.

Con. Inactivity, idleness, inertness, passiveness, supineness (see corresponding adjectives at INACTIVE).

busy. Busy, industrious, diligent, assiduous, sedulous agree in meaning actively engaged or occupied in work, in accomplishing a purpose or intention, or the like. Busy may imply nothing more than that the person or thing referred to is not idle, that is, that he is at work or that it is in use; as, the doctor is busy just now; the telephone is busy. In British and often in American use engaged is preferred to busy in this sense. In attributive use and some predicative use, busy usually implies habitual or temporary engrossment in activity or the appearance of such engrossment; as, the busy bee; a busy gossip; a busy life. "Nowhere so busy a man as he there was [original text, nas]. And yet he seemed busier than he was" (Chaucer). Industrious applies to one who is characteristically attentive to his business or work: it implies habitual devotion to labor. "The nation [France] is at once the most industrious and the least industrial of the great nations" (Brownell). Diligent (of narrower range than industrious) implies earnest application to some specific object or pursuit; one may be diligent in seeking some favorite end without being in general industrious. "It is this conviction [that success in life depends on the power to think] which converts a listless undergraduate into a diligent student of law or medicine" (C. W. Eliot). Assiduous implies studied and unremitting, sedulous implies painstaking and persevering, application to a business or enterprise; as, to acquire the power to speak French fluently by assiduous practice; an assiduous nurse; a sedulous, but not brilliant, student; to attempt to gain one's ends by sedulous flattery. "He on her side played his part of supporter, councillor and friend with an assiduity sometimes comic. He even learned to play the lute that he might please her" (Belloe). "I read with sedulous accuracy... the metrical romances" (Coleridge). "She would never fail in sedulous attention to his wants" (M. Wilkins).

Ana. Engrossed, absorbed, *intent: working, toiling, laboring, travelling (see corresponding nouns at WORK).

Ant. Idle: unoccupied. — Con. *Inactive, inert, passive: indolent, slothful, *lazy: slack, relaxed (see LOOSE).

but. But, however, still, nevertheless, yet are here compared as adversative terms; that is, as terms whose use implies that what follows in some degree opposes or contradicts that which precedes. But marks the opposition without emphasizing it; as, This is not winter, but it is almost as cold. However is weaker, and throws the opposition into the background: for this reason it is often used parenthetically; as, This is not winter: it is, however, almost as cold. However also introduces a final decision or conclusion; as, the truth, however, has not yet fully come out—that is, such is the speaker's conclusion in view of the whole case. Still, like nevertheless and yet, states more strongly an adversative conclusion, implying a concession in what precedes; as, It is true that winter is over: still, it is almost as cold. Nevertheless implies that even if the concession be fully made, it has no real bearing on the question or is not really decisive; as, To be sure, it is no longer winter: nevertheless, it is quite cold; Say what you will, we must nevertheless go forward. Yet implies that, however extreme the concession may be, the consequence naturally to be expected does not follow; as, It is well on in May, yet it is almost as cold as midwinter. "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him" (Job xiii. 15).

butchery. Slaughter, *massacre, carnage, pogrom.

Ana. Murdering or murder, slaying, killing (see corresponding verbs at KILL).

butt, v. In form butt in. *Intrude, obtrude, interlope. Ana. Interfere, *meddle, intermeddle: *interpose, intervene, interfere, mediate, intercede.

Con. Withdraw, retire, clear out (see GO): *refrain, abstain, forbear.

buttress. Buttress, pier, abutment are technical terms used in architecture for auxiliary structures designed to serve as a prop, shore, or support for the wall of a building. A buttress is a structure, as of masonry, projecting from and supporting a wall, often designed especially for receiving and carrying the outward pressure, or thrust, exerted on the wall by the weight of an arch or vault. In a flying buttress, the pressure or thrust is carried over an open space by a rigid bar resting against a masonry structure (the pier). A pier is a thickened piece of masonry designed to stiffen a wall. A pier may be built as a part of the wall, or it may be a detached mass, used as the vertical part of a flying buttress, carrying the thrust of a masonry bar or rod extending between it and the wall. An abutment is the particular section of either a buttress or a pier which actually receives the pressure or thrust exerted by the weight of an arch or vault.

In bridgebuilding, an abutment is the support at either extreme end of the structure, or, by extension, the anchorage of the cables for an extension bridge; a pier is any intermediate support between the ends of a bridge.

buy. Buy, purchase agree in meaning to acquire something by paying (usually money) for it. The words are often used interchangeably without loss. Buy, however, is the homelier and (often) the more emphatic word and it usually stresses getting what one wants for a price; purchase, on the other hand, frequently implies a transaction of some dignity or importance and negotiations or other efforts to obtain it; as, to buy eggs; to purchase a steam yacht; "Peace, how oft, how dearly bought!" (Pope); "Thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money" (Acts viii. 20). Whereas buy may almost always be substituted for purchase without disadvantage, the use of purchase instead of buy often weakens the effect or strikes a jarring note.

Ana. Obtain, acquire, procure, *get: *pay, compensate, remunerate.

Con. *Sell, vend, auction.

by. By, through, with come into comparison only as prepositions followed by a word or phrase naming the agent, means, or instrument. By is followed commonly by the agent or causative agency; as, a wall built by the Romans; a novel by Scott; destroyed by fire; devoured by wolves; blessed by a priest; inflamed by the jibes of officers; impressed by the evidence; awakened by dreaming of fire. Through, as here compared, as well as in its primary sense, implies intermediacy; it is followed by the name of the person or thing that serves as the medium or the means by which one gains one's end, produces some effect, or the like; as, to speak through an interpreter; to procure a rare book through a friend; to express ideas through words; to acquire a position through influence; an opportunity lost through indecision. With, on the other hand, is often followed by the name of the instrument which accompanies the action; as, to write with a pen; to eat with a fork; to defend oneself with a stick; "He was torn to pieces with a bear: this avouches the shepherd's son" (Shak.). It may, however, take for its object something not consciously used as an instrument, but serving as the instrumentality by which an effect is produced; as, he amused the crowd with his anecdotes; do not kill us with kindness.

bystander. Onlooker, looker-on, witness, eyewitness, *spectator, observer, beholder.

byway. *Road, roadway, street, thoroughfare, lane, alley, alleyway.

cabal. 1 Intrigue, conspiracy, complot, machination, *plot, frame-up.

2 Combine, junto, bloc, faction, ring, *combination, party.

cabalistic or cabalistical. Anagogical, mystic, *mystical.

Ana. Occult, esoteric, *recondite, abstruse: cryptic, enigmatic, *obscure: arcane, *mysterious.

Con. Plain, clear, obvious, manifest, *evident, palpable, apparent.

cabinetmaker. *Carpenter, joiner, framer.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1 cache, v. Secrete, bury, *hide, conceal, ensconce, screen.

Con. Expose, exhibit, display, *show: unearth, *discover.

cadaver. Corpse, stiff, *body, carcass.

cadaverous. Wasted, pinched, *haggard, worn, careworn.

Ana. Gaunt, skinny, scrawny, angular, rawboned, lank, lanky, *lean, spare.

Ant. Plump, stout. — Con. Fleeshy, fat, corpulent, obese, portly, rotund.

cadence. *Rhythm, *meter.

Ana. Accentuation, accent, stress, *emphasis: beat, pulse, throb, pulsation (see corresponding verbs under PULSATE).

cajole. Wheedle, blandish, *coax.

Ana. Entice, inveigle, seduce, decoy, *lure: beguile, delude, *deceive: tease, tantalize (see WORRY).

Con. Browbeat, bully, bulldoze, cow, *intimidate: constrain, oblige, compel, coerce, *force.

calamity. *Disaster, catastrophe, cataclysm.

Ana. *Accident, casualty, mishap: *misfortune, mischance, adversity: tribulation, visitation, affliction, *trial, cross: ruin, wreck (see corresponding verbs at RUIN).

Ant. Boon. — Con. Fortune, luck (see CHANCE): favor, *gift: benefaction (see DONATION): *blessing, benediction.

calculate. Calculate, compute, estimate, reckon agree in meaning to determine something (such as cost, speed, quantity, etc.) by mathematical or arithmetical processes. Calculate is the preferred term when highly intricate or elaborate processes are followed and when the result arrived at is, because of the great difficulties involved, more or less problematical; as, to calculate the velocity of light, the distance between the sun and the earth, or the number of atoms in a cubic centimeter of hydrogen. Compute is preferred where the data are given or the actual figures involved are known and at hand, and not arrived at indirectly; it therefore commonly implies the use of simple arithmetical processes; as, to compute the interest due, the area of a farm for sale, or the cost of running a business during a given year. Estimate carries so strong an implication from its more common sense (see ESTIMATE) of an evaluation based on one's experience and good judgment, that even when, as here compared, it implies careful calculation or computation, it still connotes a result that is not necessarily exact, but approximates the exact result: for he who estimates deals with data or figures that are to some extent unsatisfactory. Hence, estimate is preferred to calculate and compute when the cost of a piece of work to be done is computed at present prices; thus, a contractor's bid on a projected building is based on its estimated cost to him; a printer estimates a printing job when he names the price he will probably ask for doing it. Reckon is now used more or less colloquially in place of compute. It often connotes simpler mathematical processes, especially such as can be carried on in one's head or aided by the use of counters, and the like; as, to reckon the cost of a trip to the city; to reckon the number of eggs laid by the hens during the month.

Ana. Weigh, revolve, study, *consider: *ponder, ruminate: determine, ascertain, *discover.

Con. Guess, *conjecture, surmise.

calculating. Circumspect, *cautious, wary, chary.

Ana. *Deliberate, designed, considered, studied, premeditated: designing, scheming, plotting (see corresponding verbs under PLAN, n.): wily, crafty, artful, cunning, *sly.

Ant. Reckless, rash. — Con. Foolhardy, daring, temerarious, venturesome, *adventurous: improvident, imprudent, indiscreet (see affirmative adjectives at PRUDENT).

calculation. Circumspection, caution, wariness, chariness. See under CAUTIOUS.

Ana. *Prudence, forethought, foresight, providence, discretion: *care, concern, solicitude: astuteness, perspicacity, sagacity, shrewdness (see corresponding adjectives at SHREWD).

Ant. Recklessness, rashness.

call, v. *Summon, cite, convoke, convene, muster.

Ana. Assemble, *gather, collect: *invite, bid.

call, n. *Visit, visitation.

caller. *Visitor, visitant, guest.

calling. Occupation, pursuit, métier, business, *work, employment.

Ana. *Vocation, avocation: profession, *trade, craft, art, handicraft.

callous. *Hardened, indurated.

Ana. Tough, tenacious, stout, *strong: *firm, solid, hard: *inflexible, adamant, obdurate, inexorable: insensitive, impassible, *insensible, anesthetic.

Ant. Tender. — Con. *Soft, lenient, gentle: yielding, submitting, relenting (see YIELD): compassionate, responsive, sympathetic (see TENDER): sensitive, susceptible, open, exposed, subject, *liable.

callow. Green, crude, raw, *rude, rough.

Ana. Puerile, boyish, juvenile, *youthful: naïve, ingenuous, simple, unsophisticated, artless, *natural: adolescent, pubescent (see corresponding nouns at YOUTH).

Ant. Full-fledged, grown-up. — Con. *Mature, adult, matured.

calm, adj. Calm, tranquil, serene, placid, peaceful, halcyon agree in meaning quiet and free from all that disturbs or excites. Calm, primarily applied to sea or weather, usually conveys an implicit contrast with its opposite, stormy, and suggests freedom, real or assumed, from agitation of whatever sort; as, "a season of calm weather" (Wordsworth); "As men for ever temp'rate, calm, and wise" (Pope). Tranquil implies a more settled composure, a more inherent quiet, than calm, with less suggestion of previous agitation overcome; as, "Farewell the tranquil mind! farewell content!" (Shak.); "the tranquil beauty of Greek sculpture" (FitzGerald). Serene suggests a lofty and unclouded tranquillity; as, "regions mild of calm and serene air, Above the smoke and stir of this dim spot Which men call Earth" (Milton); "the serene satisfaction of certitude" (Newman). Placid connotes lack of excitement and suggests an unruffled and equable aspect or temper, even, sometimes, in derogatory use, a kind of bovinity; as, "to confirm by placid silences the fact that the wine had been good" (H. James); "the placid common sense of Franklin" (J. R. Lowell); she is as placid as a cow. Peaceful, as here compared (see also PACIFIC), implies repose, or the attainment of undisturbed tranquillity; as, "I am grown peaceful as old age tonight" (Browning). Halcyon, etymologically calm as the legendary "halcyon days" (fourteen days around the winter solstice), when the halcyon, or kingfisher, traditionally nests on the sea, now implies an almost magic or golden calmness, especially of weather or of spirit. "Soft blue stone, the colour of robins' eggs, or of the sea on halcyon days of summer" (Calder).

Ana. *Still, quiet, stilly, noiseless: *pacific, peaceable: *impassive, stoic: unruffled, composed, collected, imperturbable, *cool.

Ant. Stormy: agitated. — Con. Shaken, rocked, convulsed (see SHAKE): disturbed, perturbed, discomposed, upset (see DISCOMPOSE).

Ant. Eulogy: vindication. — Con. *Encomium, panegyric, tribute: *compliment, adulation, flattery.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

can, v. Can, may are often confused in use. In its commonest sense can expresses ability, whether physical or mental; as, he can climb this pole; he is but four, but he can read; he will do it, if he possibly can; "When Duty whispers low, Thou must, the youth replies, I can" (Emerson). But can may imply ability that is granted, as by God, the will of the people, or the like. "The law does all that is needed when it does all that it can" (Justice Holmes). May fundamentally expresses not ability, but possibility; as, he may go if the day is pleasant; you may be right. Therefore when the possibility depends for its fulfillment on the permission or sanction of another, may is the correct term; as, I shall call tomorrow if I may; you may go, if you wish; "May we take your coach to town?" (Thackeray). The use of can for may in asking permission is incorrect, but in denying permission cannot is common.

cancel. Efface, obliterate, expunge, delete, dele, *erase, blot out.

Ana. Invalidate, annul, *nullify: void, *annul, abrogate: *deface, disfigure: *neutralize, counteract, negative.

candid. Open, *frank, plain.

Ana. Truthful, veracious (see corresponding nouns at TRUTH): *fair, dispassionate, impartial, unbiased, just: *sincere: honest, scrupulous, *upright.

Ant. Evasive. — Con. *Dishonest, deceitful, lying, mendacious, untruthful.

candidate. Candidate, aspirant, nominee, applicant are the chief words in English to denote one who seeks an office, honor, position, or the like. Candidate is applied not only to a seeker, but to one who is put forward by others or is considered as a possibility by those whose function it is to make a choice. It implies therefore an examination of qualifications and is applicable wherever selection is dependent upon others' judgment of one's fitness; as, the Republican candidate for governor; candidates for the degree of doctor of philosophy; candidates for holy orders. Since the word often implies previous training or grooming for a position or honor, it is sometimes used more widely of a person whose career is such that he seems headed for a certain place or end; as, a grafter is a candidate for prison. Aspirant definitely implies that one seeks an office, honor, post, promotion, or the like, because of one's own desire or decision; it therefore often connotes ambition or laudable efforts to improve one's state or condition. "The preliminary physical examination [for entrance into the Marine Hospital Service] was so rigid that twelve aspirants were promptly ruled out" (V. Heiser). "In [Matthew] Arnold's phrases the first step for every aspirant to culture is to endeavor to see things as they are" (C. W. Eliot). Nominee is applied to a candidate for office who has been chosen to represent a party or a faction in a coming election, or who has been proposed as the (sometimes an) appropriate person to fill a particular office and whose election therefore is recommended. Applicant is applied to one who definitely or formally submits himself as a possibility for a post or position. It is often used interchangeably with candidate when personal solicitation is implied in the latter, but unlike candidate, it conveys no suggestion of consideration by those who make the selection; as, to weed out applicants without experience. "There are plenty of unemployed sempstresses and laborers starving for a job, each of them trying to induce you to give it to her or him rather than to the next applicant" (Shaw).

caponize. *Sterilize, asexualize, castrate, spay, emasculate, mutilate, geld.

caprice. Caprice, freak, whim, whimsey (or whimsy), vagary, crotchet agree in denoting a more or less irrational and arbitrary fancy or notion. Caprice emphasizes the lack of apparent motivation and implies a certain willfulness or wantonness. "They...without reason or judgment, beyond the caprice of their good pleasure, threw down the image from its pedestal" (Byron). "The restraint which ordinary persons...are able to impose on their caprices" (Froude). Freak suggests an impulsive, seemingly causeless, change of mind, like that of a child or a lunatic; as, "a light word flung in the air, a mere freak of perverse child's temper" (Thackeray); "Follow this way or that, as the freak takes you" (Stevenson); "a thousand Puckish freaks" (J. R. Green). Whim and whimsey suggest not so much a sudden as a quaint, fantastic, or humorous turn or inclination, but whim often stresses capriciousness, and whimsey fancifulness. "A young lady of some birth and fortune...who had strange whims of fasting" (G. Eliot). "Less mad the wildest whimsy we can frame, Than ev'n that passion [one's ruling passion], if it has no aim" (Pope). Vagary suggests still more strongly the erratic, extravagant, or irresponsible character of the notion or fancy; as, "Straight they changed their minds, Flew off, and into strange vagaries fell" (Milton); "A great force of critical opinion controlling a learned man's vagaries, and keeping him straight" (Arnold). Crotchet implies even more perversity of temper or more indifference to right reason than vagary; it often is applied to a capriciously heretical opinion on some (frequently) unimportant or trivial point; as, "It is a note of the provincial spirit not to hold ideas of this kind a little more easily, to be devoured by them, to suffer them to become crotchets" (Arnold). "You have no opinions, Lydia. The impracticable crotchets you are fond of airing are not recognized in England as sane political convictions" (Shaw).

Ant. Negligible.

care, n. Care, concern, solicitude, anxiety, worry agree in meaning a state of mind in which one is engrossed and more or less troubled by an affair or affairs, either one's own or another's, or in meaning an affair that engrosses and troubles one. The same distinctions in implications and connotations are evident in their corresponding adjectives (careful, concerned, solicitous, anxious, worried) when they mean engrossed and troubled by an affair or affairs. Care and careful (which is archaic in this sense) imply preoccupation and oppression of mind, because of heavy responsibilities or disquieting fears or apprehensions; as, "the king...most sovereign slave of care" (Thoreau); her face was worn with care. "She was free...to go where she liked and do what she liked. She had no responsibilities, no cares" (Bennett). "Be careful for nothing; but in every thing...let your requests be made known unto God" (Philippians iv. 6). Concern and concerned stress absence of indifference, but they also imply a greater or less degree of care, because of one's interest, affection, respect, or the like; as, his child's future was his greatest concern. "Your friends, Señora, would feel less concern for your safety if you kept them [valuables] farther from your person" (M. Austin). "It was quite characteristic of the state of mind of England in the summer of 1914 that Mr. Britling should be mightily concerned about the conflict in Ireland, and almost deliberately negligent of the possibility of a war with Germany" (H. G. Wells). Solicitude and solicitous imply profound concern; sometimes they connote extreme apprehensiveness, but more often they suggest thoughtfulness for another's welfare, well-being, success, or the like, or almost hovering attentiveness in another's misfortune. "They...tended the wounded man with the gentlest solicitude" (Dickens). "I do hope baby will not wake," was her chief solicitude" (Meredith). "They...were as solicitous to see it through for me as though I had been an only child among a lot of maiden aunts" (M. Austin). The last two pairs of words in this group imply far more agitation and depression than the first three. Anxiety and anxious stress the anguish of fear coupled with uncertainty or of the anticipation of impending misfortune, disaster, or the like. "Poor Miss Marial she was anxious, no doubt...over money matters. 'Ladies ought not to have such anxieties,' thought Mr. Ezra" (Deland). "The child's inner life is often a turmoil of terrors and anxieties of which his parents know almost nothing" (Inge). Worry and worried usually suggest more mental activity (often futile activity) than anxiety and anxious or more fretting or stewing over problems, or situations, or persons that are a cause of solicitude or anxiety. "He thought that now all the worries were over, that there was nothing before him but duties" (Conrad). "Worried... by the need for keeping up their social positions" (Shaw).

Ana. Trouble, pains, *effort, exertion: disquieting or disquiet, perturbing or perturbation, discomposing or discomposure (see corresponding verbs at DISCOMPOSE): vigilance, watchfulness, alertness (see corresponding adjectives at WATCHFUL).

careen, v. Heel, cant, *tip, list, tilt.

Ana. Incline, slope, *slant, lean: *overturn, overset, capsize, upset.

Con. Balance, ballast, trim, *stabilize, steady.

careful. 1 Solicitous, anxious, worried, concerned. See under CARE, n.

Ana. Disquieted, perturbed, discomposed, disturbed, upset (see DISCOMPOSE): troubled, distressed (see TROUBLE, v): *watchful, vigilant, alert.

2 Careful, meticulous, scrupulous, punctilious, punctual come into comparison only in their basic sense of showing or revealing close attention to details, or care in execution or performance. Careful implies great concern for the persons or things in one's charge, or for the way in which one's duties or tasks are performed. With regard to the former, the term implies solicitude or watchfulness (as, a careful mother; a careful nurse; a careful workman; a careful spender of money); with regard to the latter, it usually implies painstaking efforts, thoroughness, cautiousness in avoiding errors, a desire for perfection, or the like (as, a careful piece of work; a careful examination by the doctor; a careful mapping out of the plan of battle). All of the other words mean exceedingly careful, but they vary in their implications of the motives which inspire such carefulness and, to a less extent, in regard to the objects of attention. Meticulous, in very precise use, implies the prompting of fear: it usually suggests timorousness lest one make the slightest error or fall short of a high standard and therefore, in addition, it implies extreme fussiness or fastidiousness in attention to details; as, "Mr. Prufrock...like most converts, meticulous over points of ritual" (Day Lewis); "He [Augustus] took desperate risks, but only after meticulous calculation" (Buchan). "There were men who ploughed clumsily...leaving banks of land untouched...but Hendrik was not one of these, his work was meticulous" (S. Cloete). Scrupulous, as here compared (see also UPRIGHT), implies the promptings of conscience, not only of one's moral conscience, but of one's sense of what is right and wrong in fact, in logic, in aesthetics, and the like; it therefore also implies strict or painstaking adherence to what one knows to be true, correct, exact, or the like; as, scrupulous fairness of statement; scrupulous observation of details. "Bradley, like Aristotle, is distinguished by his scrupulous respect for words, that their meaning should be neither vague nor exaggerated" (T. S. Eliot). Punctilious, on the other hand, implies knowledge of the fine points of law, etiquette, ceremony, morality, and the like, and usually connotes excessive or obvious attention to the details or minutiae of these. "I am sorry...to see you so punctilious as to stand upon answers, and never to come near me till I have regularly left my name at your door" (Gray). "The punctilious gods who judged them according to the principles laid down in some celestial Book of Etiquette" (J. W. Krutch). Punctual, in earlier and now comparatively rare use, came close to punctilious in its stress on attention to the fine points of a law or code: the term, however, carried a much stronger implication than punctilious of emphasis on their observance and a weaker implication of concentration upon the minutiae; as, "We are not altogether so punctual as the French, in observing the laws of comedy" (Dryden); "His punctual discharge of his duties" (Froude). In current use, the term implies almost perfection in one's adherence to appointed times as for engagements, in following a schedule, or the like, and so usually means punctiliously prompt; as, "I made Mr. Middleditch punctual before he died, though when he married me he was known far and wide as a man who could not be up to time" (C. Mackenzie); "Punctual, commonplace, keeping all appointments, as I go my round" (L. P. Smith).

Ana. *Cautious, circumspect, wary: provident, foresighted, prudent (see under PRUDENCE): accurate, precise, nice, exact (see CORRECT): studied, *deliberate. Ant. Careless. — Con. Heedless, thoughtless, inadvertent (see CARELESS): neglectful, *negligent, lax, slack, remiss.

careless, adj. Careless, heedless, thoughtless, inadvertent come into comparison as meaning showing lack of concern or attention. Careless often implies the absence of cares such as responsibilities or worries; it then usually connotes casualness, spontaneity, lightheartedness, or the like, and carries little or no suggestion of culpability. "Her careless refinement of manner was so different from the studied dignity and anxious courtesy of the actor-manager" (Shaw). "He presented to the world the appearance of a careless and hospitable millionaire strolling into his own drawing-room with the detachment of an invited guest" (E. Wharton). Often, however, the term implies a more or less culpable indifference, which at its best is the product of independence or of concentration on other and more important things (as, "I was strangely bold and careless of danger then"—Hudson) and at its worst is the result of laziness or negligence, and manifests itself in blameworthy lack of pains or thought (as, a careless bookkeeper; a careless piece of work; careless errors). Heedless also implies indifference, but it stresses inattentiveness, or a failure to see, observe, take note of, or remark, rather than laziness or negligence; the term often, but not invariably, also connotes light-mindedness, frivolousness, or flightiness. "Heaps of flies...fell dead...Their decease made no impression on the other flies out promenading... Curious to consider how heedless flies are!" (Dickens). "Discreetly heedless, thanks to her long association with nobleness in art, to the leaps and bounds of fashion" (H. James). Thoughtless frequently emphasizes lack of reflection or of forethought. "Ah, how unjust to Nature and himself Is thoughtless, thankless, inconsistent man!" (Young). More frequently, especially in current use, it suggests lack of thoughtfulness, or consideration for others. "Now and then, however, he is horribly thoughtless, and seems to take a real delight in giving me pain" (Wilde). Inadvertent usually implies heedlessness; the term, however, is now rarely applied to persons or their minds, but is used in qualifying their acts, especially those which are mistakes, errors, or blunders, that are the result of heedlessness or inattention resulting from concentration on other things and that arise, therefore, neither from ignorance nor from intention; as, an inadvertent waking of a person who is asleep; an inadvertent error in spelling or in pronunciation.

Ana. *Negligent, neglectful, lax, slack, remiss: casual, desultory, haphazard, *random, hit-or-miss, happy-go-lucky.

Ant. Careful. — Con. Meticulous, scrupulous, punctilious, punctual (see CAREFUL): accurate, precise, exact, nice (see CORRECT).

caress, v. Caress, fondle, pet, cuddle, dandle agree in meaning to manifest affection or love by touching, handling, or the like. Caress implies an expression of tender interest or of affection, ordinarily without undue familiarity, such as by soft stroking or patting. "Soothing with a touch the wild thing's fright... caressed it into peace with light, kind palms" (Sir E. Arnold). "The little Isaac... leans... against his father's knee... while Abraham's left hand quiets him and caresses the boy's face" (H. Adams). Fondle implies doting fondness, and frequently lack of dignity; it usually suggests attentions more obvious and less gentle than caressing, such as hugging, kissing, and the like; as, to fondle a baby (or a lap dog); "flattering, amorous fondling, to... melt her guardless heart" (W. J. Mickle). "She [Elizabeth]... fondled her 'sweet Robin,' Lord Leicester, in the face of the court" (J. R. Green). Pet, in its broadest sense, implies special attentions and indulgences, including more or less fondling; as, the petted child of the family. In current colloquial use, however, the term often stresses flirtatious or amorous fondling, and sometimes suggests undue or improper familiarity; as, a petting party. Cuddle chiefly suggests the action of a mother or nurse in drawing a child close to her breast to keep it warm, happy, and quiet. "Little boys... who have kind mammas to cuddle them" (Kingsley). The term is used figuratively to suggest any attentions which imply a desire to protect and keep warm and contented. "Temple seems... to have been coaxed, and warmed, and cuddled by the people round about him" (Thackeray). Dandle suggests playful handling of a child as by moving him up and down lightly on one's knee; as, the mother cuddles, but the father dandles, their little boy. In its extended use, dandle usually implies toying with, especially in a playful but pampering manner. "No man or nation ever was dandled into greatness" (G. Smith).

Ana. *Trifle, toy, dally, flirt, coquet: cherish, *nurse.

careworn. Worn, *haggard, pinched, wasted, cadaverous.

Ana. Troubled, distressed (see TROUBLE, v.): *lean, gaunt, scrawny, skinned: exhausted, fagged, jaded, tuckered (see TIRE, v.).

Ant. Carefree.

cargo. Burden, *load, freight, lading.

caricature, n. Caricature, burlesque, parody, travesty come into comparison not only as nouns meaning a grotesque or bizarre imitation of something but also as verbs meaning to make such an imitation. Caricature implies ludicrous exaggeration or distortion (often, but far from exclusively, pictorial) of the characteristic or peculiar features of a person, a group, a people, or the like, for the sake of satire or ridicule; as, cartoonists who caricature prominent politicians. "That propensity to caricature which tempts clever writers... to transform into objects of derision the venerated Great" (L. P. Smith). "If you compare any satiric 'character' of Pope with one of Dryden, you will see that the method and intention are widely divergent. When Pope alters, he diminishes... His portrait of Addison, for example... depends upon... the apparent determination not to exaggerate. The genius of Pope is not for caricature" (T. S. Eliot). Burlesque implies mimicry (especially of words or actions in the theater) that arouses laughter. The term usually also suggests distortion for the sake of the comic effect, as by treating a trifling subject in mock-heroic vein, or by giving to a serious subject a frivolous or laughable turn; as, in Don Quixote, Cervantes burlesques the old romances of chivalry. "Burlesque is... of two kinds; the first represents mean persons in the accoutrements of heroes; the other describes great persons acting and speaking like the basest among the people" (Spectator). Parody implies the employment in the treatment of a ludicrous or mean or trivial subject of the exact style (especially in its mannerisms) of some serious and (usually) well-known composition or writer; travesty, on the other hand, implies that the subject remains unchanged, but that the style is made extravagant or absurd. "Their idea was to write a number of parodies in the manner of the most popular poets of the day" (Percy Fitzgerald). "[In MacFlecknoe] Dryden's method... is something very near to parody; he applies vocabulary, images, and ceremony which arouse epic associations of grandeur, to make an enemy helplessly ridiculous" (T. S. Eliot). "To apply that manner and that rhythm to Homer's incidents, is not to imitate Homer, but to travesty him" (Arnold). Figuratively, parody may be applied to any feeble or inappropriate attempt at imitation; travesty, to any ironically grotesque suggestion or resemblance; as, "a certain parody of devotion" (Stevenson); "The house! What a travesty of a home!" (Lucas). Ana. Satire, humor, sarcasm (see WIT): grotesqueness, fantasticality, bizarreness (see corresponding adjectives at FANTASTIC): lampoon, *libel, skit, squib, pasquinade.

caricature, v. Burlesque, parody, travesty. See under CARICATURE, n.

Ana. Mimic, mock, ape, imitate, *copy: distort, *deform: simulate, counterfeit (see ASSUME): *ridicule, deride.

carnage. Slaughter, butchery, *massacre, pogrom.

carnal. Carnal, fleshy, sensual, animal, animalistic come into comparison when they are used in reference to human beings, their acts, works, desires, and the like, and mean having or manifesting a physical rather than an intellectual or spiritual character or origin. Both carnal and fleshy imply a connection with the body or flesh, especially when thought of as distinct from the soul. In earliest usage and sometimes now in certain idiomatic phrases, carnal does not in itself imply condemnation; often it is a purely descriptive or classificatory term; thus, in some of the older psychologies, hunger and thirst were called carnal appetites and the hunger for knowledge and the thirst for happiness, spiritual or intellectual appetites, but all were regarded as capable either of abuse and misdirection or of being ordered to good ends. "Carnal knowledge" is as neutral in its implications as its more modern near-equivalent "sexual intercourse." In later usage, the word acquired its now common derogatory implications of a connection with man's lower nature and an absence of a positive spiritual or moral character; as, "the passion of Giovanni and Annabella... hardly rises above the purely carnal infatuation" (T. S. Eliot); "an age grossly carnal in its pleasures" (Wilde). Fleshy, though it implies a connection with the flesh, thought of as man's lower nature, is not so suggestive of condemnation as carnal; as, "his fleshy desires were strong" (M. K. Brady); "The godly dame, who fleshy failings damns" (Pope). In another sense, current since the middle of the nineteenth century when the term was used in describing a group ("The Fleshy School") of poets, including Swinburne, Morris, and Rossetti, fleshy is applied to artists and poets or their work to indicate emphasis on the evocation of sensations, usually delightful sensations. Sensual also implies a connection with sensations, but it further implies an indulgence in bodily sensation for its own sake rather than for an aesthetic end. "His feet and hands were always cold and there was for him an almost sensual satisfaction to be had from just lying perfectly still... and letting the hot sun beat down on him" (S. Anderson). Very often in modern use, the word carries implications of grossness or bestiality, and not merely, as in the case of carnal, of an absence of higher qualities. "A sloping meaty jaw, and large discolored buck-teeth which showed unpleasantly in a mouth . . . always half open . . . that gave his face its sensual, sly, and ugly look" (T. Wolfe). Animal implies a connection with man's physical nature as distinguished chiefly from his rational nature. In good modern use it more and more rarely implies an intent to depreciate. "Under this head come all the animal activities of men, eating and drinking, maternal devotion or ordinary maternal care" (S. Alexander). "The state in his view is not merely the convenient machinery that raises a man above his animal wants" (G. L. Dickinson). "He taught the boy boxing, and shooting, and . . . superintended the direction of his animal vigour" (Meredith). When there is the intent to imply sensuality, animalistic is now sometimes preferred, but the word is still comparatively rare.

Ana. Physical, *bodily, corporeal, corporal, somatic: *sensuous: gross, *coarse, vulgar, obscene: *earthly, earthy, worldly, mundane: lustful, lewd, wanton, lascivious (see LICENTIOUS).

Ant. Spiritual: intellectual. — Con. *Moral, ethical, virtuous, noble, righteous: ethereal, aerial (see AIRY): pure, *chaste, modest, decent.

carol. Carrell, cubicle, bay, *recess, alcove, nook, niche, embrasure.

carpenter, n. Carpenter, joiner, cabinetmaker or cabinetworker, framer are here compared as designating a man who works in wood. In English usage, carpenter is specifically applied to the ordinary worker in wood; joiner, to the worker in hard wood, or in soft wood when delicate work is required; cabinetmaker, to a joiner for fine work. In Scotland, joiner is the general term, carpenter not being in use. In the United States, joiner is rarely used; carpenter denotes the worker in wood for ordinary requirements, both the job workman who puts up shelves, hangs doors, etc., and also the structural woodworker engaged in the general erection of buildings; framer (which is used also of workers in steel and the like) denotes the workman who handles the constructional parts, such as the heavy timber of floors, roofs, and partitions; cabinetmaker, or the alternative cabinetworker, the workman, especially in hard wood, who does fine work (such as on cabinets, furniture, etc.) requiring special skill in fitting of parts, in finishing surfaces, and in elegance of detail.

carping, adj. Caviling, faultfinding, captious, *critical, hypercritical, censorious.

Ana. Blaming, reprehending, reprobating, criticizing (see CRITICIZE): upbraiding, jawing, railing (see SCOLD): depreciating or depreciative, disparaging, decrying (see corresponding verbs at DECRY).

Ant. Fulsome. — Con. Commending or commendatory, applauding, complimenting (see corresponding verbs at COMMEND): praising, lauding, extolling (see PRAISE, v): approving, endorsing (see APPROVE).

carrell. Carol, cubicle, bay, *recess, alcove, nook, niche, embrasure.

carriage. *Bearing, port, presence, mien, deportment, demeanor, manner, front.

Ana. *Posture, pose, attitude: *behavior, conduct: poise, address, savoir-faire, *tact.

carry, v. Carry, bear, convey, transport, transmit come into comparison when they mean to be, or to serve as, the agent or the means whereby something (or someone) is moved from one place to another. Carry originally and still often implies the use of a cart or carriage (now a train, ship, automobile, airplane, or the like: cf. the phrase common carrier) but it may imply a personal agent or a beast of burden or some natural or artificial passage, such as an artery or a pipe; as, the ship carries a heavy cargo; airplanes carry mail; to carry passengers; to carry news; please carry the basket to the house; the arteries carry the blood from the heart to the various parts of the body. Bear, in literal use, stresses the support of the weight of that which is being moved; in its extended senses, even though actual weight may not be implied, bear is preferred to carry when effort is suggested, or the importance or the significance of that which is carried is to be connoted; as, "Let four captains Bear Hamlet, like a soldier, to the stage" (Shak.); "over his head was born a rich canopy" (Johnson); then came the envoys bearing rich gifts; to come bearing good news. Convey is now more often used than carry of things that move continuously or in the mass or that pass through natural or artificial channels or mediums; as, an apparatus for conveying dirt from an excavation to the vehicles removing it (cf. a belt conveyor); freight cars (or in British use, goods wagons) for conveying coal from the mines to the various cities and towns; to build pipe lines to convey natural gas from one section to another; language conveys thought. Transport is used in place of carry or convey when the stress is on the movement of persons or goods from one place to another, as in vessels or in railway trains; as, to transport troops from Great Britain to France (cf. ships used as troop transports); California and Florida orange growers transport their produce to all parts of the country. "Most modern well-to-do Englishmen and Americans, if they were transported by magic into the Age of Elizabeth, would wish themselves back in the modern world" (B. Russell). Transmit emphasizes the causative power in an agent or instrument; it implies either an actual sending by some means of conveyance or transportation (as, the telegraph company transmits messages to all parts of the world; the steamship company will transmit your baggage whenever it receives the word) or the power or the property of permitting passage through or from one place to another (as, glass transmits light; metals transmit electricity).

Ana. Take, *bring, fetch: *move, remove, shift, transfer: drive, *ride.

cartel. 1 Compact, pact, convention, *contract, bargain, covenant, concordat, treaty, entente, indenture, mise.

Con. *Victory, triumph.

catch, v. 1 Catch, capture, nab, cop, trap, snare, entrap, ensnare, bag come into comparison as meaning to get into one's possession or under one's control either by taking or seizing or by means of skill, craft, or trickery. Catch, the ordinary and general term of this group, distinctively implies that the thing laid hold of has been in flight, in concealment, in constant movement, or the like, and that possession has been gained only by pursuit, force, strategy, or surprise, or by means of a device or accident which brings it within one's reach physically, ocularly, mentally, or the like; as, after several days' search, the detectives caught the murderer; he was not able to catch the man who snatched his purse; to catch fish; to catch a ball; to catch a pupil cheating in an examination; "his eyes caught the skirt of her dress" (Dickens); he did not catch the words they spoke; "that other aspect of truth which the scientist strives to catch and fix" (Lowes). Sometimes, the power of laying hold of is ascribed not to a person, his vision or other sense, his mind, heart, or imagination, but to the thing which draws to itself his attention, his eye, his fancy, etc.; as, "The fact caught her interest, just as sometimes a point in a wide dull landscape catches the eye" (Deland); "It may have seemed to Augustus an easy way of filling his treasury, and it caught the imagination of the Roman poets" (Buchan). Capture implies heavier odds than does catch, such as greater opposition or difficulty or more competition, with the result that possession suggests an overcoming or spells a victory; as, to capture a stronghold of the enemy; to capture a company of retreating soldiers; "he was making plans... to capture the banking of the country" (Belloc); "No artist can set out to capture charm; he will toil all the night and take nothing" (A. C. Benson). Nab and cop (both colloquial, the latter the more slangy term) imply a catching by means of which one is brought into custody, literally or figuratively; as, the boy was nabbed (or copped) by the police while stealing; "Ay, by my soul, you have nabbed me cleverly" (Richardson). Cop, trap, snare, entrap, and ensnare imply catching by a device which holds that which is caught in a position that is fraught with danger or difficulty, or from which escape is difficult or impossible. Literally, trap and snare imply the use of a trap or snare (see LURE, n.) but entrap and ensnare suggest trickery in capture more often than the use of an actual trap or snare: all four terms, both literally and figuratively, impute craft to the catcher and unwariness or lack of caution to the one that is caught. Distinctively, trap and entrap suggest a being held in a position where one is at the mercy of the captor and his designs, and snare and ensnare a being held so that the more one struggles the more desperate becomes one's situation; as, to trap an animal; to snare a bird; to trap a detachment of soldiers; "Themselves in bloody toils were snares" (Scott); to entrap wild elephants for use in a circus; to entrap a person into making a dangerous admission; "Let these Ensnare the wretched in the toils of law" (Thomson). Bag carries a double implication of catching (as game, specimens, etc.) and of putting them in a bag; as, he bagged several rare butterflies within the last month; to bag pheasants. So strong is the implication of catching and killing game in this use, that the word is often employed without suggestion of putting in a bag; as, they bagged three bears on their last hunting expedition.

Ana. Seize, *take, grasp, grab, clutch, snatch: apprehend, *arrest.

Ant. Miss.

2 *Incur, contract.

catching. Contagious, *infectious, communicable.

catchpole or catchpoll. Bailiff, constable, officer, *policeman, bobby, peeler, copper, cop, bull, gendarme.

cater, v. Cater, purvey, pander come into comparison when they mean to furnish a person or persons with that which satisfies his appetite or desires. Cater literally implies the provision of what is needed in the way of food and drink. "He that doth the ravens feed, Yea, provi-dently caters for the sparrow" (Shak.). In modern use, however, the term more often implies provision of food and drink ready for the table; as, to cater for dinners, weddings, and receptions. In extended use, cater often implies the provision of something that appeals to another and often lower appetite; as, "He rarely caters for the populace of the theatre by such indecencies" (Hallam); "Catering to the national taste and vanity" (Thackeray). Often, especially when followed by to, the term implies a certain subservieny to popular standards or uncultivated tastes; as, to cater to the public demand for the sensational, the entertaining, the sentimental. Purvey usually suggests the provision of food, but sometimes of other material necessities such as lodgings and clothes. In contrast with cater, however, it suggests service as a source of supply, either as an agent through whom what is wanted may be found or as a merchant who sells the needed articles; as, merchants who purveyed to the troops during the Seven Years' War. In figurative use, especially when followed by for or, much less often, to, purvey implies the provision of whatever is needed to satisfy, delight, or indulge. "This for his lust insatiably purveys" (Ken). Pander, which etymologically means to supply someone with one that gratifies his lust, in its more frequent extended use implies a purveying of that which will gratify desires and passions which are degrading or base; it frequently connotes servility or truckling; as, to pander to depraved appetites; to pander to morbid tendencies; to pander to a venal official.

Ana. *Furnish, equip, appoint, accouter: pamper, *indulge, humor: *satisfy, content.

catharsis. Purgation, *purification, ablution, lustration.

cathartic. Purge, purgative, *physic, laxative, aperient.

catholic, adj. *Universal, ecumenical, cosmopolitan, cosmic.

Ana. *Whole, entire, total: all-round, many-sided, *versatile: prevalent, *prevailing, current.

Ant. Parochial: provincial. — Con. *Narrow, strait: bigoted, fanatic, enthusiastic (see corresponding nouns at ENTHUSIAST).

cause, n. 1 Cause, determinant, antecedent, reason, occasion are here compared as denoting that which in whole or in part produces an effect or result. Cause is applicable to any circumstance, condition, event, force, or the like, that contributes to the production of an effect, or to any combination of circumstances, conditions, events, etc., that inevitably or necessarily brings about a result; as, one of the causes of the French Revolution was the bankruptcy of the government; every effect must have an adequate cause; what was the cause of this outbreak? "Water and soil pollution are the root causes of mortality in the tropics" (V. Heiser). Cause is sometimes loosely used of the agent whose activities are instrumental in bearing consequences (as, he is the cause of all our troubles) or of the motive which prompts one to action (as, he claimed to have just cause for his attack). A determinant is a circumstance, factor, element, quality, motive, or the like, that by itself or in combination with other circumstances, factors, etc., conditions, or fixes the nature of, a result, especially of a product or outcome; thus, environment is an important determinant of character; the ideals and the character of citizens are the final determinants of their form of government. "Imponderables," which in philosophy as in politics are the most important factors of experience and determinants of action" (Inge). "Strength of organization, shelter from foreign or other distant competition, command of markets in key industries—these...are the main direct determinants of wage-rates" (J. A. Hobson). Antecedent, as here considered, is applicable to any person or thing (often an object, sometimes a circumstance, condition, or event) that is responsible, usually in part, for a later existing person or thing, as by being one of its progenitors, precursors, or predeterminants. "It is certainly true that these twelfth-century windows...had no antecedent, and no fit succession" (H. Adams). "The antecedents of emperor-worship lay far back in history" (Buchan). "Insisting...that whatever happens could be explained simply and adequately if we knew its natural antecedents" (Inge). Reason is interchangeable with cause only as meaning specifically a traceable or explainable cause; it always implies therefore, as cause does not necessarily, that the effect is known or has actually been brought about. "There was a reason for Mark Twain's pessimism, a reason for that chagrin... That bitterness of his was the effect of a certain miscarriage in his creative life, a balked personality, an arrested development" (Van W. Brooks). Occasion applies to any situation or to any person, place, or event which provides a situation that, either directly or indirectly, serves to set in motion causes already existing or to translate them into acts; thus, the cause of a war may be a deep-rooted enmity between two peoples, the occasion of it, a relatively unimportant incident, such as the murder of a citizen of one country within the confines of the other; an occasion of sin may be a visit to a place, such as a saloon or public house, where the real cause, a propensity to drink, is not resisted.

Ana. *Motive, spring, incentive, inducement, spur, goad, impulse: motivation, activation, actuation (see corresponding verbs at ACTIVATE): agent, agency (see MEANS): *origin, root, source, prime mover.

Con. *Effect, result, consequence, outcome, issue.

2 *Suit, lawsuit, action, cause, case.

caustic. Caustic, mordant, mordacious, acrid, scathing come into comparison in their secondary senses when they mean stingingly incisive. Caustic usually implies a biting wit, a ready tongue or pen, and the power to drive disagreeable truths home. "I really do not know what to do with my books," he said, and looked round for sympathy. "Why not read them?" said a...caustic Fellow opposite" (A. C. Benson). Mordant is not always clearly distinguishable from caustic. In distinctive use, however, it suggests greater blighting power or deadlier effectiveness in the thrusts of wit; as, the mordant humor of G. B. Shaw. "Absolute master of a mordant pen" (Loves). "Other aspects of American society were mordantly analyzed" (Forum). Mordacious, now comparatively rare, equals mordant in implications but is more often applied to persons or their qualities. "Grand-duke and taxes were synonyms, according to this mordacious lexicographer!" (J. D'Israeli). Acrid adds to caustic the implications of bitterness and, often, malevolence. "Most satirists are indeed a public scourge... Their acrid temper turns... the milk of their good purpose all to curd" (Cowper). Scathing retains its etymological implication of injuring chiefly in its suggestion of a deliberate intent to scorch or blister. It seldom implies, as the other words of this group often imply, insensitiveness or maliciousness, and it often connotes both righteous indignation and fierce and withering severity; as, scathing censure or satire; a scathing exposure of graft.

Ana. Biting, cutting, *incisive, trenchant: *bitter: *sharp, keen, acute: *sarcastic, satirical, ironical.

Ant. Genial: lenient (in strict sense). — Con. *Suave, urbane, bland, diplomatic: *gracious, cordial: gentle, mild (see SOFT).

caution, n. Circumspection, wariness, chariness, calculation. See under CAUTIOUS.

Ana. Watchfulness, vigilance, alertness (see corresponding adjectives at WATCHFUL): *prudence, providence, foresight, forethought, discretion.

Ant. Temerity: adventurousness. — Con. Audacity, hardihood, nerve (see TEMERITY): rashness, recklessness, foolhardiness, daring, daredevilry (see corresponding adjectives at ADVENTUROUS).

caution, v. *Warn, forewarn.

Ana. Admonish (see REPROVE): counsel, advise (see under ADVICE).

cautious. Cautious, circumspect, wary, chary, calculating agree in meaning prudently attentive to the dangers one may encounter or the risks one may face, or revealing such attentiveness. The same differences in implications and connotations are apparent in the nouns caution, circumspection, wariness, chariness, calculation when they denote the quality of the character or the mental processes of one who is so attentive. Cautious and caution usually imply both the prompting of fear, especially of fear of failure or of harm to oneself or others, and the exercise of forethought in planning, or of prudence in proceeding, so that the dangers of failure or the risks of disaster may be avoided or minimized; as, the troops advanced with great caution; a cautious investor. "For the most part, he generalizes with a sobriety and a caution worthy of the highest praise" (A. Huxley). "The old man, cautious in all his movements, always acting as if surrounded by invisible spies, delayed setting out until an hour after dark" (Hudson). Circumspect and circumspection (etymologically, looking all around) frequently, but not invariably, imply less fear than cautious and caution; commonly, however, they suggest the exercise of great prudence and discretion, especially in making decisions or in acting, and the surveying of all possible consequences, lest moral, social, business, or political harm may inadvertently occur. "And in all things that I have said unto you be circumspect" (Exodus xxiii. 13). "The... circumspection with which it [the U. S. Supreme Court] approaches the consideration of such questions" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Wary and wariness usually carry a far stronger suggestion of suspiciousness than cautious and caution and sometimes, as a result, connote less well-grounded fear. Often, also, the terms imply alertness in watching out for difficulties or dangers, or cunning in escaping them. "They... had a wary eye for all gregarious assemblages of people, and turned out of their road to avoid any very excited group of talkers" (Dickens). "A subtle diplomacy and wary tactics would be necessary" (Bennett). "Our domestic dogs are descended from wolves... they may not have gained in cunning, and may have lost in waryness" (Darwin). Chary and chariness imply the cautiousness of those who are careful of what they have or what they can give, say, do, or the like, and proceed with great reserve or discretion. "I am chary of admitting native differences between the sexes, but I think that girls are less prone than boys to punish oddity by serious physical cruelty" (B. Russell). "Nature favored our understanding in this case, but as a rule she is chary of such favors" (Karl K. Darrow). "There was no fastidious over-refined chariness in the use of that name" (F. W. Robertson). Calculating and calculation imply the caution of one who carefully and deliberately plans the way to attain his end (often, but not invariably, a selfish end) taking into account every possible danger and the way in which it can be met. "Some day the American boy's outlook upon the future may be as clear and calculating as that of his European brother" (Grandgent). "Only in regard to la France do they [the French] permit themselves illusions. Only here does sentiment triumph freely and completely over calculation" (Brownell). The suggestion of selfish prudence that disregards the cruelty of the means, provided the end is attained, is often so strong in these words that the implication of cautiousness is lost and that of cold-hearted scheming or of deliberate cruelty takes its place. "The terrible men are the men who do everything in cold blood, icily, with calculation" (Hearn).

Ana. *Watchful, vigilant, alert: prudent, provident, foresighted, forethoughted, discreet (see under PRUDENCE): heedful, careful (see negative adjectives at CARELESS).

Ant. Adventurous, temerarious. — Con. Venturesome, daring, rash, reckless, foolhardy (see ADVENTUROUS): *precipitate, impetuous, headlong.

cave in. Succumb, submit, *yield, capitulate, relent, defer, bow.

caaviling, adj. Captious, faultfinding, censorious, carp-ing, *critical, hypercritical.

Ana. Exacting, demanding (see DEMAND): *contrary, perverse: objecting, protesting, expostulating, kicking (see OBJECT).

Con. Accommodating, obliging, favoring (see OBLIGE): complaisant, *amiable, good-natured: conciliating, pacifying, mollifying, appeasing (see PACIFY).

cavity. Hollow, *hole, pocket, void, vacuum.

Con. Bulge, protuberance, protrusion, *projection.

caymán. Alligator, *crocodile.

cease. *Stop, quit, discontinue, desist.

Ana. End, terminate, *close, conclude, finish: stay, suspend, intermit (see DEFER).

Con. *Spring, arise, rise, originate: *begin, commence, start, initiate, inaugurate: *extend, prolong, protract: *continue, persist.

cede. Surrender, abandon, waive, resign, yield, *relinquish, leave.

Ana. *Grant, concede, award, accord, vouchsafe.

Con. Withhold, hold back, retain (see KEEP).

celebrate. Commemorate, solemnize, observe, *keep.

celebrated. Renowned, noted, *famous, famed, distinguished, eminent, illustrious, notorious.

Ana. Prominent, conspicuous, outstanding, signal (see NOTICEABLE).

Ant. Obscure (of persons, achievements, etc.).

celebrity. *Fame, renown, glory, honor, éclat, reputation, repute, notoriety.

Ana. Prominence, conspicuousness (see corresponding adjectives at NOTICEABLE).

Ant. Obscurity.

celerity. Celerity, alacrity, legerity are comparable when they are used in reference to human beings and denote quickness in movement or action. Celerity stresses speed in moving, or especially in accomplishing work. "The dinner... was dispatched with uncommon celerity" (Peacock). "She could, when she chose, work with astonishing celerity" (Bennett). Alacrity emphasizes promptness in response more than swiftness in movement, though the latter is usually implied. "You must wait till she sends for you—" and she winced a little at the alacrity of his acceptance" (E. Wharton). Very often also, it connotes eagerness or cheerful readiness. "France, where alacrity of service counted for more than the service itself" (Hewlett). "Working away at his subject with the alacrity... of a man... fulfilling the very office... for which nature had designed him" (L. P. Smith). Legerity, a less common word than the others, refers more to the quality than to the rate of speed, and implies nimbleness and ease; as, to cover the ground with the legerity of a trained runner. "When the mind is quick'ned... The organs... newly move, With... fresh legerity" (Shak.). Ana. Expedition, dispatch, speed, hurry, *haste: quickness, rapidity, swiftness, fleetness (see corresponding adjectives at FAST): velocity, *speed: agility, briskness, nimbleness (see corresponding adjectives at AGILE).

Ant. Leisureliness. — Con. Slowness, deliberateness or deliberation, dilatoriness (see corresponding adjectives at SLOW): *lethargy, languor.

celestial, adj. Celestial, heavenly, empyrean (or empyreal) agree in meaning of, in, or from heaven or the heavens. Celestial (opposed to terrestrial) may refer either to the visible heavens (that is, the region surrounding the earth and seemingly enclosed by the sky) or to the religious conception of heaven or the heavens (that is, in Christian use, the abode of God, the angels, and the blessed dead); thus, a celestial globe is one on whose surface the stars, planets, comets, nebulae, etc., are depicted; a celestial body is a star, planet, or other aggregation of matter that forms a unit for astronomical study; a celestial visitant is an angel or other spirit from the spiritual heaven; celestial bliss is the happiness enjoyed by the souls in heaven. But celestial may also be used in reference to pagan conceptions of the abode of the gods; as, "That's a brave god, and bears celestial liquor" (Shak.); "Celestial Venus haunts Idalia's groves" (Pope). Heavenly, although it is applicable, especially in non-technical use, to the visible heavens (as, "heavenly bodies"—Bacon) or to pagan conceptions of Olympus, or other abodes of the gods (as, "the immortal Sun, Who, borne by heavenly steeds his race doth run"—Shelley), is far more often applied to heaven as conceived by Jews and Christians and is apt, therefore, to suggest spiritual qualities; as, "your heavenly Father" (Matthew vi. 14); "They desire a better country, that is, an heavenly" (Hebrews xi. 16); "I thought that Liberty and Heaven To heavenly souls had been all one" (Milton). Empyrean suggests association with the empyrean, either as thought of in ancient and medieval cosmology as the highest celestial sphere, a region of light or fire (as, "From the Courts of the Empyrean dome Came forth . . . a fiery car"—Praed) or, more often, as conceived by various theologians and poets as the highest of the spiritual heavens, where God is and reigns in spiritual light and fire (as, "Into the Heaven of Heavens I have presumed . . . and drawn empyrean air"—Milton). The words, however, are chiefly poetic, and often somewhat vague as to which idea is in the poet's mind.

Ana. Ethereal, aerial, *airy: divine, spiritual, *holy.

Ant. Terrestrial. — Con. *Earthly, mundane, earthy, terrene, worldly, sublunary, mortal: *infernal, hellish, chthonian.

cement, v. Cement, glue, agglutinate, though synonymous in their literal senses are, in discriminating use, precisely differentiated in their extended senses. All three carry the meaning to cause to unite or stick together by or as if by the use of an adhesive or binder. Cement, literally, implies the use of a plastic substance, which by hardening holds things together firmly and indissolubly. "The molten matter . . . cements the loose ashes and cinders into a compact mass" (T. H. Huxley). Figuratively, it implies a solid grounding or a stiffening and fixing; as, the marriage of the English queen and the Spanish king was expected to cement the relations between the two countries. "The great writers of our own age are . . . forerunners of some unimagined change in our social condition or the opinions which cement it" (Shelley). Glue, literally, implies the use of some sticky or viscous substance that causes things to adhere; as, to glue two pieces of wood together: figuratively, however, it seldom connotes union but rather a fastening of one thing upon another, often with a suggestion of unpleasant effects; as, his eye was glued to the keyhole. "As a ferret in a blind burrow might glue himself comfortably to the neck of a rabbit" (Kipling). Agglutinate is now seldom found in its strictly literal sense implying the presence of a viscous substance that causes things to cohere. In its extended use, it commonly implies a natural or an innate tendency to cluster or stick together; as, a substance in the blood, such as an antibody, may agglutinate certain harmful bacteria; in some languages, words are commonly formed by agglutination, or the running together of primitive words into compounds.

Ana. *Join, unite, combine: *stick, adhere, cohere.

cenobite or coenobite. *Recluse, eremite, hermit, anchorite.

Ana. Monk, friar, *religious, nun.

cenobitic, cenobitical or coenobitic, coenobitical.

*Monastic, monachal, monkish.

ensorious. Faultfinding, *critical, hypercritical, capacious, carping, caviling.

Ana. Reproaching or reproachful, chiding (see corresponding verbs at REPROVE): condemning or condemnatory, denouncing or denunciatory, reprehending (see corresponding verbs at CRITICIZE).

Ant. Eulogistic. — Con. Praising, extolling, lauding or laudatory, acclaiming or acclamatory (see corresponding verbs at PRaise): complimenting or complimentary, flattering, adulatory (see corresponding nouns at COMPLIMENT).

censure, v. *Criticize, reprehend, blame, condemn, denounce, reprobate.

Ana. Reprimand, rebuke, reproach, *reprove: upbraid, berate, tongue-lash (see SCOLD).

Ant. Commend. — Con. Applaud, compliment, recommend (see COMMEND): eulogize, laud, *praise.

center, n. Center (or centre), middle, midst, core, hub, omphalos, focus, nucleus, heart are here compared as meaning the point, spot, or portion of a thing which literally or figuratively is comparable to a point around which a circle is described. Literally, center approximates more or less closely its strict geometrical sense as the point within a circle or sphere that is equidistant from every other point on the circumference or is the average distance from the exterior points of a body or figure; as, the center of a circle, of a table, of a target, of a ball, of a lake, of the earth. Figuratively, center applies to anything or to any part of a thing which suggests a geometrical center, as being the point around which everything else rotates or revolves (as, "each airy thought revolved Round a substantial centre"—Wordsworth) or at which all lines, as of activity, converge (as, "Draw to one point, and to one centre bring Beast, Man, or Angel, Servant, Lord, or King"—Pope) or from which every line, branch, or the like, radiates (as, a railroad center; a power center) or which lies midway between extremes (thus, especially in Europe, a party of moderate views, neither conservative [the right] nor radical [the left] is often called the center). Literally, middle is less precise than center, and suggests a space rather than a point; it is the part of an object which surrounds the center; thus, the middle of a room is the central portion of it. "They have what they call a central dépôt here, because it's the middle of England" (Bennett). Middle, unlike center, also applies to that which has duration (as, the middle of the night), and to merely linear extension (as, the middle of the road). Figuratively, middle applies chiefly to that which lies between the beginning and end, as of a process, a course, a piece of work, or the like; as, he was stopped in the middle of his speech; a play should have a beginning, middle, and end. Midst is often used in place of middle for a point or spot well within a group or number of enveloping persons or objects, or figuratively, of things such as duties, affairs, burdens, and the like, that surround or beset one; however, it seldom occurs except in a prepositional phrase introduced by in, into, from, out of, and the like; as, he stood in the midst of a crowd; he penetrated into the midst of the forest; "Sense of right. Uppermost in the midst of fiercest strife" (Wordsworth). Core, literally the portion of a fruit of the apple family which lies at its center and is made up of pappy or leathery envelopes containing seeds, is by extension applied to anything that similarly lies at the center of a thing, and that resembles an apple core, as in being unconsumed or unused (thus, the unburnt portion of a coal or of a lump of lime is called a core), or in forming a firm central mass in a growth (as, the core of a boil), or in having a different character from that which surrounds or encloses it (thus, a corncob, in Australian use, is the core of an ear of Indian corn; in cabinetmaking soft wood on which veneers are glued is called a core), or more often, especially in figurative use, as in being the very center of a thing's life, significance, power, or the like. "I will wear him. In my heart's core, ay, in my heart of heart" (Shak.). "My own dim life should teach me this. That life shall live for evermore. Else earth is darkness at the core" (Tennyson). "The Romans . . . proved rebellious to the idea that living is an art; yet it may well be that they still retained that idea at the core of their morality" (H. Ellis). Hub, literally the central and usually solid part of a wheel from which the spokes radiate and which rotates on (or with) the axle, is figuratively and often humorously applied to any place, person, or thing on which all other places, persons, or things depend for their life, activity, ideas, progress, or the like. "Boston State-house is the hub of the solar system" (Holmes). "Listen! John A. Logan is the Head Center, the Hub, the King Pin, the Main Spring. . . of the . . . plot by which partisanship was installed in the Commission" (N. Y. Herald-Tribune). Omphalos, literally a navel, is less frequently used than hub in much the same figurative sense. "Bideford Bridge . . . is the very omphalos, cynosure, and soul, around which the town [of Bideford] . . . has organised itself" (Kingsley). Focus, etymologically a hearth, or fireplace, is applicable to any point of convergence or concentration, or in less precise use, of emanation; thus, the point at which rays of light meet after reflection or refraction is called a focus; a person to whom all eyes are turned is the focus of attention. "It [Antioch] was . . . a place of exchange for the merchandise of East and West, the nearest point to the Euphrates, and the focus of a network of trade routes" (Buchan). "We may say . . . that they [the arts and the sciences] all emanate from the same focus" (H. Ellis). Nucleus, literally the kernel, or the innermost part, of a nut or seed, applies in its extended senses to the vital and usually small and stable center of a larger mass, about which matter is gathered or concentrated, or to which accretions are made; as, the nucleus of a cell; the nucleus of an atom or of an assemblage of atoms; a small but good collection of books as a nucleus for his library. "[D. H. Lawrence] unable to recreate a satisfactory social group from the nucleus of his own individuality" (Day Lewis). Heart, like the organ from which it derives its figurative implications, applies to a place or thing that lies well within a region, a system, or the like, and which, usually, constitutes the source of life and power of the entire region or system; as, "exploits done in the heart of France" (Shak.); "Rome was the heart . . . of the empire. . . and on its well-being hung the future of the civilized world" (Buchan). "His proposals for making that Sunday School . . . the heart and focus of the parochial life" (C. Mackenzie).

Con. *Circumference, periphery, perimeter, compass: bounds, confines, limits (see singular nouns at LIMIT).

centuried. *Secular, agelong, aeonian, diuturnal.

Ana. *Lasting, perdurable, durable, stable, permanent, perpetual: established, settled, fixed (see SET).

cerebral. *Mental, intellectual, psychic, intelligent.

ceremonial, adj. Ceremonial, ceremonious, formal, conventional, solemn come into comparison when they mean characterized or marked by attention to the forms, details, etc., prescribed as right, proper, or requisite. Both ceremonial and ceremonious imply strict attention to what is prescribed by the etiquette or tradition of the court or of polite society, by the ritual of a church, or by the formalities of the law for an occasion, a ceremony, a procedure, or the like. But in present usage ceremonial applies only to things that in themselves are ceremonies or form an essential part of a ceremony or follow a set and elaborate procedure; as, the new ambassador made a ceremonial call on the president; "ceremonial observances and outward show" (Hallam); "the crisp, ceremonial laurel wreath of the Roman conqueror" (Pater). Ceremonious applies to things that are attended with ceremony (frequently elaborate or impressive), or to persons who are addicted (or to acts which show addition) to a punctilious observance of formalities; as, "Let us take a ceremonious leave" (Shak.); "[He] repeated the responses very audibly, evincing that kind of ceremonious devotion punctually observed by a gentleman of the old school" (Irving); "the ceremonious extinguishing of the candles" (L. P. Smith). Formal, as synonymous with ceremonial, suggests set form or procedure rather than external ceremonies; as, a formal call (cf. ceremonial call); formal dress. As synonymous with ceremonious, formal suggests stiffness, restraint, decorousness, rather than impressive dignity or punctiliousness. "The fatigue and slavery of maintaining a ceremonial, more stiff, formal, and oppressive than the etiquette of a German elector" (Smollett). "The habits of the family . . . may be termed formal, and old-fashioned by such visitors as claim to be the pink of the mode" (Scott). Conventional applies to that which is in accord with or governed by the recognized, frequently artificial, conventions or standards; it connotes lack of originality or independence; as, a conventional expression of regret; the conventional white tie with men's full evening dress; a highly conventional person; "the discord . . . between conventionality and originality" (C. Waldstein). Solemn, as here compared, is used only in relation to religious observances or services and to certain acts the conduct of which is prescribed by law. The term implies, usually, strict attention to every detail that is prescribed or allowed by the ritual of the church or by the formalities of the law; thus, a solemn Mass is one in which the full liturgy is followed; a solemn feast is one celebrated not only by the full liturgy but by other ceremonial observances such as processions, pageants, and the like; a solemn war is one that begins with a formal declaration of war; so, the probate of a will in solemn (as distinguished from common) form.

Ana. Liturgical, ritualistic (see corresponding nouns at FORM).

ceremonial, n. Ceremony, ritual, rite, liturgy, *form. ceremonious. *Ceremonial, formal, solemn, conventional.

Ana. Impressive, *moving: *decorous, seemly, proper, comme il faut: stately, imposing, majestic, grandiose (see GRAND).

Ant. Unceremonious, informal.

ceremony. Ceremonial, ritual, liturgy, rite, *form, formality.

certain, adj. 1 Positive, *sure, cocksure.

Ana. *Confident, assured, sanguine.

Ant. Uncertain. — Con. *Doubtful, dubious, questionable.

2 Certain, inevitable, necessary, apodictic (or apodictical, apodeictic, apodeictical) come into comparison only when they mean bound to follow in obedience to the laws of nature or of thought. That is certain which does not admit of being described as probable, even in the highest conceivable degree, and which, therefore, is beyond question or dispute; as, death is the only future event we can regard as certain; "it is certain that effects must have a cause" (Bp. Butler). That is inevitable (see also INEVITABLE) which is what it must be (sometimes should be) according to the unchangeable laws of nature, laws of logic, laws of beauty, and the like. In this sense inevitable often carries no suggestion of unavoidability, its etymological implication, but stresses finality, as in truth or rightness, or an ultimate character, such as perfection. "The results obtained in an actual experiment . . . seem nonsensical . . . when we picture light as bullets, but perfectly natural and inevitable when we picture it as waves" (Jeanes). "The design is, indeed, so happy, so right, that it seems inevitable; the design is the story and the story is the design" (Cather). That is necessary which is logically or naturally inevitable and which cannot be denied without resulting contradiction or frustration. "Most of the distinctions of law are distinctions of degree. If the States had any power it was assumed that they had all power and that the necessary alternative was to deny it altogether" (Justice Holmes). "His [Shakespeare's] plays are the necessary expression of his mind and character, not the necessary conditions of his existence" (Inge). That is apodictic which is logically necessary or the logical necessity of which can be demonstrated; as, apodictic truths; "the apodictic certainty belonging to mathematical conclusions" (G. H. Lewes).

Ant. Probable: supposed. — Con. Possible, likely (see PROBABLE): precarious (see DAUGHTER).

certainty. Certainty, certitude, assurance, conviction are here compared only as denoting a state of mind in which one is free from doubt. Certainty and certitude both imply the absence of all doubt as to the truth of something; they are not always distinguishable in use, although philosophers and psychologists have often tried to distinguish the states of mind which they designate. The psychological differentiation of certainty as the state of mind induced by that of which there is objectively, as well as subjectively, not the slightest question, from certitude, as the state of mind of one whose faith or belief is so strong that it resists all attack, has indubitably affected the meanings and the use of these terms by careful writers and speakers; as, to know something with scientific certainty; some philosophies tend to destroy man's certainty of his own existence; one has certainty of nothing in the future, even that the sun will rise tomorrow, but that does not weaken one's certitude that the world will go on indefinitely. "Certitude is not the test of certainty. We have been cocksure of many things that were not so" (Justice Holmes). In looser use, however, certitude usually suggests deeper roots for one's freedom from doubt than certainty, or less likelihood of a change of belief. "Robert did so well in the lawyer's office that by-and-by his . . . assurance came back to him, his old intelligent certainty of ability" (Deland). "One thing, however, we feel with irresistible certitude, that Mark Twain's fate was once for all decided there" (Van W. Brooks). Assurance (see also CONFIDENCE, 2) stresses sureness and confidence rather than certainty; the grounds of such sureness are not objective proofs or the evidence of one's senses, for that of which one has assurance is usually something that is indemonstrable or is yet to happen; the word usually suggests implicit reliance on oneself (one's powers, one's intuitions, one's methods, etc.) or complete trust in another (as one's source of information, one's supporter, one's sovereign, God). "I'll make assurance double sure, And take a bond of fate" (Shak.). "Faith is the assurance of things hoped for" (Hebrews xi. 1, R. V.). "Rather, it might be said that he [Emerson] went beyond hope to the assurance of present happiness" (P. E. More). Conviction usually, but not invariably, implies previous doubt or uncertainty. It involves the idea of certitude, but is not its equivalent, for certitude may or may not imply a rational basis for one's freedom from doubt, and conviction, in careful use (but see also OPINION), commonly does. It differs from certainty in stressing one's subjective reaction to evidence rather than the objective validity of the evidence itself. Conviction is therefore commonly applied to the state of mind of one who has been, or is in the process of being, convinced. "Rational assent [to the dogmas of Christianity] may arrive late, intellectual conviction may come slowly, but they come inevitably without violence to honesty and nature" (T. S. Eliot). "She does not wish me to go unless with a full conviction that she is right" (Conrad).

Ana. *Belief, faith, credence: proof, demonstration (see under PROVE).

Ant. Uncertainty. — Con. Doubt, skepticism, mistrust (see UNCERTAINTY).

certify. 1 Certify, attest, witness, vouch for come into comparison when they mean to testify to the truth or genuineness of something. Certify usually implies a statement in writing, especially one that carries one's signature or seal or both, or one that is legally executed; thus, a certified check carries the guarantee of a bank that the signature is genuine and that there are sufficient funds on deposit to meet it; a certificate of a school is a document in which the proper authorities certify that the holder has met the requirements of a course or the school and has passed a final examination. "They said their chemists . . . could certify on their honor that their extract contained no salicylic acid" (V. Heiser). Attest (see also INDICATE) implies oral or written testimony from a person in a position to know the facts, usually but not invariably given under oath or on one's word of honor; thus, when one says that something is well attested, one implies that there is sufficient documentary or oral testimony from competent persons to warrant its acceptance. "The pleader . . . had witness ready to attest . . . that every article was true" (Swift). "But of the Mediaeval university the lawlessness, though well attested, can scarcely be conceived" (Quiller-Couch). In current legal use, attest is used chiefly in reference to the official authentication of a document, such as a will, a deed, a record, or to the guaranteeing of the genuineness of a signature, to a statement or oath, or the like, by a notary public, a commissioner of deeds, or the like. "An attested copy of the marriage record" (Cather). Witness as here compared implies attestation, but not necessarily official or notarial attestation, of a signature of a statement, a will, a bond, or the like, by one who has seen that signature actually made and who subscribes his own name to the document as evidence of its genuineness; as, he called in two of his servants to witness the signature to his will. Vouch for now rarely implies official or legal proof, which the other words in this group so often do imply, but it suggests that the one who testifies is a competent authority or a reliable person who will stand behind his affirmation and support it further if necessary. "For the exactness of this story [of a purported miracle] in all its details, Bishop James of Voragio could not have vouched, nor did it greatly matter. What he could vouch for was the relation of intimacy and confidence between his people and the Queen of Heaven" (H. Adams).

Ana. Testify, depose, depone, asseverate, affirm, *swear: avouch, avow, aver, *assert.

2 Endorse, accredit, *approve, sanction.

Ana. Vouch for (see CERTIFY): *authorize, commission, license.

Con. Reject, repudiate, refuse (see DECLINE).

certitude. *Certainty, assurance, conviction.

Ana. *Belief, faith, credence, credit: sureness, positiveness, cocksureness (see corresponding adjectives at SURE).

Ant. Doubt. — Con. *Uncertainty, skepticism, mistrust.

cess. Rate, *tax, levy, assessment, excise, impost, customs, duty, toll, tariff, tribute, tithe, teind.

chafe. Fret, gall, *abrade, excoriate.

chaff, v. *Banter, rally, kid, rag, guy, jolly, rib, josh, quiz.

Ana. Tease, tantalize, *worry: *ridicule, deride, twit, taunt.

chagrined. Mortified, *ashamed.

Ana. Discomfited, abashed, embarrassed, disconcerted (see EMBARRASS): humiliated (see ABASE): discomposed, perturbed, upset (see DISCOMPOSE).

chain, n. Series, train, string, set, sequence, suit, suite, *succession, progression.

chamber. 1 *Room, apartment.

2 In plural form chambers. *Rooms, lodgings, quarters, diggings, digs, apartment, flat, tenement.

champion, n. 1 Vanquisher, *victor, winner, conqueror.

2 Backer, advocate, upholder, supporter. See under SUPPORT, v.

champion, v. Back, advocate, uphold, *support.

Ana. *Contend (for), fight (for), battle (for): espouse (see ADOPT): defend, justify, vindicate, *maintain: aid, assist, *help.

Ant. Combat. — Con. *Oppose, resist, withstand: condemn, denounce (see CRITICIZE).

chance, n. 1 Chance, accident, fortune, luck, hap, hazard, as here compared, agree in designating that which happens without an apparent or determinable cause or as a result of unpredictable forces. Chance serves often as a general name for the incalculable and fortuitous element in human existence and in nature and is usually opposed to law (see PRINCIPLE). "It is incorrect to say that any phenomenon is produced by chance; but we may say that two or more phenomena are conjoined by chance... meaning that they are in no way related by causation" (J. S. Mill). In nontechnical use, chance seldom loses implications derived from its early association with the casting of dice or lots and the selection of one out of many possibilities by this means. Consequently, it may mean determination by irrational, uncontrollable forces; as, to leave things to chance: it may mean degree of probability; as, his chance of success is one in ten: it may mean one possibility of success among many possibilities of failure; as, he is always willing to take a chance. Accident is interchangeable with chance only when a particular event or situation is in mind; as, it happened by accident (or, by chance). It differs from chance mainly in its emphasis on lack of intention. "Buildings are not grouped like that by pure accident!" (Calder). "The extension of her [Rome's] boundaries had been achieved rather by accident than by design" (Buchan). Fortune, owing to its historical connection with the ancient Roman goddess of chance, Fortuna, often designates the hypothetical cause of that which happens fortuitously; as, fortune favored him in his first attempt. It also often suggests qualities ascribed to the goddess, such as variability, fickleness, and malignity. "I may conquer fortune's spite By living low, where fortune cannot hurt me" (Shak.). "Vicissitudes of fortune" (Gibbon). Fortune is also applied to the issue or outcome of an undertaking the success of which is problematical; as, the fortunes of the chase. "Now heaven send thee good fortune!" (Shak.). Luck differs from fortune chiefly in its connotations. It not only lacks the dignity accruing to fortune through the latter's mythological associations, but it is somewhat debased by its association, etymologically and in continued use, with gambling. Because of its colloquial quality, it is preferable in contexts where fortune would seem bookish; as, bad luck followed him all his days; it was just our luck to miss that train; the fisherman had good luck today. Luck unqualified can, however, imply success or a happy outcome, as fortune unqualified rarely does; as, I wish you luck; he had luck in all his adventures. Hap commonly denotes that which (or something which) falls to one's lot; as, throughout their lives they had known good hap and evil hap. Even when personified, it differs from luck and fortune in implying actual occurrence; as, as hap would have it, I missed the train (cf. if fortune [not hap] permits me to catch the train). Hazard, which originally denoted a game of dice in which the chances are complicated by arbitrary rules, is now often used in place of accident, especially when there is the traceable but not predictable influence of existing conditions or of concomitant circumstances. "Men and women danced together, women danced together, men danced together, as hazard had brought them together" (Dickens). "The choice [of examples] has been determined more by the hazards of my recent reading than by anything else" (A. Huxley).

Ana. Contingency, emergency, pass, *juncture, exigency. Ant. Law (see PRINCIPLE). — Con. Inevitableness or inevitability, necessariness or necessity, certainty (see corresponding adjectives at CERTAIN).

2 *Opportunity, occasion, break, time, tide.

Ana. Possibility, likelihood, probability (see corresponding adjectives at PROBABLE): *prospect, outlook, foretaste, anticipation.

chance, v. *Happen, hap, befall, betide, occur, transpire chance, adj. *Random, haphazard, chancy, casual, desultory, hit-or-miss, happy-go-lucky.

chancy. Haphazard, chance, hit-or-miss, happy-go-lucky, *random, casual, desultory.

change, v. Change, alter, vary, modify (and their corresponding nouns change, alteration, variation, modification), agree in denoting to make or become different (or in denoting a difference effected). Change implies either an essential difference, even a loss of identity, or the substitution of one thing for another. "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots?" (Jeremiah xlii. 23). "And Earth be changed to Heaven, and Heaven to Earth" (Millon). Alter stresses difference in some particular respect, as in form or detail, without implying loss of identity; as, one may alter a coat without changing its style. "The whole existing order must be, if ever so slightly, altered" (T. S. Eliot). "External circumstances may change catastrophically, as during a war; or gradually, as when means of production are altered" (A. Huxley). The two words are, however, frequently interchangeable. Vary frequently implies a difference or a series of differences due to shifting, diversification, growth, etc.; as, the temperature varies greatly during the day; to vary one's diet. "Any intelligent effort to vary or improve the effect" (H. Adams). Sometimes it implies a deviation from the normal, the conventional, the usual, etc. "The voice of a town-crier, varied by a bitter accentuation and satiric sing-song tone" (Meredith). "This is not a proceeding which may be varied...but is a precise course...to be strictly pursued" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Modify, when used with a full sense of its historic meaning, suggests, now more often than implies, a difference that limits or restricts; thus, an adjective is said to modify a noun because it definitely reduces the range of application of that noun, as old in "old men" and red in "a red rose." Oftentimes it implies moderation, as of severity, or toning down, as of excess. "In London, in Vienna...traffic rules were modified to let him [Mark Twain] pass in the street" (Van W. Brooks). "Sophia was at first set down as overbearing. But in a few days this view was modified" (Bennett). In looser, but still correct, usage it often suggests minor changes or absence of radical changes. "History shows you men whose master-touch Not so much modifies as makes anew" (Browning).

Ana. *Transform, metamorphose, transmute, convert, transmutify: *exchange, interchange: fluctuate, oscillate (see SWING, v.).

Con. Settle, *set, establish, fix: endure, abide, *continue, persist.

change, n. 1 Alteration, variation, modification. See under CHANGE, v.

Ana. *Variety, diversity: divergence, *deviation, aberration.

Ant. Uniformity: monotony.

2 Change, mutation, permutation, vicissitude, alternation come into comparison especially in their concrete senses. Change, the inclusive term, denotes not only any variation, alteration, or modification in a thing, as in its form, substance, or aspect, but also any substitution of one thing for another; as, he could detect no change in her when they met again; the body undergoes changes during puberty; a change of season; a change of clothes often makes a change in one's appearance. Mutation and permutation are applied to a change within a thing or in a combination of things regarded as a whole or unit. Mutation stresses lack of permanence or stability; in older use it was applied to variations or alterations that are expected only because they are inherent in the nature of things, but are otherwise fortuitous or unaccountable. "O world! But that thy strange mutations make us hate thee, Life would not yield to age" (Shak.). In modern use, these latter implications have been much affected by the theory of evolution; the term often connotes suddenness and unpredictableness, but seldom implies impossibility of explanation; often also it implies orderly change. "So far as reality means experienceable reality, both it and the truths men gain about it are everlastingly in process of mutation—mutation towards a definite goal, it may be" (W. James). Permutation implies transposition within a group or combination of things without change in the constituent elements or parts of that group or combination. It is now used largely in reference to a change in position within a group of digits, letters, and the like; as, the 26 letters of the alphabet are capable of endless combinations and permutations. In literary use, however, it implies a rearrangement of constituent elements that effects a change in relations, emphasis, or significance, and so gives a new form to what is substantially the same material. "Conventions beget conventions, to be sure, and their ramifications and permutations are endless" (Lowes). "[Pater's] permutation of Arnold's view of life" (T. S. Eliot). Vicissitude implies a change so great as to seem a substitution for, or a reversal of, what has been. Sometimes, it is applied to such changes as occur in natural succession or from one extreme to another. "Nature indeed vouchsafes for our delight The sweet vicissitudes of day and night" (Cowper). "Like walking in a wood where there is...a constant vicissitude of light and shade" (J. R. Lowell). More often, it is applied to a sweeping and unpredictable change that overturns what has been, and so has the character of a revolution or an upheaval. "The place and the object gave ample scope for moralising on the vicissitudes of fortune, which spares neither man nor the proudest of his works, which buries empires and cities in a common grave" (Gibbon). This implication of reverse is now so strong that the original implication of succession in turn is gradually disappearing (see DIFFICULTY). Alternation, though derived from the verb alternate (see ROTATE, 2) and therefore often limited to succession of two things in turn, is now used, as vicissitude once was, of two or more things; as, the alternation of the seasons.

Ana. Metamorphosis, transformation, conversion, transmutation, transmutification (see under TRANSFORM): substitute, surrogate, shift (see RESOURCE).

changeable, changeful, variable, mutable, protean come into comparison as meaning having or showing a marked capacity for changes or a marked tendency to alter itself or be altered under the slightest provocation. Changeable, the ordinary and most comprehensive term of this group, usually suggests this capacity or tendency as a characteristic or property that is the result of inconstancy, fickleness, an unsettled state, a ready responsiveness to certain influences, a roving habit, or the like; as, changeable weather; "young men especially...are so amazingly changeable [i.e., in their affections or interests]" (Austen); a changeable disposition; a changeable silk (that is, one that seems to change its color with each change of position or point of view). Changeful is not only a more poetic term than changeable but it throws greater stress on the fact of changing frequently rather than on the underlying characteristic or property which manifests itself in such changes; as, "The changeful April day" (Souhey); "His course had been changeful" (Molloy); "He felt that life was changeful, fluid, active, and that to allow it to be stereotyped into any form was death" (Wilde); "All your charms more changeful than the tide" (Millay). Variable carries an implication of subjection to frequent and, often, deeper changes than either of the preceding words: it stresses shifting or fluctuation as a characteristic or property and, therefore, usually connotes uncertainty or unpredictability; as, a region of variable winds; "Man himself was a variable, mixed and transitory creature; he could not escape the law of his own being" (L. P. Smith); "the methods of statistics are so variable and uncertain...that it is never possible to be sure that one is operating with figures of equal weight" (H. Ellis); "The ends which individual works of art attempt to achieve are...diverse, and the means...[employed] seem almost infinitely variable" (J. W. Krutch). Mutable also implies subjection to change, but it suggests an opposition to unchanging, fixed, or permanent, and therefore is less often applied to that which is fluctuating and variable than to that which, in living, growing, developing, or the like, exhibits changes due to progression or retrogression or to external influences or conditions over which the thing affected has no control; as, "my lord, you know what Virgil sings, Woman is various and most mutable" (Tennyson); "Our valuation of poetry...depends upon several considerations, upon the permanent and upon the mutable and transitory" (T. S. Eliot); "All that gladdens, saddens, maddens us men and women on this brief and mutable traject [i.e., passage, or course of existence]" (Quiller-Couch). Protean suggests a capacity for assuming many different forms or shapes, in the manner of the god Proteus, without loss of identity: the term therefore implies changeability with respect to outer manifestations rather than inner character or nature; as, an amoeba is a protean animalcule; the protean genius of Shakespeare; "For poetry is protean in its moods and dispositions, and its diction changes with its bents and its occasions" (Lowes).

char, n. Variant of CHARE.

character, n. 1 Character, symbol, sign, mark, note are here compared only in the specific sense of an arbitrary or conventional device that is used in writing and in printing, but is neither a word nor a phrase nor a picture. Character (etymologically something engraved) always suggests the generally accepted form or shape of such a device; it is applicable to any letter of an alphabet, to any digit in arithmetical notation, to any note in musical notation, or to any single and simple figure or diagram which is the conventional representation of something, such as a comma (,), a direction to delete (δ), a minute in degree ('), an indication of G clef in music (G), or the like. Symbol is often used interchangeably with character in this sense; in precise use, however, it is employed when the meaning or significance of the character rather than its shape is stressed; thus, one would say that for each letter in the English alphabet there are four characters, two (small letter and capital) for writing and two (lower-case and capital) for printing; each letter of an alphabet is a symbol for a speech sound; the character ? is the symbol used to indicate that a question has been asked. However, symbol and character are not always interchangeable, for single characters may be symbols for different things; thus, the character X is the

twenty-fourth letter of the English alphabet, and a symbol for the sound associated with that letter, but it is also a symbol for an unknown quantity in algebra, for the number ten in Roman notation, etc. Symbol is also sometimes extended to other devices than those strictly called characters, such as abbreviations (as, O is the symbol for oxygen), as diagrams or schematic figures (as, \odot is the symbol for full moon in calendars), or as more or less arbitrary arrangements of numerals, letters, or other characters (as, 12mo, or 12°, is the symbol for duodecimo). Sign, like symbol, stresses the meaning rather than the form of the device; unlike symbol, however, it is seldom interchangeable with character, either because it may be a complicated device involving many characters, or because it is less arbitrary and actually suggests through its shape or form the thing which it signifies. There is a tendency therefore to prefer sign to symbol when the device is complicated or in its form gives a hint of what it represents, either because it is a schematic representation of the thing (as, \odot is the sign for full moon; ∇ is a highway sign for double right curves; Δ is in botany the sign for an evergreen tree, many of which are conifers) or because it has figurative associations with the idea represented (as, \rightarrow , an arrow, or sign indicating direction; Ω , a horseshoe, or sign of good luck). Sign, however, is used idiomatically of characters indicating a mathematical operation (as, the plus sign [+]; the minus sign [-]), and of those indicating one of the twelve divisions of the Zodiac (♈ is the sign of Aries, the Ram). Mark comes closer to character than symbol or sign, because it carries little, if any, suggestion of reference to an idea. It is the ordinary designation of any of various characters that are used to make clear the meaning of a passage but that add nothing to that meaning (as, punctuation marks, such as the comma [,] or the question mark [?]) or that indicate to the eye how words should be pronounced (as, pronunciation marks such as the acute accent ['] or the cedilla [ç]; diacritical marks such as " over the vowel a). In music, sign and mark are sometimes used interchangeably, but more often conventionally in given phrases; thus, ♩ is called either the crecendo mark or sign; ♩ is called the repeat sign and ||| the repeat marks; the arrangement of sharps ♯ and flats after a clef is called the sign of the key (or technically, key signature). Note, as here compared, is now used chiefly in reference to any of the characters which in written or printed music indicate by their shape the relative duration of a tone, and by their position on a staff, the pitch of a tone; as, ♩ is a quarter note; the first note on the staff ♩ is b, and the second is d. Note is sometimes ♩ used in place of mark, especially for a punctuation mark that indicates an inflection or tone; as, ? is a note of interrogation. This use is not now as common as formerly.

2 *Quality, property, attribute, accident.

Ana. Characteristic, peculiarity, distinctiveness or distinction, individuality (see corresponding adjectives at CHARACTERISTIC).

3 Individuality, personality, complexion, temperament, temper, *disposition.

Ana. *Mind, intellect, soul, intelligence: *soul, spirit: *courage, mettle, spirit, resolution.

4 Nature, description, *type, kind, ilk, sort, stripe, kidney.

characteristic, adj. Characteristic, individual, peculiar, distinctive come into comparison when they mean indicating or revealing the special quality or qualities of a particular person or thing or, less often, of a particular group of persons or things. Characteristic stresses the indication or revelation not only of that which is essential or typical, but of that which distinguishes and serves to identify the person, the thing, or the group: the word, however, fixes the attention on the thing considered more as it is in itself than as it seems in contrast or relation to other things; as, he answered with characteristic courtesy; "It was characteristic of the relationship between these two that, in all the pleadings and protests of the poor deferred lover, Sally never made the offer of convention and custom to release him" (Deland); "A fertile oasis possesses a characteristic colour scheme of its own" (A. Huxley). Individual (as here considered: see also SPECIAL) not only implies a reference to a particular person or thing but also places much more stress on a quality or qualities that distinguish him or it from all other members of the same class or kind than does characteristic: it therefore usually applies to something that indicates or reveals a personality or a nature that is different from all others; as, "That singularly individual voice of Tom's—mature, confident, seldom varying in pitch, but full of slight, very moving modulations" (Cather). Peculiar (as here compared: see also STRANGE) comes close to individual in this latter sense, for it usually implies a reference to a person or thing as he or it is in himself or itself and as differentiated from all others of the same kind. It may, however, apply to a class, such as a sex, a race, a people, or the like. In this use, the term does not, as in its more common derived sense, necessarily carry any hint of strangeness or oddness: rather it suggests private and undisputed possession, as of a quality, a character, an emotion, or a significance; as, "a grief that was private and peculiar" (Meredith); "a drowsy fervour of manner and tone which was quite peculiar to her" (Hardy). "In these aspects... of his work we pretend to find what is individual, what is the peculiar essence of the man" (T. S. Eliot). "It is the pattern [of word arrangement] that gives to this meaning its peculiar quality and intensity" (A. Huxley). Distinctive implies the possession of an individuality or peculiarity that marks the thing so described as apart from all others of its class or type and often, therefore, as worthy of special recognition or praise. "It is this... distinctive vision of the world as a whole which seems to give Leonardo that marvellous flair for detecting vital mechanism in every field" (H. Ellis). "It is... the exquisite craftsmanship... that has given to free verse, alike in England and America, its most distinctive qualities" (Loves).

charitable. Charitable, benevolent, humane, humanitarian, philanthropic, altruistic are comparable when they mean having or showing interest in the welfare of others. Charitable, in modern use, stresses either active generosity to the poor or leniency and mercifulness in one's judgments of others, but in each case it usually retains, in some degree, the implications that were emphasized in its early use of fraternal love or of compassion as the animating spirit behind the gift or the judgment. "Generous and charitable, prompt to serve" (Wordsworth). "Mrs. Hawthorne had been rude... to a friend of his, but that friend, so much more charitable and really good than she was, had made excuses for her" (Arch. Marshall). Benevolent also stresses an inner compulsion, such as native kindness, a desire to do good, or an interest in others' happiness and well-being. In contrast with charitable, however, it more often suggests an innate disposition than an inculcated virtue; as, his intentions are benevolent. "Old Dimple with his benevolent smile" (H. G. Wells). "My mother... always employed in benevolent actions while she uttered uncharitable words" (E. Wharton). "The administrator of the future must be the servant of free citizens, not the benevolent ruler of admiring subjects" (B. Russell). Humane implies tenderness and compassion, sometimes as qualities of one's temperament, but sometimes as qualifications of enlightened and sensitive human beings; it is referable chiefly, but not exclusively, to methods, policies, and the like, affecting the welfare of others; as, humane treatment of prisoners or of animals. "With reasonable men, I will reason; with humane men I will plead; but to tyrants I will give no quarter, nor waste arguments where they will certainly be lost" (W. L. Garrison). Humanitarian suggests an interest in the welfare or well-being of masses of men more than of the individual. In early use it often connoted sentimentality or evasion of actual contact with misery. "Pecksniff presents himself as a humanitarian philosopher" (A. W. Ward). "The most mischievous men of our day are our conceited political economists and our ultra humanitarians" (A. Baring). In present use, it seldom carries such connotations, for it is now most often applied to the acts and policies of institutions, rulers, governments, and the like. "Health should be regarded from the economic as well as from the humanitarian viewpoint. To be without it [is] to be without earning power" (V. Heiser). Philanthropic also suggests interest in humanity rather than in the individual, but it now commonly implies, as humanitarian does not, the giving of money on a large scale to organized charities, to endow institutions for human advancement or social service, or the like, or the dedication of one's fortune and efforts to humanitarian causes; as, philanthropic millionaires; a philanthropic foundation. Altruistic presupposes the guidance of an ethical principle: that the interests of others should be exalted above those of self; it, therefore, usually implies the absence of selfishness and, often, indifference to one's own welfare or interests; as, altruistic motives; an altruistic physician.

Ana. Generous. *liberal, bountiful, munificent: merciful, *forbearing, lenient, clement, tolerant: *tender, compassionate, warmhearted, sympathetic.

Ant. Uncharitable. — Con. Merciless, relentless, implacable (see GRIM): *stingy, close, closefisted, parsimonious, niggardly, cheeseparing, curmudgeonly.

charity. 1 *Mercy, clemency, grace, lenity.

Ana. Love, affection, *attachment: benevolence, humaneness, altruism (see corresponding adjectives at CHARITABLE): benignness or benignity, benignancy, kindness, kindness (see corresponding adjectives at KIND): generosity or generosity, liberality or liberality, bountifulness or bounty (see corresponding adjectives at LIBERAL): good will, amity, *friendship. Ant. Malice, ill will. — Con. Malevolence, malignity, spite, spleen (see MALICE).

2 Charity, philanthropy come into comparison in several of their meanings. Both words denote basically a love for one's fellow men and a disposition to help those who are in need. But charity in this sense tends to suggest a Christian virtue and the will to help, as well as the deed, whenever the occasion arises; as, "Alas for the rarity Of Christian charity Under the sun!" (Hood); "Melt not in an acid sect The Christian pearl of charity" (Whittier). Philanthropy in this sense is much vaguer because it usually implies a love of mankind and a disposition to help the community or one's fellow men rather than the individual; as, "This philanthropy... is every where manifest in our author" (Dryden). Consequently, in current use there is a tendency to think of charity as benevolence manifested especially, but not exclusively, in public or private provision for the relief of the poor, and of philanthropy as benevolence manifested in efforts to promote the welfare or wellbeing of one's fellow men; thus, out of charity one provides for the support of a destitute orphan; out of philanthropy one sends a large gift of money to an educational institution. "In benevolence, they excel in charity, which alleviates individual suffering, rather than in philanthropy, which deals with large masses and is more frequently employed in preventing than in allaying calamity" (Lecky). The terms also may be applied to that which is done or to that which is given out of charity or philanthropy, or to the institution or cause which is the object of the benefaction; as, "The cold philanthropies, the ostentatious public charities... he exposed with utter and relentless scorn" (Wilde); many charities and many philanthropies were aided by him during his lifetime.

Ant. Forbidding.

chart, n. Chart, map, graph come into comparison as nouns meaning a graphic and explanatory representation, usually on a plane surface, by means of lines, dots, colors, and the like, of something incapable of pictorial representation (because too large, too detailed, too abstract, or the like), and as verbs meaning to make such a representation of something. Chart now is the most inclusive term of this group, for it implies the aim to make clear to the mind, through the eye, not only, as originally, the relative geographical positions of certain places on, and certain features of, the earth's surface or of a part of it, but a course, a development, a route, a scheme, or the like; as, a temperature chart; a magnetic chart; a historical chart; stock-market charts; to chart the course of an aviator's flight; to chart the fluctuations in the price of steel. However, chart also specifically implies a graphic representation of a body of water or of a portion of it, made for the use of navigators and indicating nearby or adjacent land, the depth at various points, dangers to be avoided, and the like; as, the United States Coast Survey charts; the British Admiralty charts; an uncharted rock. Map usually implies such a representation of the earth's surface or of a part of it that shows, according to some given scale or projection, the relative position and size of cities, towns, villages, counties, states, provinces, or countries, as well as the shape and proportionate extent of bodies of water, mountain ranges, coasts, and other natural features; as, a map of Europe; a map of China; to map a newly explored country. It may, however, be used in reference to a representation of the celestial sphere; as, a map (or chart) of the northern heavens. Graph applies specifically to a chart or diagram in which two variable factors (for example, the prices of a commodity and the times at which these varying prices were asked) are so represented as to indicate their interrelationship. The usual method of preparing a graph is to locate, by means of their co-ordinates, and mark (on a paper or other surface) a series of points and often to join them with a curve or a series of straight lines; as, a graph of a patient's fever; to graph the course of business since 1929.

chaste, adj. Chaste, pure, modest, decent come into comparison when they mean free from all taint of that which is lewd or salacious. Chaste fundamentally implies an opposition to immoral in the restricted sense of that word in which it connotes lustfulness and licentiousness. The term therefore suggests a refraining from all acts, thoughts, etc., that incite desire or are not in accordance with one's virginity or one's marriage vows (as, "strew me over With maiden flowers, that all the world may know I was a chaste wife to my grave"—Shak.): in current use, it particularly stresses restraint and an avoidance of that which would defile or make unclean not only the love of man and woman but of anything that needs to be free from that which cheapens, debases, or makes vulgar; as, a chaste style; the chaste beauty of a work of art. "One of the most striking characteristics of a man who is really in love, is that his conversation is chaste. He is willing to analyze sentiment, but not sensation" (Dimnet). Pure differs from chaste mainly in its suggestion of freedom from all taint of evil thought or immoral desires: it implies innocence and absence of temptation rather than, as chaste implies, control over one's impulses and actions; as, "Come, pensive nun, devout and pure" (Milton); "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God" (Matthew v. 8); "My strength is as the strength of ten, Because my heart is pure" (Tennyson). Modest and decent are frequent in this sense as applied, especially in current use, to behavior and to dress as outward manifestations of an inward chastity or purity. Modest usually also implies an absence of brazenness, boldness, or other characteristics unbefitting one who is by nature chaste or pure; decent, a due concern for what is regarded as seemly or proper (see also DECOROUS); as, "Fair, sweet, and modest maid forgive my thoughts" (Beaumont & Fletcher); "That women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety" (1 Timothy ii. 9); decent men leading decent lives; "a paper decent people don't see" (R. Macaulay); "Sex must be treated from the first as natural, delightful and decent" (B. Russell).

Ana. Virtuous, *moral, righteous, ethical: *faithful, true, constant, loyal, leal: austere, *severe.

Ant. Lewd, wanton, immoral (of persons, actions, etc.): bizarre (of style, effect, etc.). — Con. Obscene, gross, *coarse, vulgar, ribald: *licentious, lustful, lascivious, lecherous: *fantastic, grotesque.

chasten. Discipline, correct, *punish, chastise, castigate.

Ana. Humble, humiliate, *abase: try, *afflict: test, try, *prove.

Ant. Pamper, mollycoddle. — Con. *Indulge, humor, baby, spoil.

chastise. *Punish, discipline, correct, castigate, chasten.

Ana. *Beat, thrash, pummel, baste, belabor.

chat, v. Chat, gab, chatter, patter, prate, prattle, babble, gabble, jabber, gibber agree in denoting to emit a loose and ready flow of inconsequential talk. To chat is to talk in light, easy, and pleasant fashion. "In easy mirth we chatted o'er The trifles of the day before" (W. Whitehead).

To gab is to talk trivia glibly and long, often tiresomely. "[He] came in to tea and sat there gabbing till ten o'clock" (Jane W. Carlyle). To chatter is to talk aimlessly, incessantly, and (often) with great rapidity. "It was she who chattered, chattered, on their walks, while... he dropped a gentle word now and then" (Conrad). To patter is to speak or repeat rapidly or hurriedly and mechanically and mumbly, as a Barker or puller-in in order to drum up or hold a crowd, a conjurer in order to divert attention from the manner in which he performs his tricks, or a person who has attained considerable facility in speaking a foreign language or a technical jargon. "The patter of thimblerriggers at a county fair" (D. Canfield). To prate is to talk idly and boastfully. "A prating fool shall fall" (Proverbs x. 8). The word is often specifically used in reproach implying platitudinous or fulsome boasting or a readiness to talk at length about things of which the speaker is really ignorant or has only superficial knowledge. "We may prate of democracy, but actually a poor child in England has little more hope than had the son of an Athenian slave to be emancipated into that intellectual freedom of which great writings are born" (Quiller-Couch). To prattle is to talk artlessly and freely, like a child. "We are... charmed with the pretty prattle of children" (Sidney). Babble, gabble, jabber, and gibber agree in suggesting volubility, together with inarticulateness, unintelligibility, or incoherence. Babble is especially associated with babies; gabble, with geese; jabber, with monkeys; gibber, with ghosts, apes, idiots, or lunatics. "I babbled for you, as babies for the moon" (Tennyson). "I... gabble like a goose amidst the swanlike quire" (Dryden). "The monkey-mimics rush discordant in; 'Twas chatt'ring, grinning, mouthing, jabb'ring all" (Pope). "The sheeted dead Did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets" (Shak.).

Ana. Converse, talk, *speak: *gossip.

chatter, v. *Chat, gab, patter, prate, babble, gabble, jabber, gibber.

Ana. See those at CHAT.

cheap. Beggarly, pitiable, sorry, *contemptible, despicable, scurvy.

Ana. *Mean, ignoble, sordid, abject: paltry, *petty, measly, trifling: meretricious, tawdry (see GAUDY): low, *base, vile: poor, *bad, wrong.

Ant. Noble.

cheat, n. Fraud, fake, deceit, deception, *imposture, counterfeit, sham, humbug, simulacrum.

Ana. Hoaxing or hoax, bamboozling or bamboozlement

(see corresponding verbs at DUPE): *deception, trickery, chicanery, chicanes: charlatan, quack, mountebank, faker, *impostor: swindler, defrauder, cozenor (see corresponding verbs at CHEAT).

cheat, v. Cheat, cozen, defraud, swindle, overreach agree in meaning to obtain something (usually money or valuables) from, or an advantage over, another by dishonesty and trickery. Cheat suggests deceit and, usually, tricks that escape or are intended to escape the observation of others; as, to cheat at cards (or in an examination); "she and her husband had cheated every one with whom they had dealings" (S. Anderson). "He is not cheated who knows he is being cheated" (Coke).

Cozen, a term of somewhat archaic flavor, implies more artfulness or craft and often more allurements than cheat; it usually suggests the victim's loss of something of value to him whether of real worth or not; as, soldiers cozened of their pay by clever girls. "Cousins, indeed; and by their uncle cozen'd. Of comfort, kingdom, kindred, freedom, life" (Shak.). "I fought With tooth and nail to save my niche [for his tomb in the cathedral], ye know: — Old Gandolf cozened me, despite my care" (Browning).

Defraud always implies depriving another of that which is his by right, as by taking it from him or by withholding it; the word, however, implies misleading statements or deliberate perversion of the truth more often than it implies craft, artfulness, or wiles; as, to defraud a widow of a piece of property; the stockholders held that they had been defrauded by those who reorganized the company. "Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbor, neither rob him" (Leviticus xix. 13). Swindle implies either gross cheating or defrauding, especially by imposture or by gaining the victim's confidence; it usually implies the obtaining of money, or something quickly or easily convertible into money, by false pretenses; as, the forger swindled the merchants of the city out of large sums of money. "The despised Chinese, who were cuffed and maltreated and swindled by the Californians" (Van W. Brooks).

Overreach, as here compared, always implies getting the better of a person with whom one is dealing or negotiating, or bargaining by unfair or dishonest means; often it implies cheating or defrauding or swindling. "He never made any bargain without overreaching (or, in the vulgar phrase, cheating) the person with whom he dealt" (Fielding).

Ana. *Dupe, gull, hoax, hoodwink, bamboozle, trick, befool: *deceive, delude, beguile, double-cross, mislead.

check, n. *Corrective, control, antidote.

Ana. *Oversight, supervision, surveillance.

Ant. Commend. — Con. Applaud, compliment (see COMMEND): *praise, laud, extol.

chief, n. Chief, chieftain, head, headman, leader, master come into comparison when they mean the person in whom resides authority or ruling power, but they differ in their applications and associations. Chief is the most comprehensive of these terms, being applicable as a general term to anyone from an absolute monarch to one's immediate superior (as, the chief of a court of inquisition was called the grand inquisitor; the chargé d'affaires reports daily to his chief). Usually, however, the term is applied specifically to one who is supreme in power or authority over a tribe or clan (as, an Indian chief), or to the superior officer in a civil department (as, the fire chief; the chief of police), or to one who is vested with authority and power to act by the organization over which he presides (as, the chairmen of the national committees of the leading political parties are virtually party chiefs). The phrase in chief is often added to a title, held by two or more, to indicate the one who is the first in authority; as, commander in chief; editor in chief.

Chieftain has never obtained the generality of chief, and still usually carries implications derived from its early and still leading application to the chief of a tribe, a clan, or of any primitive, savage, or barbaric group; as, the chieftain's plaid; "Prevailing upon the Crow [an Indian tribe] chieftain to return him his horses" (Irving); a robber chieftain. Head, though seemingly as comprehensive as chief, is applied most frequently to the person of a group who serves as its chief executive or on whose shoulders the responsibility finally rests; as, the head of the family; the head of a school; the British prime minister is actually the head of the government; the head of a department. Headman comes close to chieftain in that it usually applies to the person who serves as the chief of his tribe, village, or the like: the term, even more than chieftain, implies a condition of savagery or barbarism. Leader implies headship, sometimes of a nation or people but more often of a party, a society, or an organized body as for singing, playing, or the like. The term usually implies a capacity for guidance, direction, or, especially in current use, for the assumption of full control and of winning the support of those under one; as, "A leader is one who has the power to induce other people to follow him" (S. M. Crothers); the leader of an orchestra; the leader of the opposition in the British parliament. Master, on the other hand, applies to a head who has another or others under him subject to his direction or control and necessarily obedient to his will: the term stresses his authority rather than his capacity for guidance. In general use, the term is applied as a designation to an employer of servants, the head of a school or of a class, or the like. It is also applied generally to anyone who exerts great and controlling influence over others or who is regarded as one to be followed or obeyed. In this sense, it is used by many Christians in reference to Jesus. The chief specific use of master is as the title of the person in command of a merchant vessel. The common designation of such a person as captain is colloquial rather than technical.

Ana Governor, ruler (see corresponding verbs at GOVERN).

Con. *Follower, disciple, henchman, adherent, satellite: vassal, thrall, *serf, slave.

chief, adj. Chief, principal, main, leading, foremost, capital agree in meaning first in importance or in standing. Chief is applicable to the person that serves as the head of his class, group, order, or the like, or to the thing that stands out as above all the rest of its class or kind in rank, importance, dignity, or the like; the term therefore usually implies the subordination of all others; as, the chief justice of the supreme court; the president of a republic is its chief magistrate; the cathedral is the chief church of a diocese; the chief topic of conversation; the chief concern of a mother. Principal is applicable to that which is the first in order of power or importance, and so is applied chiefly to the person to whom is given direction, control, or government of others or to the thing (or person thought of as a thing) that, because of its size, its position, its intrinsic importance, or the like, precedes all others of its class or kind; as, the principal dancer in a ballet; the principal keeper in a prison; the principal gate to the grounds of an institution; the principal streets of a city; the principal witness against the accused. Main (etymologically: strong, powerful) is applicable in strict use to that thing (often the part, unit, or the like, of a large or extensive thing) that excels all the others of its class or kind in size, potency, importance, or the like; as, the main line of a railroad; the main street of a small city; the mainland; "words have been used so long as the main channel for communication"

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

(Day Lewis); "The literary critic...will yet find, like the historian, his main subject-matter in the past" (L. P. Smith). Leading, like principal, implies precedence, but it often distinctively implies, in addition, a capacity or fitness for drawing others, for guiding them, or for giving a particular quality or character to a movement; as, the leading men of the city; the leading actor in a play; "he had been the leading counsel for the seven Bishops" (Macaulay); the leading automobile in a procession. "Another leading object in education for efficiency is the cultivation of the critical discernment of beauty and excellence in things and in words and thoughts, in nature and in human nature" (C. W. Eliot). Foremost differs from leading, which it otherwise closely resembles, in its stronger implication of being first in an advance or progressive movement; it is preferable for that reason whenever there is a suggestion of the person's or thing's having forged ahead to that position. "One of us, That struck the foremost man [Julius Caesar] of all this world" (Shak.). "The poor dog, in life the firmest friend, The first to welcome, foremost to defend" (Byron). Capital is applicable to a thing that stands at the head of its class or kind because of its importance, its significance, its seriousness, or the like; as, a capital plan; his capital offense was that he had omitted to mention her at all; thus, the seven capital sins (more often called "deadly sins") are the most important sins theologically, not because they are the worst sins, but because they lead to other sins and are fatal to spiritual progress. "With a little managing...she would have gained every point as easily as she had gained the capital one of taking the founding baby under her wing" (F. Wharton).

Ana. *Dominant, paramount, sovereign, predominant, preponderant, preponderating: *primary, prime: *supreme, pre-eminent.

Ant. Subordinate. — Con. Secondary, dependent, subject (see SUBORDINATE): subservient, ancillary, subsidiary, *auxiliary.

chieftain. *Chief, head, leader, commander, captain, master.

childbirth. Childbirth, parturition, delivery, labor, travail, accouchement are often used interchangeably to denote the act of giving birth to young. Childbirth is used in both technical and nontechnical language and refers to human beings only. Parturition, a scientific term for the act of giving birth to young, often specifically designates the final step in the process beginning with conception, continuing through gestation, or pregnancy, and ending with the expulsion of the young. Delivery, though often equal to parturition, may be used by preference to stress obstetric operation; as, a normal delivery; delivery by Caesarean section. However, delivery is often applied to the process more correctly designated by labor; that is, the course of events starting with the initial pains and concluding with the expulsion of the afterbirth. Labor suggests both the pangs and the muscular efforts involved in the process. Labor and travail are often used synonymously, but travail is a nonscientific term having poetic and archaic connotations, and suggesting the discomfort and pain incident to childbirth. Accouchement is occasionally used in scientific language to denote delivery; though not common in general use, it is sometimes chosen when a polite and dignified word seems desirable; as, the accouchement of the queen.

childlike. *Childlike.

Ana. Puerile, boyish, *youthful: *simple, foolish, silly, fatuous, asinine.

Ant. Mature, grown-up. — Con. Adult, matured (see MATURE): manly, manful, virile, manlike (see MALE): womanly, womanlike (see FEMALE).

childlike. Childlike, childish agree in meaning having or showing the manner, spirit, or disposition of a child. Both are applicable to adolescents and to adults as well as to children. Childlike, however, usually suggests those qualities of childhood which are worthy of admiration or emulation, such as innocence, simplicity, or straightforwardness; childish suggests its less pleasing and less admirable characteristics, such as helplessness, peevishness, or undeveloped mentality; as, "The childlike, grave-eyed earnestness with which Dorothea said anything was irresistible" (G. Eliot); "The same thought which clothed in English seems childish, and even foolish, assumes a different air in Latin" (Cowper). "The quality of their poetry seems to fall into line with the simple, direct, childlike quality which all observers note in the Chinese themselves" (H. Ellis). "To lose sight of such distinctions is to show one's self, not childlike, but childish" (Babbitt).

Ana. Naïve, unsophisticated, ingenuous, artless (see NATURAL): docile, *obedient, tractable, biddable.

chilly. Cool, *cold, frosty, frigid, freezing, gelid, icy, glacial, arctic.

Ant. Balmy.

Ana. Utopian, *ambitious, pretentious: illusory, *apparent: delusive, delusory, *misleading, deceptive: fabulous, mythical (see FICTITIOUS): preposterous, absurd (see FOOLISH).

Ant. Feasible. — Con. *Possible, practicable: reasonable, *rational: sensible, sane, *wise, prudent.

chine. Backbone, *spine, vertebrae.

chipper. Perky, jaunty, *debonair, cocky.

Ana. Sprightly, *lively, animated, vivacious, gay: nimble, brisk, spry, *agile.

Ant. Languid (physically and mentally). — Con. *Inactive, inert, idle: *lethargic, sluggish, torpid, languorous, listless, spiritless (see LANGUID).

chivalrous. Gallant, courtly, courteous, polite, *civil.

Ana. *Gentle, genteel: *spirited, mettlesome, high-spirited: *disinterested.

Ant. Churlish. — Con. *Rude, ungracious, discourteous: boorish, loutish, clownish (see corresponding nouns at BOOR).

chivvy or chivy. Variants of CHEVY.

choice, n. Choice, option, alternative, preference, selection, election come into comparison when they mean the act or opportunity of choosing or the thing chosen. Choice usually implies the right or the privilege to choose freely from a number of persons, things, courses, etc.; as, take your choice of rooms; he had no choice in the determination of his profession; everyone admires his choice, for she is a very attractive young woman. Option stresses power to choose, especially as granted by a person (group, or the like) in whom that power is normally vested to another person (or the like), who is usually the one immediately affected by the choice; as, the state constitution gives local option to the cities and towns in the matter of granting or withholding licenses for the sale of intoxicants; the court sentenced the convicted speeder to one month's imprisonment with the option of a fine; the students have no option in the matter of vacations. In business transactions, an option is usually purchased and enables one to hold, for a certain length of time, property he is considering buying, at the end of which time he promises to pay the price agreed upon or to return it to its original owner; as, to acquire an option on a tract of land; buying and selling options on the Stock Exchange. Alternative, in precise usage, stresses restriction of choice between two mutually exclusive things, usually two propositions, theories, courses, policies, or the like. Commonly, it implies that all other propositions, courses, etc., are ruled out by force of circumstances (as, the alternatives before the country were peace with dishonor or war with honor), or by unconquerable personal aversion (as, the only alternative to liberty, in Patrick Henry's estimation, was death), or by logical necessity. "If the States had any power it was assumed that they had all power and that the necessary alternative was to deny it altogether" (Justice Holmes). Alternative, however, is often loosely used of more than two possible choices. Preference emphasizes the guidance of one's choice by one's bias or predilections or by one's judgment of values or of desirability; as, he was promised his preference; he said he had no preference and would wait until others had declared their preferences. Selection implies a wide range of choice and the need of discrimination or taste in choosing; as, he was commended for his selection of books; she did not have time for a careful selection. Election adds to selection the implication of an end or purpose which necessitates the exercise of judgment; as, the students will make their election of courses (or elections) before returning to college; the doctrine of predestination holds that men are destined to heaven or hell by divine election.

choice, adj. Choice, exquisite, elegant, recherché, rare, dainty, delicate come into comparison when they mean having qualities that appeal to a person of fine or highly refined taste. Choice stresses pre-eminence in quality or kind rather than careful selection of the best, although the latter may or may not be connoted; consequently, the word usually suggests an appeal to a highly cultivated and discriminating taste; as, "The choice and master spirits of this age" (Shak.); "a rich collection of the choice things of all times" (Paler); "When education in America began, it was intended for the fit and was designed to produce a choice type" (Grandgent). Exquisite (etymologically, sought out), as here compared, implies consummate perfection in workmanship, in choice, in quality, or in impression produced—a perfection so fine and unobtrusive that it attracts only the most sensitive and fastidious; as, "He [Horace] paints with exquisite art the charm of the deep country and the lure of the simple life" (Buchan); "Poetry of the most evanescent type, so tenuous in thought and feeling that only the most exquisite diction can justify its perpetuation in cold print" (Grandgent); "Angels, supporting, saluting, and incensing the Virgin and Child with singular grace and exquisite feeling" (H. Adams). Elegant also etymologically implies selection, but in most discriminating use it differs widely from exquisite; strictly, it implies either an impressive richness or grandeur restrained by fine taste, or grace and dignity characterized by a noble simplicity. "Whoever wishes to attain an English style... elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the volumes of Addison" (Johnson). "To live content with small means; to seek elegance rather than luxury, and refinement rather than fashion" (W. E. Channing). "Don Manuel Chavez, the handsomest man of the company, very elegant in velvet and broadcloth" (Cather). Recherché, a French word now naturalized in English, like the preceding terms implies care in selection; it often suggests a studied exquisiteness or elegance; as, "might put the recherché taste of a finished Parisian milliner to the blush of inferiority" (Lady S. Morgan); "giving long and recherché dinners" (Sainisbury). Very frequently, however, it implies a search for the novel or fresh as well as the choice; hence, it often carries a connotation of artificiality or of straining for effect. "The word 'devastating'... was [at first] thought to be recherché; the discerning reader is likely to call it affected" (J. W. Beach). Rare, as here considered, derives from its ordinary senses (see INFREQUENT, THIN) connotations of uncommonness and of a fineness associated with the rarefied air of the upper regions; nevertheless, its major implication is distinction in merit or excellence or a superlative quality; as, "an exquisite perception of things beautiful and rare" (A. C. Benson); "he [W. H. Hudson] is, of living writers that I read, the rarest spirit" (Galsworthy). Dainty (see also NICE, 1) once meant much the same as choice, but was somewhat more restricted in its application, being used chiefly to describe things which give delight to the fastidious taste, especially to the eye, and often also the palate; as, "As at English feasts... The daintiest last, to make the end most sweet" (Shak.); "Her house is elegant and her table dainty" (Johnson). At times, however, the term has also implied smallness and exquisiteness; this is, in current use, an almost invariable implication of the term; as, "those dainty limbs, which Nature lent For gentle usage and soft delicacy" (Milton); "a dainty bower" (Herbert); "Steps dainty as those of a French dancing-master" (Meredith). Delicate, like dainty, implies exquisiteness and an appeal to a fastidious taste; however, it ascribes fineness, subtlety, and often fragility, to the thing rather than smallness, and it implies an appeal not only to the eye or palate, but to any of the other senses or to the mind or spirit; as, "the more delicate perfume of the pink-flowering thorn" (Wilde); "high up in the most delicate air—Grecian air, pellucid" (Jefferies). "I have, alas! only the words we all use to paint commoner, coarser things, and no means to represent all the exquisite details, all the delicate lights, and shades" (Hudson). "An irony so quiet, so delicate, that many readers never notice it is there... or mistake it for naïveté" (J. B. Priestley).

Ana. Pre-eminent, surpassing, peerless, incomparable, *supreme, superlative: picked, handpicked, selected, culled, chosen (see CHOOSE).

Ant. Indifferent (see MEDIUM). — Con. Mediocre, second-rate, middling, fair, average, *medium: *common, ordinary.

choleric. Spleenic, testy, techy, *irascible, touchy, cranky, cross.

Ana. *Irritable, fractious, huffy, querulous, petulant, peevish: *angry, acrimonious, wrathful, indignant, mad, irate: fiery, peppery, spunky (see SPIRITED): captious, carping, faultfinding (see CRITICAL).

Ant. Placid: imperturbable. — Con. *Calm, tranquil, serene: *cool, composed, nonchalant.

choose. Choose, select, elect, opt, pick, cull, hand-pick, prefer, single all come into comparison when they mean to fix upon one (or more) of a number of things as the one (or ones) to be taken, accepted, adopted, or the like, or to make such a determination. Choose commonly implies a decision of the judgment and the actual taking or adoption of that which is fixed upon; as, "that he may know to refuse the evil, and choose the good" (Isaiah vii. 15); "between them... we can see little to choose" (H. Adams). "The disinterested search for truth is certainly one of the highest and noblest careers that a man can choose" (Inge). Select usually implies a wide range of choice, and discrimination or discernment of values in making one's choice or choices; as, "one particular nation to select from all the rest" (Milton); "Pythagoras... established religious brotherhoods of carefully selected candidates" (H. Ellis). "His [Hemingway's] temperament was selecting the instances he should narrate, his mind selecting the words to employ" (F. M. Ford). Elect often implies a deliberate choice, especially between alternatives, or a careful selection of some out of many possibilities (usually persons); ordinarily, it carries a stronger implication of the rejection of that or those not chosen than either of the preceding words; as, to elect a president; "I *elect*ed to remain" (Hudson); according to the doctrine of predestination, God elects those who are to be saved. "Will it not look a little odd...when you have so many devoted children, that you should elect to live alone?" (V. Sackville-West). Opt implies an election between alternatives, often specifically, in the case of inhabitants of territory transferred by treaty, between retaining one's former citizenship or acquiring citizenship in the new state; as, to opt to remain a British subject; to opt for French rather than German citizenship. Pick implies a careful selection, often on personal grounds; cull, a nice or fastidious choice; as, "Geraint, dismounting, pick'd the lance that pleased him best" (Tennyson); to pick an all-star team from the players in the city; to pick a winner. "[Gray] had exquisite felicity of choice; his dictionary had no vulgar word in it, no harsh one, but all culled from the luckiest moods of poets" (J. R. Lowell). Hand-pick, in its extended sense, implies careful selection for a definite end or purpose; as, a hand-picked staff of assistants; it sometimes implies improper motives or corrupt ends; as, to hand-pick a jury. Prefer implies choice that indicates what one favors or desires; it does not, however, always carry an implication of taking or adopting what one chooses or of getting one's choice; as, to prefer the blue dress to the brown one; "certain colours were preferred...for reasons of association and tradition" (Binyon); "Don't explain...It's enough if you tell him that I preferred to marry Gard" (M. Austin). Single out implies choice or election of an individual person or thing from a number. "[Julius Caesar] had singled him [Octavius] out as his successor" (Buchan).

Ana. *Adopt, espouse, embrace: *desire, wish, crave.
Ant. Reject: eschew. — Con. *Forgo, forbear, abnegate: refuse, *decline, spurn, repudiate.

churl, n. *Boor, lout, clown, clodhopper, bumpkin.

Ana. Villein, vassal (see SERV).

Ant. *Gentleman, aristocrat.

churlish. Boorish, loutish, clownish. See under BOOR.

Ana. Ungracious, ill-mannered, discourteous, *rude, uncivil, impolite: curt, blunt, brusque, gruff, crusty (see BLUFF): surly, dour (see SULLEN).

Ant. Courty. — Con. *Civil, polite, courteous, gallant: urbane, *suave, diplomatic, bland, politic, smooth.

cinders. *Ashes, clinkers, embers, ash.

cipher, n. Cipher, zero, naught, nought, ought, ought are the common designations of the character 0 in Arabic notation. Cipher more often refers to the symbol than to the quantity or magnitude (or absence of such) which it represents; zero, in the United States, is probably the commoner designation of the symbol than cipher, but it is the preferred term in general use for the absence of quantity or magnitude denoted by the symbol; it therefore often means "nothing," or "absolutely nothing"; as, if you place three ciphers (or zeros) after 1000, your number becomes 1,000,000; 25 multiplied by zero (not cipher or the cipher) brings zero as its result. Zero is also used of an arbitrary point of division, as in a scale of temperatures, where all below is regarded as minus. Naught and nought, etymologically related words, are close synonyms of cipher, but they are rarely, if ever, now used in technical language. Aught and ought as synonyms of naught and nought arose from an error in printing or writing; thus, a naught became an ought, and the use of the decapitated forms became common. Such use, however, is now regarded as erroneous. "It was said...that all Cambridge scholars call the cipher ought and all Oxford scholars call it nought" (Edgeworth).

circle, n. *Set, coterie, clique.

Ana. Friends, acquaintances, intimates (see singular nouns at FRIEND): associates, companions, comrades, pals (see singular nouns at ASSOCIATE).

circle, v. Revolve, rotate, *turn, gyrate, wheel, spin, whirl, twirl, eddy, swirl, pirouette.

circuit. Compass, ambit, *circumference, perimeter, periphery.

Ana. Route, course, *way: tour, *journey.

circuitous. Roundabout, *indirect.

Ana. *Winding, serpentine, sinuous, tortuous, flexuous, anfractuous: *crooked, devious.

Ant. Straight.

circular, adj. *Round, annular, discoid, orbicular, spherical, globular.

Ant. Linear.

circumference. Circumference, perimeter, periphery, circuit, compass, ambit come into comparison because all in their literal senses denote a continuous line enclosing an area or space. They differ, however, in the extent to which they retain this literal meaning and in the number and character of their acquired implications and connotations. In modern use, only the first two words keep very close to their literal senses, for both are technical terms in geometry. Precisely, circumference designates either the line that describes a circle or an ellipse, or the length of such a line; in extended use, however, it is applied to the line bounding any area thought of as circular or elliptical or to the surface of anything thought of as spherical. "Nature set from centre to circumference" (Milton). "And guard the wide circumference around" (Pope). Perimeter is more comprehensive than circumference for it includes not only the line that bounds any circular figure or area, but also the broken line that encloses any polygon (including triangle, square, etc.); moreover it may designate the whole outer boundary of a body, especially a more or less spherical body; as, the perimeter of a hexagon; the perimeter of the globe. Periphery is sometimes interchangeable with perimeter but it is less frequently used in a technical than in an extended sense. More often than any other word in this group is it referred to the actual edge, or border, or boundaries of something concrete; as, the sections of an orange extend from the center to the periphery (that is, the rind); we had just time enough to explore the periphery (the encircling shore) of the island; the periphery (the wall) of a blood vessel. Occasionally it suggests limits which cannot be exceeded; as, stimuli beyond the periphery of consciousness. Circuit is now rarely used in its literal sense but has become so tied up with the idea of a journey round the periphery of something that the two ideas are fused; as, the hour hand of a clock covers its circuit every twelve hours; "He [Augustus] also completed the great circuit of coast highways; in... Gaul... the roads radiated outward from a centre, while in Spain the importance lay in the periphery" (Buchan). On the other hand, compass and its near equivalent ambit (a more bookish word) usually refer to the area or space within the enclosing line, or the ground that figuratively might be covered by the leg of a compass describing such a line. "Within thy crown, Whose compass is no bigger than thy head" (Shak.). "And, with a touch, shift the stupendous clouds Through the whole compass of the sky" (Wordsworth). "Within the ambit of the ancient kingdom of Burgundy" (F. Palgrave). "Homer, who comes neither within my map nor within the ambit of the Tripos" (Quiller-Couch).

Ana. *Outline, contour: *boundary, border.

circumlocution. Periphrasis, pleonasm, *verbiage, redundancy, tautology.

Ana. Prolixity, diffuseness, wordiness, verbosity (see corresponding adjectives at WORDY).

Con. Compactness (see corresponding adjective at CLOSE): conciseness or concision, terseness, succinctness, pithiness (see corresponding adjectives at CONCISE).

circumscribe. Confine, *limit, restrict.

Ana. *Restrain, inhibit, curb, check: *hamper, trammel, fetter.

Ant. Expand, dilate. — Con. Distend, amplify, inflate, swell (see EXPAND): enlarge (see INCREASE, v.).

circumspect, adj. *Cautious, wary, calculating, chary.

Ana. *Careful, punctilious, punctual, meticulous, scrupulous: vigilant, *watchful, alert.

Ant. Audacious. — Con. Venturous, venturesome, rash, reckless, daring, daredevil, foolhardy, *adventurous: bold (see BRAVE): heedless, *careless.

circumspection. Caution, wariness, calculation, chariness. See under CAUTIOUS.

Ana. Carefulness or care, punctiliousness, punctuality, meticulousity, scrupulousness (see corresponding adjectives at CAREFUL): discretion, forethought, foresight, providence, *prudence.

Ant. Audacity. — Con. Venturousness, venturesomeness, rashness, recklessness, daring, daredeviltry, foolhardiness (see corresponding adjectives at ADVENTUROUS): boldness (see corresponding adjective at BRAVE): heedlessness, carelessness (see corresponding adjectives at CARELESS).

circumstance. *Occurrence, event, incident, episode.

Ana. *Item, detail, particular: factor, constituent, component, *element.

circumstantial. Circumstantial, minute, particular, particularized, detailed, itemized come into comparison when they mean dealing with a matter point by point. Circumstantial applies especially to accounts of events or to narratives, but it is applicable also to the persons who recount or narrate, to their memories, and the like. The term implies full and precise reference to the incidents or circumstances attending an event; as, a circumstantial account of the battle has not yet been written; Audubon's story of the rattlesnake chasing the squirrel is too circumstantial to have been invented; "My memory is exact and circumstantial" (Dickens). Minute, in addition, applies to investigations, researches, inspections, descriptions, and the like; it stresses interest in every detail, no matter how trivial or insignificant outwardly. It therefore usually connotes exhaustiveness or meticulous exactness; as, "a division in the tapestry so artfully constructed as to defy the minutest inspection" (Austen); "a reporter as faithful as he was minute" (H. Martineau); "he prolonged the flower-picking process by minute and critical choice" (Deland); "Plato... in the Laws... provides for the state a perfect jungle of minute regulations" (Buchan). Particular, which is rare in this sense in current English, differs little from circumstantial except in being applicable also to descriptions, lists, and the like; it may therefore imply attention to every feature or item rather than to every incident or circumstance; as, a particular description of every musical instrument in the collection. "It is as particular as the four-sheet maps from which it is taken" (Jefferson). "I think my self obliged to be very particular in this relation, lest my veracity should be suspected" (Swift). Particularized now usually replaces particular as applied to narratives, descriptions, lists, and the like; it is, however, not used of those who so narrate, describe, or list, but it may be applied to the circumstances, features, and items that they present; as, Scott's particularized descriptions of his characters; the particularized facts and phenomena considered in an astronomical treatise. Detailed applies to any circumstantial or minute account, description, study, representation (as in a painting), or the like; it implies, however, abundance of, rather than exhaustiveness in, detail; as, "Perera in the sixteenth century... presents a detailed picture of Chinese life" (H. Ellis); "the detailed study of history should be supplemented by brilliant outlines" (B. Russell). Itemized implies complete enumeration of details, especially of those that indicate the separate purchases, separate credits, and the like, in a mercantile account, or of those that indicate the articles or groups of articles in the possession of a person or business, as in an inventory; as, an itemized bill; an itemized list of his expenditures. The term is also applicable to descriptions, narratives, and the like which, in addition to being particularized, have something of the formality of an inventory; as, an itemized description of a room.

Ana. Precise, nice, exact, accurate (see CORRECT): *full, complete, replete.

Ant. Abridged: summary. — Con. Succinct, terse, laconic, *concise, pithy, compendious: shortened, abbreviated, curtailed (see SHORTEN).

circumvent. Outwit, baffle, balk, *frustrate, thwart, foil.

Ana. Forestall, anticipate, *prevent: evade, *escape, elude, avoid: trick, befoul, hoodwink, *dupe.

Ant. Conform to (laws, orders, etc.): co-operate with (persons, etc.). — Con. Promote, further, *advance, forward: abet (see INCITE).

circus. *Arena, ring, lists, cockpit, court, field, gridiron, diamond, rink.

citadel. Stronghold, fortress, *fort, acropolis, fastness.

citation. *Encomium, eulogy, tribute, panegyric.

Ana. Commendation, recommendation, complimenting or compliment (see corresponding verbs at COMMEND): award, guerdon, reward (see PREMIUM).

cite, v. 1 *Summon, call, convoke, convene, muster.

Ana. Bid, *invite: *arrest, detain, apprehend: *praise, extol, eulogize, laud, acclaim: award, accord (see GRANT).
2 *Quote, repeat.

3 *Adduce, advance, allege.

Ana. Enumerate, tell, *count, number: recount, recite, narrate, rehearse (see RELATE).

citizen. 1 *Inhabitant, resident, denizen.

Con. *Stranger, outsider.

2 Citizen, subject, national are compared here only as denoting a person who is regarded as a member of a sovereign state, entitled to its protection, and subject to its laws. Citizen, which is far more common in the United States than in the British Commonwealth of Nations, implies alien as its opposite. It is applicable to any native or naturalized person, regardless of sex or age, who owes allegiance to a government and is entitled to its protection of his life, liberty, and property, at home or abroad. Ordinarily, as in the United States, citizenship does not imply possession of all political rights, such as the right to vote. Citizen often implies allegiance to a government in which the sovereign power (theoretically or absolutely) is retained by the people; it is usually the preferred term in designating those persons in a republic whose status is not that of aliens; as, American citizens living in Mexico. "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside" (U. S. Const.). Subject is applicable to any person, no matter where he resides, who by right of birth or naturalization owes allegiance to a personal sovereign, such as a monarch or ruler. Subject is the preferred term in the British Commonwealth of Nations, largely for historical reasons, in spite of the limitations on the power of the sovereign, and in spite of the representative form of government in Great Britain and in its dominions; as, British subjects living in the United States; the millions of subjects of King George. The term is also applicable to any person residing in territory governed by another state that has gained power over it by force of arms or by conquest, whether the sovereign power in that state is vested in a person or in the people; as, some Poles are German subjects, some are Russian subjects. National belongs with this group of terms in spite of its shifting significance and more or less conflicting implications. It is applicable chiefly to any of a body of persons of the same nation or people living in a country other than the one in which they have, or, sometimes, have had, the status of citizen or subject. In diplomatic use, the term is often applied to one's fellow-countrymen; as, the consul in each of the large cities is responsible for protecting the rights of his own nationals. Still other denotations, not so common, have come into recent use. Chief among these is the definition of a national as anyone who has been born in the territory of a given government, even though he now resides in another country, either as an alien or, by naturalization, as a citizen or subject of that country; as, some European governments claim authority over their nationals in North and South America. There is also a tendency to prefer national to subject or citizen in some countries where the sovereign power is not clearly vested in a monarch or ruler or in the people, or where theories of racism prevail. In some use, especially in international law, national is applied to anyone entitled to the protection of a government, regardless of whether his status is that of citizen or not; in this sense, the Filipinos are nationals of the United States. In France, a person who enjoys full civil and political privileges is called a citizen (citoyen); one who owes allegiance to the French government is called a national (national).

Ant. Alien. — Con. Foreigner (see STRANGER).

civil, adj. Civil, polite, courteous, courtly, gallant, chivalrous are here compared as applied to persons, their words and acts when in intercourse with others, and as meaning observant of the forms required by good breeding. Civil, in present usage, commonly suggests the bare fulfillment of the ordinary requirements of social intercourse; it frequently implies little more than forbearance from rudeness. "I was never more surprised than by his behaviour to us. It was more than civil; it was really attentive" (Austen). "This man... cut short one of our party, and addressed a silly remark to Spencer.... Spencer's answer was civil, but brief and not inviting" (J. Fiske). Polite, while sometimes suggesting a merely perfunctory attitude, is more positive than civil; it commonly implies thoughtfulness for the feelings of others, united with polish of manners and address. "Nothing was ever so serene as his countenance, so unembarrassed as his manner, so polite as his whole demeanour" (Landor). "The Bishop seldom questioned Jacinto about his thoughts or beliefs. He didn't think it polite" (Cather). Courteous implies more considerate and dignified, courtly, more highbred, stately, and ceremonious, observance of due civilities; as, "The indulgence that a half-learned speech [i.e., of a foreigner speaking French] Wins from the courteous" (Wordsworth); "Be courteous to all, but intimate with few" (G. Washington); "his great-uncle, a courtly and stately old gentleman" (Symonds); "He did not seem to know much about them, but made his effect of a courtly host with what he did know" (Arch. Marshall). Gallant and chivalrous, as here compared, imply courteous attentiveness to women. But gallant suggests spirited and dashing or ornate and florid expressions of courtesy; chivalrous, high-minded, disinterested, sometimes self-sacrificing, attentions. "The General attended her himself to the street door, saying everything gallant... admiring the elasticity of her walk, which corresponded exactly with the spirit of her dancing" (Austen). "The qualities... of surface chivalry and gallant attentiveness in her brilliant American friend had for a moment seemed to reveal a lack in me" (H. Ellis). "Nothing can beat a true woman for a clear vision of reality; I would say a cynical vision if I were not afraid of wounding your chivalrous feelings" (Conrad). "With what chivalrous accents would he address... those witty and wise women of old worlds" (L. P. Smith).

Ana. Complaisant, obliging, *amiable: *gracious, affable, cordial: politic, diplomatic, bland, urbane, *suave.

Ant. Uncivil, rude. — Con. Churlish, boorish, loutish (see under BOOR): ill-mannered, impolite, discourteous, ungracious (see RUDE).

civilization. Civilization, culture are here compared only as meaning the particular state or stage of advancement in which a race, a people, a nation, a specific class, or an integrated group of these finds itself at a given period. Civilization always implies a definite advance from a state of barbarism; often it suggests the absence of all signs of barbarism, or a divorce from all the ways of living, all the beliefs, all the conditions that distinguish a primitive from a civilized society. "The civilization of France has been for centuries, and is still, the central and dominating civilisation of Europe" (L. P. Smith). "This mesa had once been like a bee-hive; it was full of little cliff-hung villages, it had been the home of a powerful tribe [of Indians], a particular civilization" (Cather). Culture (see also CULTURE), on the other hand, suggests rather the complex of attainments, beliefs, customs, traditions, and the like, which form the background of a particular people or group, which distinguishes them from all other peoples or groups, and which gives their particular civilization, no matter how little or how far advanced, its peculiar quality or character. "Greece for our purposes means not a race, but a culture, a language and literature, and still more an attitude towards life, which for us begins with Homer, and persists, with many changes but no breaks, till the closing of the Athenian lecture-rooms by Justinian" (Inge). "It would no doubt have been more satisfactory to select a people like the Fijians rather than the Lifuans, for they represented a more robust and accomplished form of a rather similar culture, but their culture has receded into the past" (H. Ellis).

Ana. Cultivation, *culture, breeding, refinement.

Ant. Barbarism. — Con. Barbarity (see BARBARISM): barbarousness, savagery (see corresponding adjectives at BARBAROUS).

claim, v. *Demand, exact, require.

Ana. *Maintain, assert, defend, vindicate, justify: allege, *adduce, advance.

Ant. Disclaim: renounce. — Con. Disavow, disown, disacknowledge (see affirmative verbs at ACKNOWLEDGE): reject, repudiate, refuse (see DECLINE, v.): concede, allow, *grant: waive, cede, *relinquish: *forgo, abnegate.

claim, n. Claim, title, pretension, pretense (or pretence) come into comparison when they denote an actual or alleged right to demand something as one's possession, quality, power, prerogative, or the like. Claim carries the strongest implication of a demand for recognition of any of these terms: only the context can indicate whether that demand is regarded as justifiable or not or whether the right is actually asserted by the person or persons involved; as, though the house was legally the daughter's, the father, as the one who had paid for it and had taken care of all taxes and insurance, had a moral claim to live there the rest of his life; intelligent persons cannot accept the claims made for many patent medicines; he advanced no claim to be counted as a man of science; "The Tractarians were driven to formulate a theory of the Church... which should justify the exclusive claim of Anglicanism to be the Church of Christ in these islands" (Inge); "it is to be hoped that its [the book's] claim to possess a real and special interest of its own has been established by the extracts already given" (Day Lewis). Claim also occurs in a more concrete sense as denoting the property, possession, or the like for which one sets up a claim; as, to stake out a claim. Title (see also NAME), on the other hand, distinctively imputes validity or justice to the claim, or its substantiation in law or in reason; as, his distinguished success as the governor of a great state gives him a title to our support of his candidacy for president; "Many of the people who masquerade under the name of 'men of science' have no sort of title to that name" (H. Ellis). "[Augustus] had the consulship, the chief magistracy, and most of the powers of a tribune.... these three offices gave him a title to remodel the state" (Buchan). Pretension (see also PRETENSE, AMBITION) is sometimes used in place of claim (as, "gifts and excellences to which Wordsworth can make no pretension"—Arnold) and less often, in place of title (as, "The courtier, the trader, and the scholar, should all have an equal pretension to the denomination of a gentleman"—Steele). Very often, however, pretension connotes a lack of warrant or a weakness in the claim and may or may not attribute to it a measure of hypocrisy or deceit; as, "This court disclaims all pretensions to such a power" (Ch. Just. Marshall); "His pretension, deftly circulated by press-agents, was that he was a man of brilliant and polished mind" (Mencken). Pretense is now rarely employed in the sense of claim (for more common sense see PRETENSE), but it was of frequent occurrence in the past. Usually, the term applies to an asserted claim (as, "Marlborough calmly and politely showed that the pretence was unreasonable"—Macaulay), but it may apply to a claim that is tacitly made because one is assumed by another to be something that one is not or to have a right that one does not actually possess; as, she knew that she was in the house under false pretenses, for her host and hostess had warmly welcomed her as a daughter of old friends of the same name.

clairvoyance. Insight, divination, *discernment, penetration, perception, discrimination, acumen.

Ana. Intuition, understanding (see REASON, n.): intelligence, *mind, intellect.

Ant. Denseness or density (of mind). — Con. Stupidity, dullness, crassness (see corresponding adjectives at STUPID).

clamorous. *Vociferous, blatant, strident, boisterous, obstreperous.

Ana. Importuning or importunate, begging, imploring, adjuring (see corresponding verbs at BEG): *vocal, articulate, voluble, eloquent: protesting, expostulating, remonstrating (see OBJECT, v.).

Ant. Taciturn. — Con. *Silent, reserved, uncommunicative, close-lipped: *still, noiseless, quiet.

clan. *Tribe, sib, horde, sept.

clandestine. *Secret, covert, surreptitious, privy, furtive, underhand, underhanded, stealthy, backstairs.

Ana. Concealed, hidden (see HIDE): *sly, artful, foxy: illicit, illegitimate (see affirmative adjectives at LAWFUL).

Ant. Open. — Con. Aboveboard, *straightforward, forthright: obvious, manifest, *evident, clear, patent.

clash, n. Collision, *impact, impingement, shock, concussion, percussion, jar, jolt, brunt.

Ana. Conflict, strife, *discord: noise, *sound: incompatibility, incongruousness, discordance (see corresponding adjectives at INCONSONANT).

Con. Concord, accord, consonance, *harmony.

classify. Alphabetize, pigeonhole, *assort, sort.

Ana. *Order, arrange, systematize, methodize, marshal.

clause. *Paragraph, verse, article, plank, count.

clean, adj. Clean, cleanly are often confused. Clean is applied to a person or thing that is actually free from dirt; cleanly to a person (or animal) whose habit or tendency is to be clean; thus, one who is cleanly, though not always able to keep clean, will never remain dirty by choice. "An ant is a very cleanly insect" (Addison).

Ana. Cleaned, cleansed (see CLEAN, v.): pure, decent, *chaste.

Ant. Dirty. — Con. Filthy, foul, nasty, squalid (see DIRTY).

clean, v. Clean, cleanse agree in meaning to remove soil, dirt, or the like, from someone or something. Clean is the word in common and literal use for the removal of soil, dirt, litter, or the like, as by washing, sweeping, and dusting or clearing away; as, to clean a dress, or a room, or the yard. Cleanse may be used in place of clean when the reference is to garments and the like that are washed in water or gasoline, or from which spots or stains have been removed by gasoline, ether, or other solvent; as, a freshly cleansed dress; dyeing and cleansing. It is used preferably to clean when foul matter is removed as by purging; as, to cleanse the bowels. But cleanse has acquired the more elevated and figurative senses associated with purification of any sort. "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin" (Psalms li. 2). "With some sweet oblivious antidote Cleanse the stuff'd bosom" (Shak.). "The air was purer for the cleansing rain" (G. Macdonald).

Ant. Soil.

cleanly, adj. *Clean.

Ana. Spick-and-span, *neat, tidy, trim, snug: *orderly: dainty, fastidious, fussy, *nice.

Ant. Uncleanly. — Con. Slovenly, unkempt, sloppy, *slipshod.

cleanse, *Clean.

Ana. *Sterilize, disinfect, sanitize.

Ant. Defile, besmirch.

clear, adj. 1 Clear, transparent, translucent, lucid, pellucid, diaphanous, limpid come into comparison when they mean having the property of being literally or figuratively seen through. That is clear, as here compared, which is free from all impediments to the vision such as clouds, mist, or haze (as, clear air, a clear day), or from muddiness, cloudiness, or turbidity (as, clear water, clear glass, clear crystals), or figuratively, from obscurity, vagueness, or indistinctness of any sort (as, clear thinking, a clear mind, a clear style [for this sense see CLEAR, 2]; "a clear vision of reality"—Conrad; clear tones). That is transparent which is so very clear that objects (or figuratively, what lies beyond) can be easily seen through it. "The water... is as transparent as the air, so that the stones and sand at the bottom seem, as it were, trembling in the light of noonday" (Shelley). "An ingenuous, transparent life was disclosed [by the changes on her face]; as if the flow of her existence could be seen passing within her" (Hardy). "Nor... is it [Bergson's style] always so clear as to be transparent" (H. Ellis). "Rushing away from the discussion on the transparent pretence of quieting the dog" (Conrad). That is translucent which admits the passage of light through it but which, especially in current usage, does not permit a clear sight of what lies beyond; as, frosted glass is translucent; "under the glassy, cool, translucent wave" (Millon); "the blue off Nantucket is not the miracle of luminous, translucent color off Sardinia" (Lowe); "translucent phrases, which mirror... the woodland lights and shadows" (L. P. Smith). That is lucid, as here compared (for application to expression see CLEAR, 2), which is both transparent and luminous; this use is now chiefly literary. "Gods, who haunt The lucid interspace of world and world Where never creeps a cloud, or moves a wind" (Tennyson). "The thought [of Dante] may be obscure, but the word is lucid, or rather translucent" (T. S. Eliot). That is pellucid which is clear as crystal; as, "more pellucid streams, An ampler ether, a diviner air" (Wordsworth); "you may lie on the grassy rampart, high up in the most delicate air—Grecian air, pellucid" (Jefferies); "[Goldsmith's] pellucid simplicity" (F. Harrison). That is diaphanous which is so delicate and gossamerlike in texture that it is almost transparent or is actually translucent; as, a diaphanous veil; a diaphanous cloud; "I like diaphanous illusions, with the shapes of things as they are showing not too faintly through them" (L. P. Smith). "In her flowery loveliness, she looked diaphanous, ethereal" (Hewlett). That is limpid which has the soft clearness of or as of pure water; as, "a... rill of limpid water" (Wordsworth); "The whole atmosphere has a luminous serenity, a limpid clearness" (Mrs. H. Ward); "that... simple, limpid style which is the supreme style of all" (Arnold); "Archer's New York... in business matters... exacted a limpid and impeccable honesty" (E. Wharton).

Ana. *Bright, luminous: *liquid: *pure, sheer.

Ant. Turbid (of air, days, water, etc.): confused (of minds, thoughts, etc.). — Con. Dim, obscure, murky, dusk, dusky, gloomy (see DARK): muddy, roiled, roily (see TURBID): muddled, bemuddled, addled, fuddled, befuddled (see CONFUSE).

2 Clear, perspicuous, lucid are here compared as used in reference to qualities of thought or style and as meaning quickly and easily understood. Clear implies freedom from obscurity, ambiguity, or the danger of being misunderstood; as, "Many are called; there is a clear truth: Few are chosen; there is an obscure truth" (Arnold); "Few, clear, definite, and calm as stars were the words [T. H. Huxley] spoke" (B. Waugh). Perspicuous lays more stress than clear upon the medium of expression regarded for itself; it frequently connotes a certain simplicity and elegance of style; as, "Extreme conciseness of expression, yet pure, perspicuous, and musical, is one of the grand beauties of lyric poetry" (Gray); "We may still borrow descriptive power from Tacitus, dignified perspicuity from Livy" (Sydney Smith). Lucid especially implies clearness of order or arrangement; as, "He [Macaulay] thought little of recasting a chapter in order to obtain a more lucid arrangement" (G. O. Trevelyan). "His [T. H. Huxley's] descriptions of the most complicated organic structures are astonishingly lucid" (A. Huxley).

Ana. Express, *explicit, definite: *graphic, vivid: clear-cut, *incisive, trenchant.

Ant. Unintelligible: abstruse. — Con. Vague, *obscure, ambiguous, equivocal, cryptic, enigmatic: turbid, tumid (see INFLATED): *recondite, occult, esoteric.

3 Manifest, *evident, obvious, distinct, apparent, patent, palpable, plain.

Con. *Doubtful, dubious, questionable, problematic.

clear-cut. Trenchant, *incisive, cutting, biting, crisp.

Ana. Distinct, plain, clear, manifest, *evident: definite, *explicit, express: precise, exact, nice (see CORRECT).

Con. Confused, muddled, bemuddled (see CONFUSE): hazy, misty, fogged (see corresponding nouns at HAZE).

clear out, clear off. Withdraw, retire, scam, quit, depart, *go, leave.

Ana. *Escape, flee, fly, decamp, abscond: desert, *abandon, forsake.

cleave.¹ Cling, *stick, adhere, cohere.

Ana. *Fasten, attach, fix, affix: unite, *join, associate, link, combine.

Ant. Part. — Con. *Separate, divorce, divide, sever, sunder: *detach, disengage: *estrangle, alienate.

cleave.² Split, rive, rend, *tear, rip.

Ana. *Separate, divide, sever, sunder, part, divorce: *cut, hew, chop, slit.

Con. *Join, unite, link: attach, *fasten.

clemency. 1 Lenity, *mercy, charity, grace.

Ana. Compassion, *pity, commiseration, sympathy, ruth: gentleness, mildness (see corresponding adjectives at SOFT): fairness, equitableness, justness (see corresponding adjectives at FAIR).

Ant. Harshness. — Con. Severity, sternness, austerity (see corresponding adjectives at SEVERE): rigorously, strictness, rigidity (see corresponding adjectives at RIGID): inflexibility, obduracy, inexorableness (see corresponding adjectives at INFLEXIBLE).

2 Mercifulness, leniency, indulgence, forbearance, tolerance. See under FORBEARING.

Ana., Ant., & Con. See CLEMENCY, 1.

clement. Merciful, lenient, indulgent, *forbearing, tolerant.

Ana. Compassionate, *tender, sympathetic: benign, benignant, kindly, *kind: humane, benevolent, *charitable.

Ant. Harsh: barbarous (treatment of enemies, offenders, etc.). — Con. *Severe, stern, austere: *rigid, rigorous, strict, stringent: implacable, merciless, relentless, unrelenting, *grim.

clergyman. *Cleric, ecclesiastic, priest, abbé.

cleric. Cleric, clergyman, priest, ecclesiastic, abbé, all of which designate a churchman in orders, are often used loosely and without an understanding of their distinguishing implications. Cleric is the most comprehensive, though not the most common, of these terms. It may be applied to any man who has passed through the rite of tonsure, or shaving of the head, which symbolizes his acceptance as a candidate for orders in the Roman Catholic and Eastern churches. However, it is often used as the equivalent of clergyman, which, properly distinguished from cleric, implies the taking of the highest of holy orders, that of priesthood. Clergyman, therefore, is equivalent to priest, or an ordained minister of churches recognizing holy orders, such as the Anglican, Roman Catholic, and Orthodox churches. In England, clergyman is often restricted in its application to a priest of the Church of England; in the United States, it is commonly used to designate any ordained minister. Ecclesiastic also equals priest in denotation, but in actual use it so often connotes administrative rather than distinctively priestly functions that it tends to be applied narrowly to those priests in whom governmental powers are vested, such as rectors, bishops, and archbishops. Abbé comes closer to cleric than any of the others; though it commonly implies ordination to the priesthood (of the Roman Catholic Church) it does not necessarily do so, and has often been applied to clerics who never have been admitted to holy orders but who wear the soutane, or cassock.

clever. 1 *Intelligent, quick-witted, brilliant, bright, smart, alert, knowing.

Ana. *Quick, apt, ready, prompt: *versatile, all-round, many-sided: capable, competent, *able: *sharp, keen, acute.

Ant. Dull (mentally). — Con. *Stupid, dense, crass: *simple, foolish, fatuous, asinine.

2 Clever, adroit, cunning, ingenious come into comparison when they mean having or showing a high degree of practical intelligence, or of skill in contrivance. Clever, as here considered, often carries its etymological implication of physical dexterity, but it usually stresses its much later won implication of mental quickness or resourcefulness. "I became so clever with the gloves that Ned matched me against a light-weight" (Shaw). "But Jane's mother had been too clever for him... she had come to the dinner-table primed to do just that thing" (M. Austin). Often, it implies native aptitude or a knack. "A... pond in the middle of the garden, into which Tranquillino, clever with water, like all Mexicans, had piped a stream" (Cather). Adroit usually suggests greater shrewdness and astuteness than clever, and often implies the skillful (sometimes, the crafty) use of expedients to attain one's ends in the face of difficulties. "The adroit William Penn... found means to stand well at the court of the persecuting James the Second" (C. E. Montague). "The whole tendency of French instruction has been... to conceal the obstacles [to learning the language] so adroitly that the learner shall never be aware of them" (Grandgent). Cunning, in the more complimentary of its literary senses, still retains its etymological implications of learning and expert knowledge. Originally applied to philosophers and the like, it is now chiefly applied to craftsmen or artists whose work exhibits a high degree of constructive or creative skill. "He knew how... to construct a plot, he was cunning in his manipulation of stage effects" (T. S. Eliot). "Every speech in it [any great tragedy] has to be cunningly calculated" (C. E. Montague). Ingenious retains only a trace of its earliest implication, a high degree of intellectuality. In current use it stresses inventive power or skill in discovery; sometimes it implies brilliancy of mind, sometimes little more than cleverness. "Powerful and ingenious minds... may, by a course of... refined and metaphysical reasoning... explain away the constitution of our country" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "A gigantic tent... ingeniously constructed without poles or ropes" (Hardy).

Ana. *Dexterous, deft, feat, handy: nimble, *agile: *proficient, skillful, skilled, adept, expert.

Con. Inept, maladroit, *awkward, clumsy, gauche: *slow, laggard, dilatory.

cliché. Platitude, truism, *commonplace, bromide.

clientele, clientage. *Following, public, audience.

climate. Climate, clime are no longer synonyms in the best current usage. Climate applies to the normal or characteristic weather conditions over a very long period in a particular locality or region; it implies consideration of both the extremes and the mean of temperatures and wind velocities, the amount and the frequency of precipitation, and the like; as, the mild climate of the French Mediterranean coast. "Is not their climate foggy, raw and dull?" (Shak.). Clime is a poetic or elevated term for a region, especially for one having a definitely marked climate or for one characterized by a markedly prevailing type of weather; as, "cold northern climes" (Pope); "In climes beyond the solar road" (Gray).

climax, n. Culmination, peak, apex, acme, zenith, apogee, *summit, pinnacle, meridian.

climb, v. *Ascend, mount, scale.

Ant. Descend.

clime. *Climate.

Ana. Region, zone (see AREA).

cling. Clave, *stick, adhere, cohere.

Ana. Depend, *rely, trust, count, bank, reckon: attach, affix, *fasten: *hang, dangle, suspend.

Con. Desert, forsake, *abandon: *relinquish, leave, resign, yield.

clinkers. Cinders, *ashes, ash, embers.

clique. *Set, circle, coterie.

Ana. Party, faction, bloc, ring, junto, combine, *combination.

cloak, v. Mask, *disguise, dissemble.

Ana. Conceal, *hide, screen.

Ant. Uncloak. — Con. *Reveal, disclose, discover, betray.

clodhopper. Bumpkin, *boor, lout, clown, churl.

clog, v. Fetter, hog-tie, shackle, manacle, *hamper, trammel.

Ana. Impede, obstruct, *hinder, block: balk, baffle, *frustrate: check, curb, snaffle (see RESTRAIN).

Ant. Expedite, facilitate. — Con. *Free, liberate, release: forward, further, *advance, promote.

cloister, n. 1 Cloister, monastery, nunnery, convent, abbey, priory. Cloister and convent are general terms, denoting a place of retirement from the world for members of a religious community; they properly apply to houses for recluses of either sex. Cloister stresses the idea of seclusion from the world; convent, of community of living. A monastery is, strictly speaking, a cloister for monks; in actual use it is often applied to any convent for men (occasionally for women) who combine the cloistered life with that of a teacher, preacher, or the like. Nunnery, the older word for a cloister for nuns, is now being displaced by convent, in a restricted sense. A monastery or nunnery governed by an abbot or an abbess is called an abbey; by a prior or prioress, a priory. A priory is subordinate in rank to, but often independent of, an abbey.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

2 Arcade, *passage, passageway, ambulatory, gallery, corridor, aisle, hall, hallway.

close, adj. 1 Also adv. Close, near, nigh, near by (or near-by) come into comparison both as adjectives and as adverbs when they mean not far, as in place, time, or relationship, from the point, relation, etc., that is indicated or understood. Close (as here compared: see also CLOSE, adj., 2) commonly implies so slight a difference that the two things (sometimes persons) under consideration may be said literally or figuratively to be almost in contact if the difference is in distance, or almost coincident if the difference is in time, or of the immediate family if the difference is in relationship, or very like the original if the difference is in a copy; as, the houses on this street are close together; close relatives; close friends; to hold one close to one's breast; "the more accurately we use words the closer definition we shall give to our thoughts" (Quiller-Couch); a close shave; to give close attention to a problem; a close translation of a passage. Near may be used in place of close (as, near houses; events that come near to each other; near relatives) but it carries a much less explicit suggestion of contiguity or adjacency and may be used of persons or things that, though not far off as in place, time, relationship, or the like, are not almost in contact, almost coincident, of the immediate family, or the like; as, come near where I can see you; a near concern of all of us; "the nearer the church, the farther from God" (Old Proverb). Near also is often applied to things copied, imitated, translated, or the like, that bear some resemblances to the original: the term may or may not be used in depreciation; as, near beer; a near translation; near silk; near-leather upholstery. Nigh is now dialectal or archaic or poetic in the sense of near. As an adverb it, even more often than near, is followed by to, unto, about, on, upon; as, "he was sick nigh unto death" (Philippians ii. 27); "This change had brought them nigher to each other" (Cooper); he lives nigh abouts; "Now the day is over, night is drawing nigh" (Baring-Gould). As an adjective, it differs little from near except in sometimes being given preference in the comparative and superlative degrees to nearer and nearest; as, "[He] seized the nearest ship" (W. Morris); "The nigher and the safer road to Liege" (Scott). Near by is now chiefly an Americanism for near in distance or close at hand; as, near-by towns; the near-by houses; there is no hotel near by. In the sense of near in amount or number, it is a Scotticism; as, they made 400 miles or near by in one day's drive.

Figuratively, in their adjectival forms, all of these words except near by imply a degree of parsimony. Close usually suggests niggardliness or stinginess, sometimes miserliness (as, "He was close in small matters of money" — Trollope); near often carries a stronger suggestion of cautiousness or care in the expenditure of money (as, her early experience with poverty made her near all her life; "his neighbours called him 'near'" (G. Eliot). Nigh is now rarely used in this sense except in dialectal language. Ana. Adjoining, *adjacent, contiguous, abutting: *related, kindred.

Anf. Remote or remotely. — Con. *Distant, removed, far, faraway, far-off.

2 Close, dense, compact, thick come into comparison when they mean having its parts, particles, atoms, or the like, massed tightly together. Close may apply to the texture or weave of something; as, a paper of fine, close texture; a cloth of close weave. More often, however, the term applies to something that is made up of a number of single things pressed or seemingly pressed together; thus, he writes a close hand (that is, each letter in his handwriting is very near to its neighbor); the troops fought in close formation. Figuratively, especially as applied to literary expression, it implies a compression of what is to be said into the fewest and most telling words possible. "The greatest beauty of speech [is] to be close and intelligible" (Steele). "It is a relief to turn back to the austere, close language of Everyman" (T. S. Eliot). Dense applies to an aggregate, or to a mass in which the arrangement of parts or particles is exceedingly close, or to matter of any kind in which the constituent particles are very closely set together; as, dense clouds; a dense forest; a densely populated district; a dense star; a dense flower spike; dense air. In its figurative use, the term commonly implies impenetrability; as, a dense mind; dense stupidity; "dense silence" (S. Anderson). Compact suggests close and firm union or consolidation of parts, especially within a small compass; it often also implies neat or effective arrangement; as, "With much less compass of muscle than his foe, that which he had was more seasoned, firm and compact" (Lytton). "Small, compact, homogeneous communities such as the Greek city state or Elizabethan England" (Day Lewis). Thick (as here compared: see THICK) usually applies to that which is condensed or is made up of abundant and concentrated parts; as, "Make the gruel thick and slab" (Shak.); a thick swarm of bees; a thick grove; a thick head of hair. Ana. Compressed, condensed, constricted (see CONTRACT, v.): concentrated, compacted (see COMPACT, v.).

Anf. Open. — Con. Scattered, dispersed (see SCATTER): expanded (see EXPAND).

3 Close-lipped, close-mouthed, tight-lipped, secretive, reserved, taciturn, reticent, uncommunicative, *silent. Anf. Open (see FRANK). — Con. *Frank, candid, plain: garrulous, loquacious, *talkative, voluble.

4 Intimate, confidential, chummy, thick, *familiar.

Anf. Aloof.

5 Closefisted, tight, tightfisted, niggardly, parsimonious, penurious, *stingy, cheeseparing, penny-pinching.

Ana. *Sparing, economical, frugal, thrifty.

Anf. Liberal. — Con. Generous, bountiful (see LIBERAL): lavish, prodigal (see PROFUSE).

close, v. 1 Close, shut are very close synonyms in the sense of to stop or fill in an opening by means of a door, a gate, a lid, or cover of any kind and are often used as though they are indistinguishable in meaning. Actually, they are distinguishable not only in nuances of meaning, but also in idiomatic use for in certain phrases established usage shows a preference for one rather than the other. Close is the more general of these two terms, usually implying both the act of stopping an opening and the result produced by such an act but stressing exclusion of those who would enter or pass through. Shut stresses the act or process and the means employed in this process: it not only carries a more emphatic implication or a more vivid suggestion of drawing a door, gate, lid, window, or the like, into a position which closes the opening, but it often also evokes an image of drawing a bar or a bolt, of locking, or other means of fastening securely; hence, in very precise use, to close a door or gate is merely to draw it into a position which bars entrance or egress until it is again opened; to shut a door or gate is to push or pull it into the position where it is closed. But one closes (not shuts) an opening or a gap or one closes (not shuts) a park or a church to the public, because in neither case is the use of a door, gate, or other means of exclusion clearly or definitely implied. On the other hand, in idiomatic use shut, especially when followed by up, out, against, and the like, carries a stronger and often a more direct and emphatic suggestion than close of the interposition of a barrier or obstacle (often an immaterial one) that effectually prevents ingress or egress; as, he found every road to the accomplishment of his desires shut against him; he shut his eyes to everything he did not wish to see (cf. to close one's eyes in death); he was warned to shut his mouth.

Ana. *Exclude, debar: block, bar, dam (see HINDER).

Ant. Open.

2 Close, end, conclude, finish, complete, terminate come into comparison as transitive verbs meaning to bring something to a stopping point or to its limit, or, with the exception of complete, as intransitive verbs meaning to come to that point. Close usually has latent in it the idea of action upon that which may be regarded as in some sense open (see CLOSE, v., 1); as, to close an account (or a debate, or a subscription list); "As many lines close in the dial's center" (Shak.); "Recall those nights that close'd thy toilsome days" (Pope); "Over! the sweet summer closes" (Tennyson). End conveys a stronger sense of finality; it frequently has implicit reference to a progress or development which is thought of as having been carried through; as, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved" (Jeremiah viii. 20); "All's Well that Ends Well" (Shak.); to end one's life; to end one's labors upon a book. Conclude is a more formal term, and applies particularly to transactions, proceedings, or writings that have a formal or special close; as, to conclude one's speech with a peroration; to conclude a meeting with a benediction. "I shall conclude this essay upon laughter with observing that the metaphor of laughing... runs through all languages" (Spectator). Finish implies that what one set out to do is done; often, therefore, it connotes the completion of the final act in a process of elaboration, such as polishing or perfecting (the "last" or "finishing touch"); as, "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do" (John xvii. 4); "It wants but seventeen lines of having an end, I don't say of being finished" (Gray). Complete implies the removal of all deficiencies or a finishing of all that has been attempted; as, "When Blondel paused about the middle, the king began the remainder, and completed it" (T. Walton); to complete their education in Europe. "Art partly completes what Nature is herself sometimes unable to bring to perfection" (H. Ellis). "He [Augustus] may well have thought that his days would be few on earth, and that it would be foolish to put his hand to a task which he could not complete" (Buchan). Terminate implies the setting of a limit in time or space; as, "Ben Lomond terminates the view" (D. Wordsworth); "My philosophic walks were soon terminated by a shady bench" (Gibbon); "He had never seen the instrument that was to terminate his life" (Dickens); hostilities terminate at sundown.

Ana. *Stop, cease, quit, desist.

Con. *Begin, commence, start, inaugurate, initiate.

closefisted. *Stingy, close, tight, tightfisted, niggardly, parsimonious, penurious, miserly, curmudgeonly, cheese-paring, penny-pinching.

clothe. Clothe, attire, tire, dress, apparel, array, robe, vest, invest. Clothe, the least specific of these terms, means to cover or, sometimes, to provide that which will cover (one's body or that which is bare) with or as with garments; as, to clothe oneself; to clothe the child warmly; to clothe one's thoughts in words. The other words convey the same meaning but each one adds to it distinctive implications and connotations. Attire and its archaic form tire suggest more careful process than clothe, with the result that the words savor of formality and therefore are avoided except when the context requires that note. "He said it was for the honour of the Service that he attired himself so elaborately; but those who knew him best said that it was just personal vanity" (Kipling). Tire is found chiefly in historical novels and in reference to ladies of high degree. Dress is far less formal than attire and much richer in its connotations than clothe. It often suggests care in the choice and arrangement of clothes and sometimes, especially in dress up, preening and prinking; as, to dress the children for school or for a party; every afternoon she dresses up and goes out; dressed up in one's Sunday clothes; to dress up as Cleopatra. Dress, especially in its intransitive or reflexive forms, often implies a change of clothes to those that are appropriate for a special occasion; thus, to dress for dinner implies a change into dinner or evening clothes; I shall not have time to dress (that is, to change into suitable clothes for the particular occasion). The idea of decking or adorning is frequently associated with the word, especially in its extended senses; as, to dress the hair with flowers; to dress the table for dinner. "Yet shall thy grave with rising flow'rs be dressed" (Pope). Apparel and array are now chiefly literary words, used when there is the intent to connote splendor, elegance, or gorgeousness in that with which a person or thing is clothed. "And she had a garment of divers colours upon her: for with such robes were the king's daughters... apparelled" (2 Samuel xiii. 18). "A time when meadow, grove, and stream... To me did seem Apparelled in celestial light" (Wordsworth). "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: And yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these" (Matthew vi. 28, 29). "I rode with him to court, And there the Queen array'd me like the sun" (Tennyson). Robe, vest, invest imply a formal clothing with the garments belonging to one's office, profession, rank, or the like. Robe suggests the enveloping apparel worn by a king, queen, or noble on state occasions, by a judge or a professor when the conventions of his office demand it, by a bishop or other high ecclesiastic when formally but not liturgically attired. Vest, once used in place of robe, is now rare except in a specific sense, to clothe in liturgical vestments, such as the alb, chasuble, and the like. "The altar and the vested priest" (Millon). Invest, especially in historical and in liturgical use, implies clothing (a king, a bishop, etc.) with the robes and other insignia of his dignity for the first time as a part of the ceremony of a consecration, installation, or the like; as, to invest a king with his crown; to invest an archbishop with the pallium and other archiepiscopal insignia. Since in such use the insignia of one's office are merely the outward signs of one's power or authority, invest also implies the formal clothing with such power (see INITIATE, 2). In their extended senses, robe usually connotes envelopment (as, "Robed in the long night of her deep hair"—Tennyson), vest suggests the addition of something that enhances (as, "It was my fortune scarcely to have seen. . . The face of one, who. . . Was vested with attention or respect Through claims of wealth or blood"—Wordsworth), invest, which now occurs far more commonly in its figurative than in its literal sense, implies endowment with a new character, dignity, beauty, or the like (as, "The Indian mode of investing all things with a personal aspect and a mystical apprehension of unseen powers"—M. Austin; "In this art. . . we do not find animals invested with a false reflection of human sentiment"—Binyon).

Ant. Unclothe. — Con. *Strip, divest, dismantle.

clothes. Clothes, clothing, dress, attire, tire, apparel, raiment, vesture, array come into comparison when they denote a person's garments considered collectively. Clothes and clothing are general words which do not necessarily suggest a wearer or personal owner, but sometimes a manufacturer or a merchant; as, evening clothes; summer clothing for men; her clothes are always immaculate; each child has ample clothing. Dress, as here compared, is used with reference only to a wearer's outer clothes; it is not only far less inclusive than clothes and clothing, but less concrete in its suggestions, except when qualified; as, both men and women are expected to wear full dress; the actors will be costumed in the dress of the period of each play. "A man of sense carefully avoids any particular character in his dress" (Chesterfield). Attire and its archaic equivalent tire usually stress the appearance or the total impression produced by one's clothes; attire, therefore, is rarely used colloquially with reference to one's own clothes, except in affection or humorously; when applied to another person's, it is, as a rule, qualified; as, "let thy attire be comely but not costly" (Lyly); "her artless manners, and her neat attire" (Cowper); "Our speech, our colour, and our strange attire" (Pope); "the dandy's attire" (Meredith). Apparel (often specifically wearing apparel) carries a weaker suggestion of the effect produced and a stronger implication of a collection or assemblage of clothes than attire, which otherwise it closely resembles in meaning; therefore, one says an article of apparel (rather than attire) and the richness of her attire (rather than apparel); a blue serge suit, a grey shirt, a blue and red necktie, a gray homburg, and black shoes and gloves comprised his apparel. "The apparel oft proclaims the man" (Shak.). Raiment is a more or less literary term that is nearly as comprehensive as clothes for it includes everything that is worn for decency, comfort, and adornment, and therefore suggests reference to undergarments as well as to outer garments; as, to bring a change of raiment with one. When the quality or the texture of the clothing is to be indicated, raiment is the appropriate word; as, fine raiment; the coarse raiment of a penitent pilgrim. "But what went ye out for to see? A man clothed in soft raiment? behold, they that wear soft clothing are in kings' houses" (Matthew xi. 8). Vesture also is a formal and poetic word, similar in its denotation to apparel, but different in its connotations, for it usually connotes flowing robes, ceremonial attire, or the like, and suggests little reference to everyday existence or current fashion. Oftentimes even its collective implication is not clear, and the word becomes very shadowy and vague in its reference to a concrete thing. "And he saw the Blessed Vision Of our Lord, with light Elysian Like a vesture wrapped around him" (Longfellow). "The rustling of your vesture through my dreams" (E. B. Browning). Array is rarely found outside of poetry or rhetorical prose as a close synonym of attire. To the latter term it adds suggestions of splendor or of gorgeousness in appearance; as, "Set not thy sweet heart on proud array" (Shak.). "The wasting moth ne'er spoil'd my best array; The cause was this, I wore it every day" (Pope).

clothing. *Clothes, dress, attire, tire, apparel, raiment, vesture, array.

clout, v. Hit, *strike, smite, slug, punch, box, cuff, slap, swat.

clownish. Loutish, boorish, churlish. See under BOOR.

cl. *Awkward, clumsy, gauche: *rude, rough, raw, green.

Ant. Urbane. — Con. *Suave, bland, smooth, politic.

cloy, v. *Satie, sate, surfeit, pall, glut, gorge, surcharge.

Ant. Whet. — Con. Stimulate, pique, excite, *provoke.

club. Society, *association, order.

clumsy. *Awkward, gauche, maladroit, inept.

Ana. *Rude, rough, green, callow: loutish, clownish, boorish (see under BOOR): *stiff, wooden, tense, rigid.

Ant. Dexterous, adroit: facile. — Con. Deft, feat (see DEXTEROUS): graceful, dignified, elegant (see corresponding nouns at ELEGANCE): *elastic, resilient, flexible, supple, springy: *easy, effortless, smooth.

clutch, v. Grasp, grab, *take, seize, snatch.

Ana. Capture, *catch, nab, cop: hold, *have, possess, own.

clutter, n. *Confusion, disorder, disarray, jumble, chaos, muddle, pie, snarl.

coadjutor. *Assistant, helper, adjutant, aide, aide-de-camp.

coalesce. Merge, fuse, blend, mingle, commingle, *mix, amalgamate.

Ana. *Compact, consolidate, concentrate, unify: *contract, condense, compress: cohere, adhere, *stick, cleave, cling: mass (see HEAP).

Con. Disintegrate, crumble, decompose (see DECAY): *separate, part, divide: dissolve, deliquesce (see LIQUEFY): dissipate, disperse (see SCATTER).

coalition. Fusion, confederacy, confederation, federation, *alliance, league.

coarse. Coarse, vulgar, gross, obscene, ribald come into comparison when applied to persons, their language, or behavior, and mean offensive to a person of good taste or moral principles. Coarse is opposed to fine, not only literally with reference to fiber, texture, structure, but also figuratively, as here considered, with reference to quality of mind, spirit, manners, words, and the like; it implies roughness, rudeness, crudeness, or the like; as, "Whose laughs are hearty, tho' his jests are coarse" (Pope); "What is fine within thee growing coarse to sympathize with clay" (Tennyson). "Some of the royal family were as coarse as the king was delicate in manners" (H. Adams). Vulgar, as here compared (see COMMON, 3), is, except perhaps with respect to language, a stronger term; it suggests that which is offensive to good taste or decency, frequently with the added implication of boorishness or ill breeding; as, "Caliban is coarse enough, but surely he is not vulgar" (Haslit); "Burns is often coarse, but never vulgar" (Byron); "How finely is the true Shakespearean scene contrasted with Dryden's vulgar alteration of it. . . displaying nothing but indelicacy without passion" (Coleridge); "The Have-nots demand a place in the sun, or in more vulgar language, a share in the loot" (A. Huxley). Gross (see RANK, 3) is opposed to fine in the sense of delicate, subtle, ethereal; it implies either a material, as contrasted to a spiritual, quality, or a bestiality unworthy of man; as, "the grosser forms of pleasure" (E. Wharton); gross habits of eating. "Caliban... is all earth, all condensed and gross in feelings and images" (Coleridge); "Thou art mated with a clown, And the grossness of his nature will have weight to drag thee down" (Tennyson); "My anger and disgust at his gross earthy egoism had vanished" (Hudson). Obscene stresses more strongly the idea of loathsome indecency or nastiness; as, an obscene allusion; "The jest unclean of link-boys vile, and watermen obscene" (Pope); "The rabble of Comus... reeling in obscene dances" (Macaulay). Ribald suggests vulgarity, often impropriety or indecency, such as provokes the laughter of people who are not too fastidious; as, "a ribald folk-song about fleas in straw" (Lowes); "their backs... shaking with the loose laughter which punctuates a ribald description" (M. Austin).

Ana. Rough, crude, *rude, raw, green, callow: *rank, rampant: boorish, loutish, clownish (see under BOOR).
Ant. Fine: refined. — Con. Delicate, dainty, exquisite, *choice: cultivated, cultured (see corresponding nouns at CULTURE): *gentle, genteel.

coast, n. *Shore, ripa, strand, beach, bank, foreshore, littoral.

coast, v. Toboggan, *slide, glide, slip, skid, glissade, slither.

coax. Coax, cajole, wheedle, blandish agree in meaning to use ingratiating art in persuading or attempting to persuade. Coax implies gentle, persistent efforts to induce another or to draw what is desired out of another; in earlier use, it implied coddling, fondling, caressing, flattery, and the like (as, "in a coaxing voice, suited to a nurse soothing a baby"—Burney), but in current English it more often suggests artful pleading or teasing in an attempt to gain one's ends. "Little by little, he coaxed some of the men whom the measure concerned most intimately to give in their views" (Kipling). "One... who can linger over and taste a phrase, coaxing its flavor to the palate as if it were an old wine" (W. V. Moody). "His [Donne's] skill in coaxing... the attention of the variable human mind to Divine objects" (T. S. Eliot). Cajole, in earlier use, stressed deceit, as by flattering, making specious promises, and the like. "They... should be treated as they themselves treat fools, this is, be cajoled with praises" (Pope). In current use, it often implies enticing or alluring and suggests beguilement rather than duplicity. "I wish Good Fairies were a little more active. They seem to be cajoled into security by the happiness of their favourites" (Meredith). "I think a vein of sentiment... induced me to take the journey, and to cajole a reluctant friend into accompanying me" (A. Repplier). Wheedle suggests more strongly than cajole the use of soft words, artful flattery, or seductive appeal; as, "she could wheedle the soul out of a saint" (Hewlett); "he had wheedled the Abeyta woman out of her geraniums, and left her pleased with herself for surrendering them" (M. Austin). Blandish implies less artfulness than wheedle, and more open flattery and a more apparent desire to win over by charming or alluring. "Would the blandishing enchanter still weave his spells around me" (Dickens).

Ana. *Induce, persuade, prevail on or upon: tease, pester (see WORRY): inveigle, entice, tempt, *lure.

Ana. *Power, might, puissance, strength: intimidation, bulldozing, bullying, browbeating (see corresponding verbs at INTIMIDATE): threatening or threat, menacing or menace (see corresponding verbs at THREATEN).

coeval. Synchronous, concurrent, simultaneous, coincident, concomitant, *contemporary, contemporaneous.

cogent. Convincing, telling, *valid, sound.

Ana. Forceful, forcible, potent, *powerful, puissant: compelling, constraining (see FORCE, v.): inducing, persuading or persuasive (see corresponding verbs at INDUCE): proving, demonstrating (see PROVE): *effective, effectual.

cogitate. *Think, reflect, deliberate, reason, speculate.

Ana. *Ponder, ruminate, meditate, muse: *consider, revolve, excogitate, weigh, contemplate, study: *think, conceive, imagine, envisage, envision.

cognate. *Related, allied, kindred, affiliated.

Ana. Akin, alike, identical, *similar: common, generic, general, *universal.

Ant. Various. — Con. Diverse, *different, divergent, disparate.

cognition. Consanguinity, *kinship, affinity, agnation, enation.

cognizant or cognisant. *Aware, conscious, sensible, alive, awake.

Ana. *Conversant, versed: informed, acquainted, apprised (see INFORM).

Ant. Ignorant. — Con. *Insensible, insensitive, impassible, anesthetic: ignoring, overlooking, slighting, neglecting (see NEGLECT): oblivious, unmindful, *forgetful.

cohere. *Stick, adhere, cleave, cling.

Ana. Coalesce, fuse, merge, blend (see MIX): *cement, glue, agglutinate: *fasten, attach, affix: *join, combine, unite, connect, associate.

Con. *Detach, disengage: disentangle, untangle, disembarass (see EXTRICATE).

coherence. Coherence (or coherency), cohesion agree in meaning the quality or character of a whole all of whose parts cohere, or stick together. Coherence (or the less frequent coherency) usually implies a unity of immaterial or intangible things, such as the points of an argument, the details of a picture, the incidents, characters, and setting of a story, or of material or objective things that are bound into unity by a spiritual, intellectual, or aesthetic relationship as through their clear sequence or their harmony with each other; it therefore commonly connotes an integrity which makes the whole and the relationship of its parts clear and manifest. "To treat the subject with the clearness and coherence of which it is susceptible" (Wordsworth). "Is there or is there not a spiritual coherence in Christianity, or is it only a gathering of laws and precepts, with no inherent connected spiritual philosophy?" (Galsworthy). "Scientific work... may indeed possess the appearance of beauty, because of the inner coherence which it shares with fine art" (S. Alexander). "No more coherence than the scattered jangle of bells in the town below" (Quiller-Couch). Cohesion more often implies a unity of material things held together by a physical substance such as cement, mortar, glue, or the like, or by a physical force such as attraction or affinity. "A house stands and holds together by the natural properties, the weight and cohesion of the materials which compose it" (T. H. Huxley). "What am I, Life? A thing of watery salt. Held in cohesion by unresting cells. Which work they know not why, which never halt" (Masefield). Cohesion may also be used of either material or immaterial things when the emphasis is on the process by which things cohere rather than on the resulting unity; as, a state composed of discordant races incapable of cohesion.

Ana. *Unity, integrity, solidarity, union: clearness, perspicuousness, lucidity (see corresponding adjectives at CLEAR).

Ant. Incoherence.

cohesion. *Coherence.

Ana. Unification, consolidation, concentration, compacting (see corresponding verbs at COMPACT): coalescence, fusing or fusion, blending or blend, merging (see corresponding verbs at MIX): cementing, gluing, agglutination (see corresponding verbs at CEMENT).

Con. Disintegration, decomposition, crumbling (see corresponding verbs at DECAY): dissolution, deliquescence (see corresponding verbs at LIQUEFY).

coin, n. Coinage, currency, specie, tender, cash, *money.

coinage. Coin, currency, cash, species, legal tender, *money.

coincide. Concur, *agree.

Ana. Accord, correspond, jibe, harmonize, tally (see AGREE): *match, equal.

Ant. Differ (from). — Con. Diverge (see SWERVE).

coincident. Synchronous, simultaneous, concurrent, concomitant, coeval, contemporaneous, *contemporary.

cold. Cold, cool, chilly, frosty, frigid, freezing, gelid, icy, glacial, arctic agree in meaning having a temperature below that which is normal or comfortable. Cold is the general term, often implying nothing more than the absence of heat; as, a cold day; a cold hand; cold meat. Occasionally, however, it also connotes discomfort; as, a cold room; a cold wind. Cool suggests moderate coldness, sometimes refreshing (as, a cool breeze; a cool hand on one's brow; a cool drink), but sometimes disagreeable, especially when hotness or warmth is desirable (as, cool soup; a cool radiator). Chilly implies coldness that makes one shiver; as, a chilly morning; a chilly room. Frosty implies coldness that makes one tingle or that causes vegetation to droop and die; as, a frosty night; frosty clearness. Frigid and freezing both imply temperatures below 32° Fahrenheit, but frigid stresses the intensity of the cold (as, a frigid climate; frigid weather) and freezing its congealing effect on man, vegetation, water, and the like (as, a freezing wind; a freezing temperature). Gelid in strict use equals freezing, but it is chiefly a literary word applicable to anything that is frozen or is indicative of freezing temperatures; as, a gelid mass; a gelid moon;

"while sea-born gales their gelid wings expand" (Goldsmith). Icy, when used to indicate a kind of coldness, implies fridity so great as to be painful and cutting; it is applicable chiefly to winds, storms, and the like; as, an icy rain; an icy northeast wind. Glacial is now rare in literal use in the sense of icy; it is mainly employed in reference to a geological period (a glacial epoch), especially one known as the Pleistocene epoch, during which much of the northern parts of North America, Europe, and Asia were covered with ice (as, glacial soil; glacial boulders). Arctic is the strongest of these words in its suggestion of intense coldness. It connotes the fridity of the polar regions and is a hyperbolic rather than an exact term; as, a winter notable for its arctic temperatures.

When applied to persons, their temperaments, their acts and words, and their responses to stimuli, these words are also marked by differences in implications. Cold suggests absence of feeling or emotion, or less than normal human sympathy, friendliness, sensitiveness, or the like; as, his plea left us cold; cold words; he treated us with cold justice; "cold philanthropies" (Wilde). "Their cold intelligence, their stereotyped, unremitting industry repel me" (L. P. Smith). "Okio [a Japanese painter], in spite of his unerring eye and his incomparable cunning of hand, was of too cold a temperament to infuse a powerful current of life into the old tradition" (Binyon). Cool stresses control over one's feelings or emotions, and therefore absence of excitement or agitation. It may specifically connote composure, detachment, deliberativeness, or indifference. "This wonder, that when near her he should be cool and composed, and when away from her wrapped in a tempest of desires" (Meredith). "Both [Horace and Augustus] looked at life with a cool realism which was not allowed to become cynical" (Buchan). Chilly, frosty, and freezing usually stress the effect of another's coldness: chilly connotes a depressing or repressive influence; as, a chilly greeting, a chilly reception; frosty connotes a checking or restraining of advances; as, a frosty smile or manner; freezing connotes a blighting or repelling; as, a freezing reply to a letter, "many...had been repelled by his freezing looks" (Macaulay). Frigid emphasizes such deficiency of natural feeling as is abnormal or repellent; it is specifically applicable to persons who are sexually passionless and averse to sexual intercourse, but it is often applied to things which are not, but by their nature should be, impassioned or infused with feeling or warmth; as, frigid verse; a frigid religion; frigid hospitality. Gelid usually stresses the power to benumb (as, a gelid fear); icy, the power to cut and stab (as, an icy stare). Glacial suggests the total lack of vitality or animation; as, "such glacial metres" (Longfellow); "his manner more glacial and sepulchral than ever" (Molloy). Arctic frequently adds to frigid a connotation of remoteness from all that is human or referable to humanity; as, "exact and arctic justice" (Mencken).

Ant. Hot.

collate. *Compare, contrast.

collateral, adj. *Subordinate, secondary, dependent, succursal, subject, tributary.

Ana. *Related, allied, kindred, cognate: correlative, complementary, correspondent, *reciprocal.

collation. *Comparison, parallel, contrast, antithesis.

Ana. Corroboration, verification, confirmation, authentication (see corresponding verbs at CONFIRM): emending or emendation, revising or revision, correcting or correction (see corresponding verbs at CORRECT).

colleague. *Partner, copartner, ally, confederate.

Ana. *Associate, companion, comrade.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

collect. *Gather, assemble, congregate.

Ana. Mass, *heap, pile: *accumulate, amass, hoard: consolidate, concentrate, *compact.

Ant. Disperse: distribute. — Con. *Scatter, dissipate, dispel: dispense, divide, deal, dole (see DISTRIBUTE): *separate, part, sever, sunder: *assort, sort.

collected. Composed, *cool, unruffled, imperturbable, nonchalant.

Ana. *Calm, placid, tranquil, serene: quiet, *still: assured, *confident, sure, sanguine: *complacent, smug, self-satisfied.

Ant. Distracted, distraught. — Con. Agitated, perturbed, upset, disturbed, flustered, flurried (see DISCOMPOSE).

collection. Assemblage, assembly, gathering, congregation. See under GATHER, v.

Ana. Heap, pile, mass, stack (see under HEAP, v.): accumulation, hoarding or hoard (see corresponding verbs at ACCUMULATE).

collectivist. Collectivist, socialist, communist, Bolshevik, nihilist, anarchist come into comparison as names applied to persons who oppose the system of capitalist control of industry. The collectivist advocates common ownership of the means of production, distribution, and exchange. The term socialist has been variously used. As often used it is indistinguishable from collectivist. Broadly, the socialist advocates a less unequal distribution of income, to be attained through governmental ownership, or some measure of governmental control, of the means of production. The state socialist, for instance, would utilize existing forms of government to equalize income and opportunity, as by graduated taxation, compulsory insurance, and by state administration of industries, public utilities, common carriers, etc. The Marxian socialist believes that capitalism and profit should be abolished, and that this can be accomplished only through the attainment of political power by the proletariat. Communist, in the usual sense of the word, denotes an extreme Marxian socialist, who would abolish by force private property as well as profit. Bolshevist, originally a term for a member of the communist wing of the Social Democratic party in Russia, is often loosely used as an equivalent of communist. The nihilist [from L. nihil, nothing] believes that conditions in the social organization are so bad as to make destruction desirable for its own sake, independent of any constructive program or possibility. "It is because 'nothing' as it exists at present finds favour in their eyes that they have been called 'Nihilists'" (Nineteenth Century). The anarchist demands emancipation from all law, moral as well as economic and political, outside the individual. At best, anarchism stands for a society made orderly by good manners rather than by law, in which each person produces according to his powers and receives according to his needs. At worst, it stands for a terroristic resistance to all present government and social order.

college. Institute, lycée, gymnasium, *academy, seminary.

collision. *Impact, impingement, clash, shock, concussion, percussion, jar, jolt, brunt.

Ana. Striking, hitting (see STRIKE, v.): wrecking or wreck, ruining or ruin, dilapidation (see corresponding verbs at WRECK): demolition, destruction (see corresponding verbs at DESTROY).

collocation. *Phrase, locution, expression, idiom.

collude. Conspire, *connive.

Ana. Plot, scheme (see under PLAN, n.): concur, coincide, *agree: co-operate, concur, *unite, combine.

collusion. Conspiracy, connivance. See under CONVINCE.

Ana. *Agreement, accord, understanding: intrigue, conspiracy, *plot, machination.

colonnade. Colonnade, arcade, arcature, portico, peristyle are here discriminated as those terms are used in architecture. A colonnade is a row of columns (typically on the outside of a building) spaced at regular intervals and carrying an architrave or horizontal member lying directly across their capitals, so that the opening between each pair of columns is square-topped. Colonnade is usually applied not only to the columns, but to the entire structure, consisting of columns, roof, pavement, etc., or to the space which they enclose. Strictly, the word is used only in reference to classical architecture. An arcade is a long series of arches with their supporting columns and piers, together with the other members that complete the structure as an architectural feature. An arcade may be either inside or outside of a building; it may be a purely decorative feature or a means of admitting light and air. In the former case, the spaces between the arches and piers may be filled in (sometimes providing niches for statues); this type of arcade is called strictly an arcature. In the latter case, an arcade may take the place of an outer wall as of a gallery or cloister. Strictly, arcade is used of types of architecture in which the arch is an essential feature, such as the late Romanesque and the Gothic. Portico and peristyle are used in reference to architectural features employing the colonnade. When the colonnade extends across (or nearly across) one side of a building and serves as an entrance, it is called a portico; when it is continued so as to extend along three or, usually, all four sides of a building, it is called a peristyle.

colony. *Possession, dependency, dominion, protectorate, mandate, territory.

color, n. 1 Color (or colour), chroma, hue, shade, tint, tinge come into comparison when they mean a property or attribute of a visible thing that is recognizable only when rays of light fall upon the thing and that is distinct from its shape, size, or other property apparent in dusk. Color is the ordinary term and, in careful use, the only generic term of this group. It may apply to the quality of blood which one describes as redness, of grass as greenness, of snow as whiteness, or of ebony as blackness, or to the optical sensation which one experiences when one sees these things respectively as red, green, white, and black. It may refer to any of the bands, called colors, of the spectrum, or to any of the variations by or as if by combination of one or more of these with another or with white, black, or gray; as, "Walden is blue at one time and green at another. . . . Lying between the earth and the heavens, it partakes of the color of both" (Thoreau). Color is also specifically applicable to the attribute of things seen as red, yellow, blue, orange, green, purple, or the like (sometimes called chromatic colors), as distinct from the attribute of things seen as black, white, or gray (sometimes called achromatic colors); as, to give a white house touches of color by painting the window sashes and shutters green. In this sense of color, especially when there is no reference to concrete things, the scientist often prefers chroma. Hue, in poetry or elevated prose, is often synonymous with color; as, "As brown in hue As hazel nuts and sweeter than the kernels" (Shak.). More specifically, hue suggests some modification of color; as, "Their shining green has changed to a less vivid hue; they are taking bluish tones here and there" (Hearn). In scientific use, hue is often applied to the second of the three attributes of a chromatic color, which are: (1) brilliance, or its degree of correspondence to the grays as they move from low, that is from black, which has zero brilliance, to high, that is to white, which has the greatest brilliance; (2) hue, or its susceptibility of being classed as red, yellow, blue, or the like; (3) saturation, or its distinctness or vividness of hue. Thus, olive, the color, may be described as the color of the pickled green olive, or as a color yellowish-green in hue, of low brilliance, and low saturation; pink may be described as red in hue, of high brilliance, and low saturation. The remaining words of this group have not been generally adopted by scientists and as a result they sometimes fluctuate in meaning. Shade (literally, comparative darkness) is often used in the sense of one of the gradations of a color, especially as its hue is affected by its brilliance; as, to seek a darker shade of blue (i.e., a blue that is lower in brilliance because nearer to dark gray or black); a brighter shade of green (i.e., one higher in brilliance and saturation) is desirable; various shades of gray; "The dark ultramarine of the west turns a shade paler" (J. C. Van Dyke). Tint (etymologically, a dyeing or dipping in color) is also used as meaning a gradation of color in respect to brilliance, but it always suggests hue, and is commonly used in reference to light colors (or colors of high brilliance) that seem to be given by a light or delicate touching; thus, what are often called "pastel colors" or, less properly, "pastel shades," are, in precise use, tints. The term is not infrequently used in contrast to shade, especially when the latter word connotes comparative darkness or dullness (or low brilliance); as, "the flags by the shore were turning brown; a tint of yellow was creeping up the rushes" (Jefferies); "colours as pure and delicate as the tints of early morning" (Cather); "The sprays of bloom which adorn it [a tree] are merely another shade of the red earth walls, and its fibrous trunk is full of gold and lavender tints" (Cather). Tinge implies more of interfusion or stain than tint; as, "Autumn bold, With universal tinge of sober gold" (Keats); "The water . . . imparts to the body of one bathing in it a yellowish tinge" (Thoreau).

Nearly all of these terms carry extended meanings derived from or related to the senses previously considered. Color usually suggests an outward character or aspect, such as may be changed by circumstances (as, "Your love for him has changed its colour since you have found him not to be the saint you thought him"—Hardy; "it had been an essentially aristocratic movement. . . . But . . . it took on a strongly democratic color"—Mencken) or may be imparted to a thing to brighten and vivify it (as, "people talk of matters which I had believed to be worn threadbare by use, and yet communicate a rich colour. . . to them"—A. C. Benson). Hue is less often used figuratively than color; it usually suggests a character rather than an aspect, but it does not necessarily imply an ingrained character; as, that is a question of another hue (or color); "Our mental hue depends. . . completely on the social atmosphere in which we move" (H. Smith). Tint applies to a character that is not dominant but imparted as if by contact or influence; as, "Our inborn spirits have a tint of thee" (Byron). Shade and tinge are used figuratively in the sense of trace, touch, trifle (for this sense, see TOUCH); as, a shade less cordial than usual; a tinge of sadness, or of regret.

2 *Flag, ensign, standard, banner, streamer, pennant, pennon, jack.

colorable or colourable. *Plausible, credible, believable, specious.

Ana. Convincing, telling, cogent, sound, *valid.

colorless. Colorless, uncolored, achromatic mean without color. In exact use, however, they are not interchangeable. Colorless is applied to that which is transparent (as, water is a colorless liquid), or to that which is bleached, blanched, or pallid (as, colorless leaves, colorless cheeks and lips). Uncolored is applied to that which is left in its natural state or is not dyed or stained (as, uncolored pongee) or to objects which have not been touched or touched up with color (as, an uncolored photograph; uncolored cheeks and lips). Achromatic is applied to that which is free from any of the hues in the spectrum or from any hues formed by combinations of these, or which gives images which are free from extraneous colors produced by refraction; as, an achromatic color; an achromatic telescope. Thus, a color (in its inclusive sense) may be chromatic or achromatic: if the former, it has a hue; if the latter, it has not, and is, therefore, white, black, or a pure gray.

Ana. *Pale, pallid, ashen, wan: whitened, blanched, bleached, decolorized (see WHITEN).

Ant. Colorful.

colossal. Gigantic, giant, gigantean, mammoth, elephantine, titanic, immense, huge, *enormous, vast, herculean, Cyclopean, Antaeon, Gargantuan, Brobdignagian.

Ana. Monumental, stupendous, tremendous, prodigious, *monstrous.

column. *Pillar, pilaster.

comatose. Torpid, stuporous, sluggish, *lethargic.

Ana. *Languid, languorous, listless, languishing: phlegmatic, *impassive: *insensible, anesthetic, impassible: inert, passive, supine (see INACTIVE).

Ant. Awake.

combat, v. *Oppose, resist, withstand, antagonize.

Ana. Cope, fight, *contend, battle, war: *attack, assail, assault, bombard, storm.

Ant. Champion: defend. — Con. Protect, shield, guard (see DEFEND): *support, uphold, advocate: *maintain, justify, vindicate.

combat, n. Conflict, fight, *contest, affray, fray.

Ana. *Battle, engagement, action, push: *encounter, skirmish, brush: controversy, dispute, *argument: contention, strife, conflict, *discord.

comber. Breaker, beachcomber, roller, billow, undulation, ripple, *wave.

combination. Combination, combine, party, bloc, faction, ring, cabal, junto agree in denoting a union, either of individuals or of organized interests, for mutual support in obtaining common political or private ends. Combination is the most comprehensive of these terms, being applicable to any such union, whether a trust, an alliance, or simply an association for the purpose of urging demands or resisting claims; as, a combination of coal consumers against an increase in prices; a combination of railroads to maintain existing rates. Combine is a colloquialism, especially in the United States, for combination; as, the coal combine. A party is a number of persons united in support of some opinion, cause, or principle; it usually implies a similar body in opposition, especially when used in reference to a political organization built up to continue the action and policies of government through election of its candidates to office; as, in the United States, there are usually only two strong parties; the Labor party in England. "He who draws his pen for one party must expect to make enemies of the other" (Dryden). "Who [Burke], born for the universe, narrowed his mind, And to party gave up what was meant for mankind" (Goldsmith). Bloc commonly implies a combination, of persons or groups who otherwise differ in party or in interests, for the sake of achieving a common, and often temporary, end; thus, in France and in Italy, a bloc is a combination of members of two or more political parties; in the United States, a bloc is a combination not of parties but of members of different parties who have a common end; as, the agricultural, or farm, bloc formed in the Congress of the United States in 1921 by members from the agricultural states wishing to secure legislation helpful to their constituents. Faction (cf. factious at INSUBORDINATE) frequently suggests a smaller body than party, and commonly implies selfish ends and the use of unscrupulous or turbulent means. "So several factions from this first ferment Work up to foam and threat the government" (Dryden). "The Whigs and Tories in Rome, Athens, and Jerusalem never forgot national points with more zeal, to attend to private faction, than we have lately" (Walpole). Ring is applicable to an exclusive (often more or less secret) combination for a selfish, and often corrupt, purpose, such as the control of the market, of political patronage, and the like; as, the Tweed Ring was in control of New York City politics for six years. A cabal is a small and secret combination seeking private or sinister ends by scheming or intrigue. "Mr. Philips [said] that I was entered into a cabal with Dean Swift and others to write against the Whig interest" (Pope). Junto (a corruption of the Spanish junta, meaning "council," or "assembly") oftener than cabal suggests intrigue for party or political, as well as for private, ends; as, the Essex Junto of the War of 1812, which became the exponent of New England Federalism; the Cuban junio of 1898.

Ana. *Monopoly, corner, pool, cartel, syndicate, trust.

combine, v. 1 Unite, associate, link, *join, connect, relate.

Ana. *Mix, mingle, commingle, blend, fuse, amalgamate: consolidate, unify (see COMPACT, v.).

Ant. Separate. — Con. Part, divide, sever, sunder, divorce (see SEPARATE): *detach, disengage.

2 *Unite, co-operate, concur, conjoin.

Ana. Coalesce, merge (see MIX): conspire, collude, *connive: coincide, *agree, concur.

combine, n. *Combination, party, bloc, faction, ring, cabal, junto.

Ana. See those at COMBINATION.

come. Come, arrive are comparable because both basically mean to get to one point from another more or less distant in space, time, relation, development, or the like. Come to and arrive at are synonyms of reach and, with exceptions, of its synonyms (see REACH); as, to come to (or arrive at) the end of a journey; to come to (or arrive at) a decision; what are we coming to (or arriving at)? Come is Anglo-Saxon in its origin, is one of the elementary intransitive verbs of motion, always implying movement toward, and may be used wherever such movement, whether actual or apparent, whether physical or spiritual, is implied. Arrive, on the other hand, is derived from Old French, and in modern use is very much affected by its earliest sense, to come to shore; that is, to land or disembark. Come, therefore, may be used with or without the implication that the destination is reached; arrive consistently carries that implication; as, I can see them coming; they will arrive at three o'clock; he has come (or arrived). When used in reference to things that move or progress without an agent or agency, as because of some law of nature or in obedience to some inner law or principle, come is usually preferable unless a definite end or termination or, often, fulfillment, as of expectation, is suggested; thus, the days come and go; at last the day of departure arrived; the longed-for breeze was slow in coming but when it arrived it brought joy to all; success never comes to those who await it idly; it usually arrives only after years of patient endeavor. Come often suggests or requires statement of a source or place from which a thing has issued; arrive, on the other hand, often suggests or requires a statement of an end, a goal, or a climax to a progress or development; as, the family comes from peasant stock; the family arrived socially when the grandfather of the present baron was elevated to the peerage. In such cases, come and arrive are not interchangeable for the former is loosely synonymous with issue, emanate, originate, arise, and the like, and the latter with succeed, triumph, or when followed by at, with acquire, and the like.

Ana. *Approach, near: rise, arise, *spring, proceed, emanate, issue, stem.

Ant. Go. — Con. Leave, depart, quit, withdraw, retire (see GO).

comedian (fem. comedienne). Comic, *fool, jester, clown, stooge, buffoon, zany, merry-andrew, pantaloon, harlequin, antic.

comely, adj. Fair, pretty, bonny, handsome, lovely, *beautiful, good-looking, beauteous, pulchritudinous.

Ant. Homely.

comestibles. Provisions, viands, victuals, *food, provender, fodder, forage.

comfort, v. Comfort, console, solace come into comparison as meaning to give or offer a person help or assistance in relieving his suffering or sorrow. Comfort, the homelier, more intimate word, suggests relief afforded by imparting positive cheer, hope, or strength, as well as by the lessening of pain; as, "He hath sent me . . . to comfort all that mourn" (Isaiah lxi. 1-2); a mother comforts her sobbing child. "But there was about him a certain reserve, and she dared not comfort him, not even speak softly to him" (D. H. Lawrence). Console, the more formal term, emphasizes rather the alleviation of grief or the mitigation of the sense of loss than the communication of pleasure; it frequently implies some definite source of relief; as, the presence of his friend consoled him; to console oneself by philosophic reflections. "If you really want to console me, teach me rather to forget what has happened" (Wilde). Solace frequently suggests relief from weariness, despondency, chagrin, loneliness, dullness, or the like, rather than from grief or pain, and often, specifically, a lift of the spirits; and the source of that relief is more commonly things than persons; as, to solace oneself with books; "The same [lips] that oft in childhood solaced me . . . 'Grieve not, my child, chase all thy fears away!'" (Cowper); "She was not really solaced by Religion" (Meredith).

Ana. Delight, gladden, rejoice, *please: *relieve, assuage, mitigate, alleviate: refresh, restore (see RENEW).

Ant. Afflict: bother. — Con. *Distress, trouble: torment, torture, try (see AFFLICT): vex, *annoy, irk.

comfort, n. Ease, *rest, repose, relaxation, leisure.

Ana. Contentedness or content, satisfaction (see corresponding adjectives under SATISFY, v.): enjoyment, joy, fruition, *pleasure: relief, assuagement, alleviation (see corresponding verbs at RELIEVE).

Ant. Discomfort. — Con. *Distress, suffering, misery. comfortable. Comfortable, cozy (or cosy), snug, easy, restful, reposeful come into comparison when they mean enjoying or providing conditions or circumstances which make for one's contentment and security. Comfortable usually implies the absence of that which gives trouble, pain, or distress in any degree or of any kind to the body or mind (as, a comfortable chair or bed; a comfortable room both in summer and in winter; he is never comfortable except in his own home; "a makeshift arrangement not altogether agreeable or comfortable for either of us"—H. Ellis), but it often applies to persons or things that encourage in one serenity of mind, tranquillity, a sense of well-being, complacency, or the like (as, the family was left in comfortable circumstances; a comfortable, motherly woman; "although Darwin may have held this comfortable opinion [that history is development towards a goal], it is no part of his system"—Inge). Cozy suggests comfortableness derived from warmth, shelter, ease, friendliness, and the like; as, a cozy fire; a cozy armchair; to close all the windows and doors so as to make the house cozy; "the cozy talk by the fireside" (J. R. Green); "He made as if to change his cozy position, but reconsidered, and deferred it" (Meredith). Snug (as here considered: see also NEAT) suggests the state or the frame of mind of one who has as much room, or responsibility, or freedom, or money, or the like, as is essential to one's well-being, but no more than one actually needs to keep one cozy, content, or secure: the term usually connotes comfort such as is associated with small but comfortable quarters as distinguished from those that are spacious, or with a quiet, restricted, but pleasant way of life as distinguished from one where there is little time for one's own interests or where one is driven by ambitions or restlessness: often, specifically, the term suggests protection from the elements, and warmth and dryness, as contributions to one's comfort; as, "There is hardly to be found upon the earth, I suppose, so snug a creature as an Englishman by his fireside in the winter" (Cowper); "All the gipsies and showmen...lay snug within their carts and tents" (Hardy); "Arnold the heartbroken outcast from the snug household of faith, wearying in spiritual wastes of sand and thorns" (C. E. Montague). Easy (as here considered: see also EASY, 2) implies relief from all that makes for discomfort or hardships, with the result that one is happy or free from care, anxiety, trouble, doubt, or the like; as, to be in easy circumstances for the first time in his life; she could now enjoy herself with an easy conscience; "People of the right sort are never easy until they get things straight" (Shaw); "Mrs. Struthers's easy Sunday hospitality" (E. Wharton). Restful and the somewhat less common reposeful usually suggest a state of mind of one who is comfortable, cozy, or easy, as well as relaxed, or a character in a thing that induces such a state of mind; as, "It's restful to arrive at a decision, and restful just to think about New Hampshire" (Frost); "A restful, friendly room, fitted to the uses of gentle life" (M. Austin); "An attractive expression of reposeful friendliness pervaded his whole appearance" (G. Macdonald).

Ana. Comforting, consoling, solacing (see COMFORT, v): content or contented, satisfied (see under SATISFY): grateful, welcome, agreeable, gratifying (see PLEASANT). Ant. Uncomfortable: miserable. — Con. Wretched (see MISERABLE): distressing, troubling (see TROUBLE, v): annoying, vexing, irking, bothering (see ANNOY).

comic, adj. Comical, *laughable, farcical, funny, droll, risible, ludicrous, ridiculous.

Ana. Diverting, amusing, entertaining (see AMUSE): *witty, humorous, facetious: grotesque, antic, *fantastic.

Ant. Tragic. — Con. *Serious, solemn, grave, sober: pathetic, touching, poignant, *moving, affecting.

comic, n. Comedian, *fool, jester, clown, buffoon, stooze, antic, zany, merry-andrew, pantaloone, harlequin.

comical. Comic, farcical, ludicrous, ridiculous, *laughable, risible, droll, funny.

Ana. Absurd, silly, *foolish: jocular, jocose, humorous (see WITTY): waggish, impish, roguish, sportive (see PLAYFUL): deriding or derisive, ridiculing, mocking (see corresponding verbs at RIDICULE).

Ant. Pathetic. — Con. *Melancholy, doleful, lugubrious, dolorous: *moving, poignant, touching, affecting.

comity, 1 *Courtesy, amenity, attention, gallantry. Ana. Civility, politeness, courteousness (see corresponding adjectives at CIVIL): graciousness, cordiality, geniality, sociableness, affability (see corresponding adjectives at GRACIOUS): suavity, urbanity (see corresponding adjectives at SUAVE): *intercourse, commerce, dealings.

Ant. Dissension: antagonism. — Con. Rancor, animosity, animus, antipathy, *enmity, hostility: conflict, strife, *discord, variance, contention.

2 Amity, good will, *friendship.

Ana. *Association, society: companionship, comradeship (see primitive nouns at ASSOCIATE): concord, accord, *harmony.

command, v. Command, order, bid, enjoin, direct, instruct, charge, as here compared, mean to issue orders to someone to give, get, or do something. Command and order agree in stressing the idea of authority, command implying its more formal and official exercise, order, its more peremptory, sometimes even arbitrary, exercise; as, a king, a military officer, the captain of a ship, commands; a landowner orders a trespasser off his premises; one is apt to resent being ordered, except by those who have a right to command. But order is used of a physician with no such connotation; as, the doctor ordered outdoor exercise. Bid in this sense is somewhat archaic or literary, except when it is colloquial; it usually implies ordering or commanding (often with a suggestion of peremptoriness) directly and by speech; as, she bade him be seated. "He seized him by the collar and sternly bade him cease making a fool of himself" (Shaw). Enjoin, direct, and instruct are all less imperative than command or order but they all connote expectation of obedience. Enjoin adds to the idea of authority the implication of pressing admonition; direct and instruct suggest rather business, official, or diplomatic relations, direct being perhaps the more mandatory, instruct the more formal, of the two; as, a parent enjoins his children to be quiet; the church enjoins certain duties; the editor directed his secretary to admit no callers during a conference; to instruct an assistant to gather certain information. "St. Peter... enjoins us to be ready always to give an answer to every man that asks us a reason for the faith that is in us" (Lowes). "Why otherwise does it [the Constitution of the United States] direct the judges to take an oath to support it?" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "Marvin [the architect] was instructed to secure a Saint Joseph for the garden" (M. Austin). Charge, a more or less bookish term, implies not only enjoining but the imposition of a task as a duty; as, his mother charged him to look out for his little brother; "Mrs. Yeobright gave him the money-bags, charged him to go to Mistover" (Hardy).

Ana. Control, manage, *conduct, direct: exact, *demand, require: *force, compel, coerce, constrain, oblige.

Ant. Comply, obey.

command, n. 1 Command, order, injunction, bidding, behest, mandate, dictate agree in meaning a direction, that must or should be obeyed, to do or not do something. Command imputes to the person who issues the directions either unquestioned authority (as, the commands of a general) or complete control of a situation (as, at the command of the intruder, he held up his hands). The term usually connotes either peremptoriness or imperativeness; as, at the command of his father, he returned to the house; every request of hers he interpreted as a command. Order is not always clearly distinguishable from command; it is, however, the preferred word for directions to subordinates that are instructions as well as commands; in such use it commonly implies explicitness in detail; as, the troops were awaiting orders from headquarters; in response to the principal's order, the pupils maintained silence while passing through the corridors. Injunction carries a weaker implication of imperativeness than the preceding words, except in legal use, where it is applied to a court order commanding a person to do, or more often, to refrain from doing, something on the penalty of being adjudged guilty of contempt of court. In general use, the word commonly stresses admonition without losing the implication of expected or demanded obedience; as, "The high injunction not to taste that fruit" (Millon); she carefully obeyed the injunctions laid upon her by her physician. "They went off to play tennis . . . with injunctions from Mrs. Hawthorne not to be late for dinner" (Arch. Marshall). Bidding usually implies the status of master or parent in the person who issues the orders, and therefore stresses expected obedience or the fact of being obeyed; as, "thousands at his [God's] bidding speed" (Millon). "Whatever Godwine did he did at the bidding of his lord" (Freeman). Behest is a distinctly literary term, equivalent to bidding in its implications; as, "to do his master's high behest" (Scott); "not to disobey her lord's behest" (Tennyson). Mandate (see also MANDATE, 2) carries the strongest implication of imperativeness of all of these words, for it denotes a command or order issued by a very high, often the highest, authority. It has or has had specific applications, such as an order from a superior court or official to an inferior one or from a Roman emperor to the commander of his military forces. In current use, it is often applied to something inexorably demanded, as by the exigencies of the situation, rather than actually or verbally commanded; as, he accepted the nomination, believing that his huge majority indicated a mandate from his party. "It was a bold step, for he [Augustus] had no legal military command, and no mandate from Senate or people" (Buchan). "Poe's doctrine of brevity, as a mandate laid upon poetry by the inflexible nature of things" (Lowes). Mandate also specifically applies to any order or commission granted by the League of Nations to one of its member nations to establish a responsible government over a colony or territory that belonged to Germany before the Treaty of Versailles. Dictate etymologically denotes a command given orally, but it is now rarely used literally. "He . . . received his suggestions, and bowed to his dictates" (Meredith). In commonest use, it denotes a command or authoritative judgment figuratively uttered by an inner voice such as that of the conscience or formulated in a principle or law. "The government which has a right to do an act, and has imposed on it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "A suspicion that . . . the Moral Law speaks in equivocal tones to those who listen most scrupulously for its dictates" (L. P. Smith). Ana. Direction, instruction, charging or charge (see corresponding verbs at COMMAND): precept, ordinance, *law, statute, canon, rule.

2 Control, authority, *power, jurisdiction, sway, dominion.

Ana. Ascendancy, *supremacy: sovereignty (see FREE, adj.).

commander. Captain, master, *chief, chieftain, head, leader.

comme il faut. Proper, seemly, *decorous, decent, nice, demure.

commemorate, v. Celebrate, observe, *keep, solemnize.

commence. *Begin, start, initiate, inaugurate.

Ana. Institute, *found, organize, establish.

Con. Finish, complete, conclude, terminate, end, *close. commend. Commend, recommend, applaud, compliment come into comparison when they mean to voice or otherwise manifest to others one's warm approval. Commend usually implies judicious or restrained praise, but it suggests as its motive a desire to call attention to the merits of a person or a thing; as, the police commissioners publicly commended the officers who made the arrest. "His wife seriously commended Mr. Collins for having spoken so sensibly" (Austen). "It is always dangerous and impertinent to commend a poem for anything but its poetry" (Day Lewis). Recommend adds to commend the implication of offering that which is praised for acceptance, use, or employment by another; as, the physician recommended the treatment of bruises with alternating cold and hot applications; his present employers highly recommended him to his prospective employers. Applaud implies an enthusiastic expression of approval; it commonly, but not necessarily, suggests approval by a large number of persons or by the public; as, the president was applauded for his closing of all banks in the crisis of March, 1933. "Everybody applauded the mayor's proposed entertainment, especially when it became known that he meant to pay for it all himself" (Hardy). Compliment stresses either courtesy in the commendation or, sometimes, flattery in the manner or words of praise; as, the visitors to the convention complimented the townspeople on the arrangements made for their comfort. "Marvellous cognac this, madame! It was the first time it had ever been so complimented, and Madame Defarge knew enough of its antecedents to know better" (Dickens).

Ana. *Praise, laud, extol, eulogize, acclaim.

Ant. Censure: admonish. — Con. *Criticize, reprehend, reprobate, blame: *reprove, reproach, rebuke, reprimand, chide.

commensurable. Commensurate, proportionable, proportionate, *proportional.

Ana. Equivalent, equal, identical, tantamount (see SAME): *reciprocal, correspondent.

Ant. Incommensurable.

commensurate. Commensurable, proportionate, *proportional, proportionable.

Ana. Adequate, *sufficient, enough: corresponding or correspondent, according or accordant, squaring, conforming (see corresponding verbs at AGREE): balancing, counterbalancing, compensating, offsetting (see COMPENSATE).

Ant. Incommensurate.

comment, n. Commentary, *remark, observation, note, obiter dictum, descant.

Ana. Interpreting or interpretation, elucidation, explication, expounding or exposition, explaining or explanation (see corresponding verbs at EXPLAIN): annotation, gloss (see under ANNOTATE).

comment, v. Commentate, *remark, animadvert.

Ana. Interpret, elucidate, expound, *explain, construe, explicate: *annotate, gloss: *criticize: illustrate, *exemplify.

commentary. Comment, *remark, observation, note, obiter dictum, descant.

commentator. See under commentate at REMARK, v.

commerce. 1 Trade, *business, industry, traffic.

2 Traffic, *intercourse, dealings, communication, communion, commune, conversation, converse, correspondence.

commercial, adj. Commercial, mercantile come into comparison when they mean of, relating to, or dealing with the supplying of commodities. Commercial is the more widely applicable term: it may be used in reference to anything which has to do with the buying or selling of commodities for profit, with their transportation, and sometimes, even, with their production, or with business affairs in general; thus, a commercial transaction is any piece of business involving a buyer and seller of goods or property that is for the financial benefit of the seller; commercial law deals with all matters that have reference to business, such as contracts, negotiable papers, liens, payment of debts, partnerships, etc.; a commercial attaché is, in the United States, an officer of the Department of Commerce attached by the Department of State to an embassy or legation in a country where trade is important; a commercial traveler (the regular British term, and the once-common American term, now often replaced by "traveling salesman") is a person employed to travel, to display the goods or products of a business that engages in selling, and to take orders for them; the term commercial fertilizer is applied to a prepared product, as distinguished from natural fertilizer. Also, commercial is used to describe anything which has for its aim financial profit or is guided by the methods or practices of business; as, the commercial theater; commercial aviation; commercial sports; commercial radio programs (i.e., programs paid for by advertisers). Mercantile is often used interchangeably with commercial with little, sometimes no, difference in meaning; thus, a mercantile transaction is not ordinarily distinguishable from a commercial transaction, nor mercantile law from commercial law. The term, however, often suggests actual buying and selling (the occupation of a merchant) rather than commerce in general, including production and transportation, and is, therefore, more restricted in its application; thus, a commercial house is a business or company engaged in foreign or domestic commerce; a mercantile house is a business (now usually a wholesale business) engaged in merchandizing; "mercantile career" is more explicit or less ambiguous than "commercial career"; so, a mercantile agent; a mercantile establishment. When used in an extended sense, it commonly implies an opposition to some other thing of the same general character; thus, a mercantile marine (or merchant marine) consists of the privately owned and commercially operated ships of a country as distinct from those that are publicly owned, or the navy.

commingle. Mingle, blend, *mix, merge, coalesce, fuse, amalgamate.

Ana. Combine, unite, associate (see JOIN): *integrate.

commiseration. Compassion, *pity, condolence, sympathy, ruth, empathy, bowels.

Ana. Compassionateness, tenderness, warmheartedness (see corresponding adjectives at TENDER): mercifulness, clemency (see under FORBEARING): lamenting or lamentation, bewailing, bemoaning (see corresponding verbs at DEPLORE): pitifulness, piteousness, pitiableness (see corresponding adjectives at PITIFUL).

Ant. Ruthlessness, pitilessness.

commission, v. *Authorize, accredit, license.

Ana. Appoint, *designate, name, nominate: empower, *enable: instruct, enjoin, charge, bid, order, *command.

commit, v. Commit, entrust (or intrust), confide, consign, relegate come into comparison when they mean to assign to a person or place for some definite end or purpose, such as custody or safekeeping. Commit is the widest term; it may express merely the general idea of delivering into another's charge (as, to commit the management of an estate to an agent), or it may have the special sense of a transfer to a superior power, to a place of custody, or the like; as, "Into thine hand I commit my spirit" (Psalms xxxi. 5); "We therefore commit his body to the ground; earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust" (Book of Common Prayer); to commit a person to prison; to commit one's thoughts to paper. To entrust is to commit with trust and confidence; to confide is to entrust with entire reliance and assurance; as, to entrust one with a secret, with the care of a child; to confide to a friend the execution of one's dying wish. "A government, entrusted with such ample powers... must also be entrusted with ample means for their execution" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "The right of naturalization was therefore, with one accord, surrendered by the States, and confided to the Federal Government" (Ch. Just. Taney). Consign implies a more formal act, and frequently suggests such transfer or delivery as removes its object from one's immediate control; as, to consign goods to an agent for sale; "The family mansion had been consigned to the charge of a kinsman, who was allowed to make it his home for the time being" (N. Hawthorne); "He must now... consign him to a living tomb again" (N. Hawthorne). To relegate is to consign to some particular class, position, or sphere, usually with the implication of setting aside or getting rid of; as, "[Man] is relegated to his place in a classification" (J. H. Newman). "He supposed that he had disappointed the Bishop and that he was being relegated into the limbo of moderately satisfactory young parsons" (C. Mackenzie).

Ana. Transfer, shift, remove, *move: assign, *allot.

commodious. Capacious, *spacious, ample.

Ana. *Comfortable: *large, big, great: *broad, wide, deep.

Con. Circumscribed, confined, limited, restricted (see LIMIT, v.): *narrow, strait: inconvenient, incommodious (see corresponding verbs at INCONVENIENCE).

common, adj. 1 *Universal, general, generic.

Ana. Shared, partaken, participated (see SHARE, v.): joined or joint, united, connected, associated (see corresponding verbs at JOIN): merged, blended, amalgamated (see MIX).

Ant. Individual.

2 Mutual, *reciprocal.

Ana. & Ant. See those at COMMON, 1.

3 Common, ordinary, familiar, popular, vulgar come into comparison when they mean being in kind or having the character of that which is generally or usually seen, known, used, thought, or the like. Common, as here compared, implies the lack of distinguishing, conspicuous, or exceptional qualities; positively, it suggests usualness, everyday character or quality, or frequency of occurrence; as, the common people; a common soldier; the common chickweed; a common error; he lacks common honesty (or decency). "For common men and women two or three of the common loves will suffice—the love of family and home, of school and church, of mountain and sea" (C. W. Eliot). Often the term also connotes inferiority, coarseness, lack of breeding, or low station; as, the common herd; of common clay; he is hopelessly common. Ordinary expresses more definitely accordance with the regular order or run of things; as, "the ordinary intercourse of man with man" (J. H. Newman); "It's not like ordinary photographs. There's something special about it" (Bennett). It commonly implies qualities not above, frequently below, the average; as, "Choice word and measured phrase, above the reach Of ordinary men" (Wordsworth); "Let others expatiate on trivial objects, ordinary characters, and uninteresting events" (Landor). As a term of depreciation, ordinary is similar to but less contemptuous than common; as, a very ordinary-looking

(cf. common-looking) person; his ability is no more than ordinary. Familiar stresses the fact of being generally known and easily recognized because of its frequency of occurrence or one's constant association with it rather than because of its lack of distinguishing qualities; as, "the tyranny of familiar surroundings over the imagination" (B. Russell); "To remind you of what is so familiar as to be frequently forgotten" (Frankfurter). "The doctrine of Einstein, which sweeps away axioms so familiar to us that they seem obvious truths, and substitutes others which seem absurd because they are unfamiliar" (H. Ellis). Popular and vulgar (see also COARSE), as here compared, imply commonness that arises from use or acceptance by or prevalence among the vast majority of persons, often specifically among the common people of a country, an age, or the like; as, popular fallacies; the vulgar tongue; Vulgar Latin. In current use, popular more often stresses the implication of widespread prevalence, currency, favor, or the like, among the people than does vulgar, which even in this sense often carries derogatory connotations such as of inferiority, coarseness, and the like; as, a popular song; "dancing . . . of all the arts . . . most associated in the popular mind with pleasure" (H. Ellis); "this mode of interpreting Scripture is fatal to the vulgar notion of its verbal inspiration" (Arnold); "a popular instead of an accurate and legal conception of what the word 'monopolize' in the statute means" (Justice Holmes); "We were reluctant to expose those silent and beautiful places to vulgar curiosity" (Cather).

Ana. Prevalent, *prevailing, rife, current: *usual, customary: *plentiful, abundant, ample.

Ant. Uncommon: exceptional. — Con. Rare, *infrequent, occasional: singular, unique, peculiar, odd, *strange.

commonplace, n. Commonplace, platitude, truism, bromide, cliché agree in meaning an idea or expression lacking in originality or freshness. A commonplace is a stock idea or expression which is frequently little more than the obvious, conventional, and easy thing to think or say on a given subject. "The machinery as well as the characters of those novels became the commonplaces of later romancers" (Sir W. Raleigh, d. 1922). "The mediaeval lover . . . was not unlikely, in his panegyric of his lady, to identify her with a panther. It was a commonplace of compliment" (Loves). Platitude adds to commonplace the suggestions of flatness or triteness and often, utterance with an air of importance or novelty. "What is that sentimental platitude of somebody's . . . about the sun being to flowers what art is to life?" (Hewlett). "Traditional schoolbook platitudes and campaign slogans" (Frankfurter). A truism is a self-evident truth; it differs from an axiom (see AXIOM at PRINCIPLE) in frequently implying a somewhat superfluous insistence upon the obvious; as, Pope's palpable truism "The proper study of mankind is man." "It is a truism that a sound society makes for sound individuals" (Day Lewis). Bromide (a slang term) applies to any commonplace, platitude, or truism that strikes the listener or reader as especially dull or hackneyed and often, as an evidence of its maker's low-grade mentality; as, "Despite the silly old bromide [nobody loves a fat man], the fat man is more often than not the best loved of men" (McClure's Mag.). Cliché applies to any expression which when new was fresh and full of meaning, but which by constant iteration has become not only dull but hackneyed and stereotyped; as, "The cliché is merely the sometime novel, that has been loved not wisely but too well" (Loves).

Ana. Expression, *phrase, collocation, idiom, locution: banality, jejuneity, inanity, wishy-washiness (see corresponding adjectives at INSIPID): triteness, threadbareness (see corresponding adjectives at TRITE).

common sense. See SENSE, 2.

commune, v. *Confer, consult, advise, parley, treat, negotiate.

Ana. Converse, talk, *speak: *discuss, debate, argue.

commune, n. Communion, *intercourse, commerce, traffic, converse, dealings, communion, conversation, correspondence.

Ana. See those at COMMUNION, 1.

communicable. *Infectious, contagious, catching.

communicate. Communicate, impart agree in meaning to convey or transfer something (now always something neither tangible nor concrete) such as information, qualities, or the like; they differ chiefly in emphasis, communicate stressing the result, impart, rather the process, of the transfer. To communicate (the more general term) is to make common to both parties or objects involved the knowledge or quality conveyed; to impart is to share with another what is regarded as primarily one's own; as, the sky communicated its color to the sea; his courage communicated itself to his men; the smoke imparted its odor to his clothes; to impart one's knowledge or skill to others. "I wonder do we ever succeed really in communicating our thoughts to one another" (Shaw). "You are worth to society the happiness you are capable of imparting" (J. G. Holland).

Ana. Acquaint, apprise, *inform, advise, notify: tell, disclose, *reveal, divulge, discover: convey, *transfer.

Con. Conceal, *hide: *suppress, repress: withhold, hold back, reserve (see KEEP).

communication. *Intercourse, commerce, traffic, dealings, conversation, converse, correspondence, communion, commune.

Ana. Exchanging or exchange, interchanging or interchange (see corresponding verbs at EXCHANGE): conversing, talking (see SPEAK): *news, tidings, advice, intelligence.

communion. 1 Commune, *intercourse, commerce, traffic, converse, dealings, communication, conversation, correspondence.

Ana. Empathy, sympathy (see PITY, n.): mysticism (see under ASCETIC): contemplation (see corresponding verb at CONSIDER): *ecstasy, rapture, transport.

2 *Religion, denomination, faith, church, creed, sect, cult, persuasion.

communist. Bolshevik, socialist, *collectivist, nihilist, anarchist.

compact, adj. Dense, *close, thick.

Ana. Compressed, condensed, contracted (see CONTRACT, v.): concentrated, consolidated, compacted (see COMPACT, v.): solid, *firm, hard: *tight.

Con. Loose, slack: diffuse, prolix, verbose, *wordy: tenuous, rare, *thin.

compact, v. Compact, consolidate, unify, concentrate agree in meaning to bring or gather together the parts, particles, elements, or units of a thing so as to form a close mass or an integral whole. Compact stresses the process more than the effect. It usually suggests a packing or pressing together of many things so as to form a closely arranged mass or a dense substance, and may be used in reference both to material and immaterial things: sometimes, it carries so strong an implication of solid formation or construction that it fundamentally means to build firmly or to strengthen; as, heat and lack of rain have compacted the soil; to compact matted fibers of wool and hair into felt by rolling and pressing; "Sweet spring . . . A box where sweets compacted lie" (Herbert). Consolidate implies a merging or uniting, often in an exceedingly close union, of previously distinct but, usually, homogeneous or complementary things. The term may take as its object a whole, such as a nation, a people, or an empire, or such as a substance or material, and may imply a process which promotes the binding together of the parts, elements, individuals, and the like, so that solidarity or solidity is achieved; as, war tends to consolidate a people; "They believed that the Church was the only force which could consolidate the nation and check fissiparous tendencies" (Inge); rolling and cooling consolidated the newly laid asphalt into a firm smooth pavement. But consolidate can also take as its objects the parts, elements, individuals, groups, etc., which have been brought together in close union; as, "these organizations worked independently, and subsequently they were partially consolidated" (V. Heiser); "Two marriages with the Dutch Vandergraves had consolidated these qualities of thrift and handsome living" (E. Wharton). Unify implies a union of heterogeneous or homogeneous parts, elements, individuals, or the like, that results in the making or producing of a thing that has oneness and integrity and that stands by itself as a thing apart: the term does not, however, carry as strong an implication of solidarity as does consolidate but, on the other hand, it places stress on the integration of parts so that each does its appointed work or serves its own purpose to the benefit not only of itself but of the whole; thus, a dramatist unifies (not consolidates) the play he composes; after a civil war, the task of the government is to unify (rather than consolidate) a nation; the imagination of a great poet unifies a mass of images and impressions; the Homeric poems may have been originally a collection of narrative poems, but it seems likely that one person unified them. Concentrate usually carries the implication of bringing together a number of things that are scattered or diffused and of massing them around a point or center; as, to concentrate troops at places where an attack is expected; to concentrate one's efforts on a single piece of work; "The science of that age was all divination, clairvoyance... seeking in an instant of vision to concentrate a thousand experiences" (Pater). In a figurative extension of this sense, concentrate often implies the fixing of the mind or attention on one thing so that all distracting objects or thoughts are eliminated; as, her excitement made her unable to concentrate on the task. A similar implication of eliminating that which weakens, dilutes, or adulterates, is found in scientific and technical use; thus, the chemist concentrates a solution by evaporating the solvent; a miner concentrates ores (i.e., separates the base from the precious metals) by a machine or by washing.

Con. Uncongenial, unsympathetic (see INCONSONANT): reserved, taciturn, uncommunicative (see SILENT).

company, n. Company, party, band, troop, troupe come into comparison when they denote a group of persons who are associated in a joint endeavor or who are assembled for a common end. Company is the general term for either a temporary assemblage or a permanent association of individuals who join forces. "The glorious company of the apostles" (Bk. of Com. Prayer). "The right to enter every other State whenever they pleased, singly or in companies" (Ch. Just. Taney). A party is a company assembled temporarily for a common purpose; as, a search party; a dinner party; "a party of visitors from the country" (Shaw). A band is a company united by a common tie or purpose; the term implies closer organization and a less casual coming together than does company; as, the robbers worked in bands; a band of musicians. "That small, transfigured band... whose one bond is, that all have been unspotted by the world" (Arnold). A troop is a company or band that works or acts together in close formation or in unanimity; the term frequently suggests a throng or multitude; as, "troops of friends" (Shak.); "There entertain him all the Saints above, In solemn troops, and sweet societies" (Milton). In specific use, troop is applied to a band of soldiers, or in the plural troops, to soldiers collectively; as, "Farewell the plumed troop, and the big wars" (Shak.); the British troops. When the reference is to a company of performers (especially on the stage) troupe is the preferred spelling; as, a circus troupe.

Ant. Disparate. — Con. *Different, divergent, diverse, various.

compare, v. Compare, contrast, collate agree in meaning to set two or more things side by side in order to show likenesses and differences. Compare implies as an aim the showing of relative values or excellences, or a bringing out of characteristic qualities, whether they are similar or divergent; contrast implies as the aim an attempt to emphasize their differences; as, one may compare the movement of the Odyssey with that of the Aeneid to arrive at their distinctive qualities; one may thereupon contrast the buoyancy and rapidity of the one with the stateliness and dignity of the other. One object is compared with another, as above: it is compared to another when it is formally represented, on the basis of a real or (frequently) imagined similarity, as like it; as, Pope compares Homer with (not to) Vergil; he compares Homer to (not with) the Nile, pouring out his riches with a boundless overflow, Vergil to (not with) a river in its banks, with a gentle and constant stream. Collate suggests a minute or critical comparison in order to note points of agreement and divergence; it applies especially to the minute comparison of books and manuscripts containing different versions of the same work for the sake of ascertaining or establishing the correct text. "He has visited all Europe... not to collect medals, or collate manuscripts: but... to compare and collate the distresses of all men in all countries" (Burke).

Ana. *Match, equal, approach, touch, rival.

comparison. Comparison, contrast, antithesis, collation, parallel, as here compared, agree in meaning a setting of things side by side so as to discover or exhibit their likenesses and differences, especially their generic likenesses and differences. Comparison is often used more or less loosely as the comprehensive term; in precise use it is preferred when the differences are obvious, and an intent to lay bare resemblances and similarities for the sake of expounding or judging is implied; as, despite the fact that Bolshevism and Fascism are antagonistic ideologies, there is ground for a comparison between them; students who make a comparison of Shakespeare's Hamlet and the play which was its source acquire intimate knowledge of the great dramatist's indebtedness to others. Because measuring one thing in terms of another is usually implied by comparison, the word often imputes an offensive character either to the association (as in the comparison of "the colonel's lady" and "Judy O'Grady") or to the judgment; as, "comparisons are odious"; a tactful person never makes comparisons; he will lose nothing by the comparison. Contrast is the preferable term when one wishes to imply an intent to distinguish or discriminate things which are so much alike that their differences are not obvious; as, the correct use of close synonyms can be shown only by contrast. "The parallelism and succession [of Bismarck and Richelieu] are apparent. But the contrast also must be noted; the contrast in character and the contrast in the respective advantages and disadvantages which aided and hindered them" (Belloc). Contrast often also suggests an aesthetic rather than an expository aim, or an artistic effect gained by the exhibition of startling differences. "In physical appearance that contrast is glaring... the square, full blooded, blunt face of the one, the pointed chin and finely cut, pale features of the other" (Belloc). Antithesis also implies contrast for the sake of revealing startling differences, but it distinctively suggests such opposition in the things contrasted that they either represent extremes or negate each other. The word may imply an expository intent; it then presupposes that the true nature of one thing is fully understood only when it is presented as opposed to that which is unlike it in every particular. "The philosophy of fascism and the philosophy of democracy are... irreconcilable... the true antithesis [is] not that between fascism and communism which have much in common [but between] Democracy and fascism... opposed ways of life with contradictory standards of value" (N. Y. Herald Tribune). Collation and parallel denote a kind of comparison for the purpose of revealing both likenesses and differences. Both imply a close study and, usually, a specific aim. Collation denotes a comparison of different versions, accounts, editions, texts, manuscripts, etc., of the same thing, for the purpose of verification, co-ordination, correction, selection of the original, or the like; as, to make a collation of the Scriptural accounts of the Resurrection. "Of these [corrupt passages in Shakespeare] the restoration is only to be attempted by collation of copies or sagacity of conjecture" (Johnson). Parallel usually denotes a minute comparison of passages, articles, works, etc., which are believed to have a different origin, in order to detect correspondences, or of accounts, records, stories told at different times, etc., which ought to agree, in order to detect discrepancies; thus, by what is often called "the deadly parallel," a comparison of two articles may reveal such correspondences in language and thought as to give ground for a charge of plagiarism, or a comparison of testimony given by the same witness on two occasions may reveal discrepancies that make him liable to arrest for perjury.

compendium. Compendium, syllabus, digest, pandect, survey, sketch, précis, aperçu come into comparison when they mean a treatment of a subject or of a topic in brief compass. Unlike the terms discriminated at ABRIDGMENT, these words do not stress condensation of a previous work, though that implication is at times found in some of them. Compendium applies to a work which gathers together and presents in brief form (either in outline form or in discursive writing) all the facts, principles, or other details essential to a general or comprehensive knowledge of the subject: the term is used chiefly in reference to a work in which its author or authors compile in orderly and intelligible form information gathered from others and not obtained by independent investigation or research; as, a compendium of economics for the use of the business man; "Mr. Lengyel's 'Turkey' is in the nature of a compendium of Turkish history" (N. Y. Herald Tribune). Syllabus applies mainly to a series of headings, points, propositions, concise statements of the substance of courses to be given or of lectures to be delivered, or the like, which give the material necessary for a view of the whole and an understanding of its drift or pattern; as, a syllabus of college courses; a syllabus of forum lectures; the "Syllabus of [Pope] Pius X" is a table of 65 propositions advanced by Modernists and condemned by him as erroneous. Digest applies to a body of information gathered from many sources and arranged and classified so that it may be made accessible. The term applies chiefly to a compilation of legal rules, statutes, decisions, opinions, and the like, alphabetically arranged and fully indexed; as, a digest of Roman law; a digest of Jewish law. Digest also is used to designate an abstract in outline or essay form giving briefly the substance of something heard or read; as, the professor asked his students to write a digest of the lecture to which they had just listened. In current use, the term is often employed in titles of magazines that give abridgments of articles from recent issues of other magazines or of recently issued books; as, "The Reader's Digest." Pandect, which is used chiefly in the plural, is the equivalent of digest as applied to a compilation of laws, but it is used chiefly of the monumental digest of Civil, or Roman, law (the Pandects or Digests) compiled under the authority of the Emperor Justinian in the sixth century A.D. Survey applies to any brief but comprehensive presentation of a subject or topic, especially one that is to be treated later in detail, so that those who hear it or read it will have a view of the whole, of its leading features, and of their relation to each other as in time, space, or importance; as, he devoted his first lecture on the Middle Ages to a survey of that period; the course will give you a survey of English literature. The remaining terms of this group suggest reduction to an extremely brief compass. Sketch (as here considered: see also under SKETCH, v.) suggests slighter and, often, more tentative treatment than survey; as, to submit a sketch of the proposed book. Précis (etymologically, a French adjective meaning concise) applies to any brief clear-cut statement of essential facts, points, details, or the like: in school use, it applies to a concise restatement, not an outline, made by a student in part in his own words, often as an exercise in composition, of the main ideas of a lecture, chapter, poem, text assigned for collateral reading, or the like, preserving usually the order, emphasis, and tone of the original. In general use, the term may apply to an abstract (see this term at ABRIDGMENT); but, as it does not necessarily imply condensation of a book or treatment, it is preferred to abstract when the matter presented constitutes a report, such as a report of events sent by a diplomatic agent to his department of state during a crisis in the affairs of the government to which he is accredited, or a very short description of an important occurrence, or the like; as, "I know she goes in for giving a rapid précis of all her guests" (Wilde). Aperçu applies to a sketch that ignores details and gives only enough to give a quick impression of the whole; as, "it is one of the most memorable of the striking aperçus which abound in Plato" (J. S. Mill).

Ana. Conspectus, epitome, brief, abstract (see ABRIDGMENT).

compensate, v. 1 Compensate, countervail, balance, offset, counterbalance, counterpoise agree in meaning to make up for that which is excessive, deficient, harmful, or the like, in something else, or to undo the good or evil, benefit or harm, or the like, of something else. One thing compensates another, or for another (or a person compensates a thing for which he is responsible) when the former makes amends for, or supplies a recompense for, whatever has been lost or suffered through the latter; as, "a dramatist like Tourneur can compensate his defects by the intensity of his virtues" (T. S. Eliot); "He has missed a training in criticism, in analysis, in open-mindedness... which no other training can compensate" (H. Ellis); "No other qualities, however brilliant, can compensate for the absence of this quality [truthfulness] in a teacher" (C. W. Eliot); "the relief of seeing Lanning 'settled' would more than compensate for the... drawbacks of the marriage" (E. Wharton). One thing countervails another, or against another, when the former is sufficiently strong, powerful, efficient, or the like, to counteract the influence exerted or the harm or damage done by the latter or suffered in consequence of it; as, "For nought against their wills might countervail" (Spenser); "So shall my credit countervail your shame" (Browning); "Admitting losses, are there countervailing gains?" (Lowes). "The fact... shall, in the absence of strong countervailing testimony, be deemed conclusive evidence" (Lincoln). A countervailing duty is a special and additional tax placed on an import that for some reason or other could otherwise be sold more cheaply than the same article produced at home. One thing balances another, or two (sometimes more) things balance (or balance each other), when both (or all) things are so adjusted that they are equal or properly proportioned, as in numbers, quantity, size, importance, or effectiveness, and the combination is harmonious because no one outweighs the other or others or can exert a harmful influence on the whole; as, in sentencing prisoners, the judge balanced justice and mercy; in the healthy human body the salt intake and the salt loss through excretion balance. "The general tendency to the degradation or dissipation of energy is balanced... by a building-up process in the cell and in the organism" (Inge). "That, like a ground in painting, balances All hues and forms, combining with one tone Whatever lights or shades are on it thrown" (Bridges). One thing offsets another (this and the following terms have no intransitive use) when the former, as the exact opposite of the latter and its equal in importance, in effectiveness, in power, in numbers, or the like, neutralizes the latter's good or evil effect, gain or loss, benefit or harm; as, his loss of thousands of votes from his own party was offset by his gain in independent votes; the disadvantages of the plan are sufficient to offset its clear advantages. "The benefits of favorable climatic environment are oftentimes more than offset by the inconveniences of travel, loneliness, and homesickness" (V. Heiser). One thing counterbalances another when the former serves or is intended to serve to offset an excess, a deficiency, an evil, or the like, in the latter, or, in very precise use, when the former acts as a corrective of any tendency in the latter to loss of equilibrium or proper balance, especially when it, or one of its parts, is subjected to undue pressure, strain, or tension; as, a heavy weight suspended on a cable which is attached to an elevator and passes over a pulley at the top of the shaft serves to counterbalance the increased load when the elevator carries passengers or freight; mine hoists are often operated by the counterbalancing of an ascending and a descending car. One thing counterpoises another when the former provides the equivalent of the latter in weight or value (physical, spiritual, artistic, or the like), and insures the balance of the whole. "They [the boats] were like scales, in which the weight on one side must be counterpoised by a weight in the other" (Jeffries). "The new tower [of Chartres Cathedral] is a little wanting in repose for a tower whose business is to counterpoise the very classic lines of the old one" (H. Adams).

complacent. Complacent, self-complacent, self-satisfied, smug, priggish come into comparison as meaning feeling or showing satisfaction especially in one's own possessions, attainments, accomplishments, or the like. Complacent implies that a feeling of pleasure accompanies this satisfaction: it may suggest merely a sense of well-being that comes from having no complaint to make or, at the other extreme, it may imply gloating over the success of something for which one is in some way or in some degree responsible; as, "Mrs. Baines laughed with the complacent ease of obesity" (Bennett); "Nothing in my brain I bring"—he seems to hymn with a pious and complacent humility his freedom from intellectual baggage" (C. E. Montague); "She glanced complacently at the French wall-paper that reproduced a watered silk" (E. Wharton); "I viewed the peaceful scene complacently, proud of the way I had managed the whole affair" (V. Heiser). Although complacent usually suggests an attitude toward oneself, it does not carry that implication so clearly that there is left no room for doubt. For this reason, self-complacent or self-satisfied is often preferred when an unequivocal or an unambiguous word is desired: self-satisfied always, and self-complacent usually, carries a strong implication either of a comparison made between oneself and others to the great disadvantage of the others, or of a feeling that one can rise no higher. "All nature may be represented as groaning and travelling to produce at last her consummate masterpiece, our noble selves. There is a certain provincialism about this last assumption, characteristic of a self-complacent age" (Inge). "No bandit fierce, no tyrant mad with pride, No cavern'd hermit, rests self-satisfy'd" (Pope). Smug now usually implies a habitual self-satisfaction that arouses in some degree dislike or contempt: in its earliest sense, now rare if not obsolete, it suggested neatness or trimness of appearance, especially but not exclusively of those who are self-respecting or belong to the so-called "respectable" classes. In current use, the term often implies both self-satisfaction and conscious respectability and, less often, it additionally connotes either narrowness or provinciality or a degree of Pharisaism; as, "his worldwide sympathy...with everything but the smug commonplace" (Birrell); "a smug...quality...had crept into that stern piety" (K. L. Bates); "Those late Georgian days which were the smuggest known to fame" (A. Repplier). Priggish, like smug, is difficult to confine to any one sense or to any constant emphasis on certain implications. In current use, however, it commonly connotes either self-satisfaction, self-sufficiency, or self-righteousness, and it usually also suggests either a more or less conscious assumption of one's own superiority or an obvious effort to live up to what one considers one's high principles or one's high ideals; as, a serious, earnest lad who gave many the impression that he was priggish; "Already, in the Essays [of Matthew Arnold], Culture begins to seem a little more priggish...and a little more anaemic" (T. S. Eliot).

Ana. Self-assured, self-confident, self-possessed, assured, confident (see corresponding nouns at CONFIDENCE): conceited, egotistic, egoistic (see corresponding nouns at CONCEIT): *proud, vain, vainglorious (see under PRIDE, n.).

Con. *Humble, modest: diffident, *shy.

complaint. Ailment, *disease, affection, malady, distemper.

complaisant. Obliging, good-natured, *amiable.

Ana. Affable, genial, cordial, *gracious: courteous, courtly, gallant, polite, *civil: *suave, urbane, politic, diplomatic, smooth, bland: agreeable, *pleasant, pleasing.

Ant. Contrary, perverse. — Con. Disagreeable, unpleasant (see affirmative adjectives at PLEASANT): uncongenial, unsympathetic (see INCONSONANT): *cold, chilly, frigid.

✎ Do not confuse complaisant with complacent.

complement, n. Complement, supplement come into comparison both as nouns meaning one thing that makes up for a want or deficiency in another thing and as verbs meaning to supply that which is needed to make up for this want or deficiency. Complement, as here considered, implies a completing: it may suggest such a relation between two things or two groups of things that if they are put together they form a whole, or the full number, amount, or quantity necessary for a given purpose; thus, a grammatical complement is a word or phrase which must be added to a predicate if the latter is to make a definite assertion, as, for example, well in "he feels well," free in "to set him free," of no use in "it proved of no use"; you need two more chairs to complement those you already have in the room. However, the term even more often suggests such disparity in two things that what is supplied by either one is lacking in the other, with the result that their actual or theoretical combination gives a completeness that constitutes or approaches perfection; as, Norman refinement and flexibility are the complement, in the English vocabulary, of its Saxon homeliness and strength; "No adequate conception of the pictorial art of Asia can be attained without taking account of these wonderful works [of Japanese figure painting], complementing, as they do, the philosophic and poetic art which culminated in the Chinese painting of the Sung era" (Binyon). "Shakespeare gives the greatest width of human passion; Dante the greatest altitude and greatest depth. They complement each other" (T. S. Eliot). Supplement implies an addition to something relatively complete, but capable of improvement, enrichment, enhancement, or the like, by such an addition; thus, a supplement to a newspaper (often, a "book supplement," or a "literary supplement") is an additional section which enriches the character of the issue. Usually, the term means exactly this; as, a year of foreign travel is an excellent supplement to a college education; to supplement a work with an index; "the detailed study of history should be supplemented by brilliant outlines" (B. Russell). Sometimes, however, the term carries the implication of needless addition (as, "[of the Orphic and other mysteries in ancient Rome] their real weakness lay in the fact that they were supplements, something tacked on to life, and involved no new vision of the universe"—Buchan); sometimes, on the other hand, it comes pretty close to complement in suggesting essential differences (often in more than two things) and a need of combination if perfection is to be attained (as, "A complete philosophy would find room for all [physics, history, religion with their different valuations of experience] and would show how they supplement each other" (Inge)).

complex, adj. Complex, complicated, intricate, involved, knotty agree in meaning having parts or elements that are more or less confusingly interrelated. That is complex which is made up of so many different interrelated or interacting parts or elements that it requires deep study or expert knowledge to deal with it; as, the complex mechanism of a watch; "Our general failure to grasp the need of knowledge and thought in mastering the complex modern world" (B. Russell). That is complicated which is so complex that it is exceedingly difficult to understand, solve, explain, or the like; as, a complicated problem in mathematics. "His [T. H. Huxley's] descriptions of the most complicated organic structures are astonishingly lucid" (A. Huxley). That is intricate which, because of the intertwining or interlacing of its parts, is perplexing or hard to follow out; as, the intricate tracery of an arabesque. "Nature utilizes the sunshine, the air and the earth as raw materials for creating myriad perfumes, but so intricate are her processes...that man cannot follow precisely in her footsteps" (A. C. Morrison). That is involved in which the parts are, or are thought of as, intertwined, or that return in some fashion upon themselves; the term, therefore, in reference especially to financial affairs, implies extreme complication or disorder; as, the involved patterns of sailors' or heraldic knots; an involved sentence or argument. "At his death...[her husband] had left his affairs dreadfully involved" (Austen). "Public issues are so large and so involved that it is only a few who can hope to have any adequate comprehension of them" (G. L. Dickinson). That is knotty which is not only complicated but is so full of perplexities, difficulties, entanglements, or the like, that understanding or solving seems almost impossible. "That brings up at last the knotty question, what is enough?" (Shaw). The same object may often be regarded from more than one of the above points of view; as, a sailor's knot may be intricate and complicated, as well as involved; a network of railroad tracks may be complicated as well as intricate, though not involved.

Ant. Forwardness. — Con. Obstinacy, stubbornness (see corresponding adjectives at OBSTINATE).

compliant. Compliant, acquiescent, resigned, and their corresponding nouns compliance, acquiescence, resignation, are synonymous only when used in reference to a person, a mood, or a disposition that manifests acceptance, as of another's will or of that which is disagreeable or hard to endure. Compliant always suggests a flexibility or lack of firmness in mood or temper, and frequently implies readiness to accept meekly and without question; as, educational methods that make children compliant; a naturally compliant race. Acquiescent implies acceptance without protest or rebellion; it often also connotes a temperamental lack of self-assertiveness. "The cause of reform slowly went on gaining adherents—most of them...of the acquiescent rather than the militant type" (Grandgent). Resigned usually presupposes a disposition or a temper neither compliant nor acquiescent and implies deliberate, but not necessarily happy, acceptance and resolute forbearance from repining. "He had become resigned to her perpetual lamentation" (Meredith). "Resignation to inevitable evils is the duty of us all" (Austen).

Ana. *Obedient, amenable, tractable, docile: submissive, *tame, subdued: accommodating, conforming, adapting or adaptable (see corresponding verbs at ADAPT).

Ant. Forward. — Con. *Contrary, perverse, balky, restive, wayward: refractory, recalcitrant, *unruly, ungovernable, intractable, willful, headstrong.

complicated. Intricate, involved, *complex, knotty.

Ana. Difficult, arduous, *hard: abstruse, *recondite: perplexing, puzzling, mystifying (see PUZZLE, v.).

Ant. Simple (see EASY). — Con. *Easy, facile, light.

compliment, n. Compliment, flattery, adulation agree in denoting praise addressed directly to a person. A compliment is a courteous expression of commendation, and may be either sincere or merely formal. "In the noble dedication...to the Duchess of Ormond we have an example of Dryden's most polished and magnificent style in elaborate personal compliment" (Gosse). Flattery implies insincerity in compliment or a play upon self-love or vanity by means of artful or obsequious praise. "When one is flagging, a little praise (if it can be had genuine and unadulterated by flattery)...is a cordial" (Scott). "It is better to leave genuine praise unspoken than to expose yourself to the suspicion of flattery" (Shaw).

Adulation adds to flattery the implications of servility or fulsomeness. "He fascinated others into believing him a superior being; feasted his self-esteem on their adulation until it swelled to monstrous proportions" (A. Huxley).

Ana. *Encomium, tribute, panegyric, eulogy: praise, lauding or laudation, extolling or extollation (see corresponding verbs at PRAISE).

Ant. Taunt. — Con. *Affront, insult, indignity: depreciation, disparagement (see corresponding verbs at DECRY): criticism, censure, reprehension, reprobation, denunciation (see corresponding verbs at CRITICIZE).

Con. *Criticize, censure, reprehend, condemn, denounce: *decry, depreciate, disparage.

conplot. Conspiracy, *plot, intrigue, machination, cabal, frame-up.

Ana. See those at CONSPIRACY, 2.

component. Constituent, ingredient, *element, integrant, factor.

Ana. Member, *part, detail, portion, piece: *item, particular.

Ant. Composite: complex. — Con. *Mixture, compound, blend, admixture, amalgam.

comport. 1 Acquit, quit, demean, *behave, conduct, deport.

2 Accord, conform, *agree, square, harmonize, correspond, tally, jibe.

compose. Compose, consist of, consist in, comprise, constitute are confused rather than synonymous terms. All involve the idea of making up or forming a complex whole, but they vary greatly in the subjects which they take when the verb is used in the active voice and in the sense (sometimes the voice) of "form" or "make up" that is expressed in the term. Compose, the most generally useful of these words, has two major senses. The first and most common sense is to form, fashion, or construct by putting together two or more things so as to produce a new and unified thing. In this sense, the term no longer, except in the passive forms, implies construction out of material or objective substances (as, "Were it a casque composed by Vulcan's skill, My sword should bite it"—Shak.; concrete is composed of cement, sand, and gravel mixed with water): the emphasis is now on intellectual labor and the term often connotes exercise of imagination and taste (as, to compose a novel or a sonata; he is at work composing his sermon). In its second major sense, and the one most closely relating it to the other terms in this group, compose takes a plural subject (sometimes a collective noun) and means to go together to form or make up the thing named by the object; as, "See worlds on worlds compose one universe" (Pope); "the people who compose these [American] Indian political communities have always been treated as foreigners" (Ch. Just. Taney); "a principle which so entirely pervades the constitution, is so intermixed with the materials which compose it" (Ch. Just. Marshall). The passive in this sense is often indistinguishable from that of the first sense, except that it more often suggests analysis than construction; as, "the elements of which human nature is composed" (G. L. Dickinson). Consist (etymologically, to stand still or firm) comes into comparison with the other verbs (which are transitive) only in its forms consist of and consist in. The former is equal in its meaning to the passive of compose and, sometimes, like the latter word, implies previous construction or formation and sometimes only existence and capacity for analysis, and not a bringing into being; as, concrete consists of cement, sand, and gravel, mixed with water; "your army, which doth most consist of war-mark'd footmen" (Shak.); coke consists mainly of carbon; his estate consists of several pieces of real property and of a very large amount of personal property; "Newton imagined light to consist of particles darted out from luminous bodies" (J. Tyndall). Consist in, on the other hand, means to have something lying in it, residing in it, or inhering in it, as its essential nature, substance, foundation, or cause; as, "pretty much all law consists in forbidding men to do some things they want to do" (Justice Holmes); "It is in the failure to grasp this that the human tragedy has often consisted" (H. Ellis); "There is a large part of critical writing which consists in 'interpreting' an author, a work" (T. S. Eliot). Comprise (which is etymologically a doublet of comprehend, to grasp, to seize) is no longer a close synonym of comprehend (see under UNDERSTAND, INCLUDE, APPREHEND), although in precise use it usually carries some of the implications of comprehend. In its currently leading senses, comprise is a synonym either of compose (in the sense of to go together to make up a thing) or of consist of. Whether the subject is a plural noun naming the parts, elements, factors, etc., or a singular noun naming the whole made up of such parts, elements, factors, etc., comprise in careful use always differs from compose and consist of in carrying no suggestion or little suggestion of things put together and an obvious implication of an inclusion in, or a covering by, or a taking in by the whole that is designated; as, the district comprises three counties and part of a fourth; "If one short volume could comprise All that was witty, learned, and wise" (Swift); "It was these last words that proved to Joseph that the ringlets and bracelets did not comprise the whole of this young man's soul" (G. Moore); "It is music that moulds the manners and customs that are comprised under ceremony" (H. Ellis); "In the case of stories...reread in later years, my present recollection, comprises only what lingers from the first reading" (Grandgent). Constitute, as here considered, may be used either with a singular or a plural subject in the sense of to go into the construction, makeup, nature, or character of a thing as its (or one of its) components or constituents; as, "the greater number of the couples constituting New York society" (E. Wharton); "flogging on weekdays and sermons on Sundays do not constitute the ideal technique for the production of virtue" (B. Russell); "that mysterious remoteness which constituted half her fascination" (Galsworthy).

Ana. *Make, fabricate, fashion, form: create, *invent. composed. Collected, *cool, unruffled, imperturbable, nonchalant.

Ana. Quiet, *still: serene, placid, tranquil, *calm: sedate, staid, *serious: repressed, suppressed (see SUPPRESS).

Ant. Reveal. — Con. Disclose, discover, divulge, betray (see REVEAL): expose, exhibit, display, *show, parade, flaunt: manifest, evidence, *show, evince.

concede. 1 *Grant, allow.

Ana. Admit, *acknowledge: waive, cede (see RELINQUISH).

Ant. Dispute. — Con. Argue, debate, *discuss, agitate. 2 *Grant, vouchsafe, accord, award.

Ana. *Yield, submit: surrender, resign, cede, *relinquish.

Ant. Deny (something to somebody). — Con. Refuse (see DECLINE).

conceit. Conceit, egotism, egotism, self-esteem, self-love, amour-propre agree in meaning an attitude of regarding oneself with favor. Conceit implies a conviction of one's superiority in one or more lines of achievement or an overweeningly favorable opinion of one's powers or accomplishments. It often, but not necessarily, connotes a failure to see oneself truly, or an offensive, bumptious manner. "To have lost the godlike conceit that we may do what we will, and not to have acquired a homely zest for doing what we can, shows a...mind that...for-swears compromise" (Hardy). "Conceit may puff a man up, but never prop him up" (Ruskin). Egotism (hence also egotist) stresses the tendency to make oneself, one's thoughts, one's deeds, etc., the object of others' notice, as by making them the leading topic of conversation or by attracting attention to them in any way. "He [Samuel Butler] was...an egotist bitten with self-distrust, concealing his wounds in self-assertion and his hesitations in an external aggressiveness" (S. P. Sherman). The word may or may not imply contempt for others' interests or opinions. "A man and a boy of ten are perhaps better company than a man and a boy of fifteen. There's so much less egotism between them" (H. G. Wells). Egoism (hence also egoist) emphasizes concentration on oneself, one's interests, one's needs, or the like. It seldom suggests a tendency to display oneself or to attract attention to oneself; but it commonly implies self-interest, especially as opposed to altruism, or interest in others, as the inner spring of one's acts or as the measure by which all things are judged. "She preferred to be herself, with the egoism of women!" (Meredith). "Mrs. Fyne brushed them [appeals to her compassion] aside, with the semi-conscious egoism of all safe, established existences" (Conrad). Self-esteem implies a proper and balanced pride in oneself. "Oftentimes nothing profits more Than self-esteem, grounded on just and right" (Milton). "Love, Hope, and Self-esteem, like clouds depart And come, for some uncertain moments lent" (Shelley). Self-love usually implies an abnormal regard for oneself that excludes all other interests or affections. On the other hand, it occasionally designates that degree of love for oneself or interest in one's well-being which is the proper and necessary complement of one's love for others. "But 'tis not easy with a mind like ours... To bid the pleadings of Self-love be still" (Cowper). "Self-love but serves the virtuous mind to wake, As the small pebble stirs the peaceful lake... Friends, parent, neighbour, first it will embrace; His country next; and next all human race" (Pope). Amour-propre, which is the French equivalent for self-love, in English use (possibly because of a misinterpretation of propre) comes closer to self-esteem, for it stresses pride, usually pardonable pride, in oneself. It is therefore used when the idea of sensitiveness to others' opinions is indicated. "The amour propre of the French people had been outraged" (Holt & Chillon). "She flattered his amour propre by asking that from his generosity, which she could have taken as a right" (C. Reade). Ana. *Pride, vanity, vainglory: arrogance, superciliousness, insolence (see corresponding adjectives at PROUD): complacency, smugness, griggishness (see corresponding adjectives at COMPLACENT).

Ant. Humility. — Con. Humbleness, modesty, meekness, lowliness (see corresponding adjectives at HUMBLE): diffidence, shyness, bashfulness (see corresponding adjectives at SHY).

conceive. *Think, imagine, fancy, realize, envisage, envision.

Ana. *Consider, revolve, excogitate: speculate, cogitate, *think: *ponder, ruminate, meditate.

concentrate, v. *Compact, consolidate, unify.

Ana. *Gather, collect, assemble: mass, *heap, pile:

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

fix, *fasten, attach: engross, *monopolize, absorb.
Ant. Dissipate. — Con. Disperse, dispel, *scatter: dilute, *thin, attenuate, extenuate, rarefy: *distribute, divide, dispense, deal.

concentration. Application, *attention, study.

Ana. Intentness, raptness, engrossment, absorption (see corresponding adjectives at INTENT).

Ant. Distraction.

concept. *Idea, conception, notion, thought, impression.

Con. Percept, image, *sensation.

conception. Concept, *idea, thought, notion, impression.

Ana. *Opinion, view, belief, conviction, persuasion, sentiment: theory, *hypothesis.

concern, v. Concern, affect are sometimes confused.

Concern implies the bearing or influence, affect, the direct operation or action, of one thing on another; as, a piece of legislation may concern (that is, have to do with, have reference or relation to) certain vested interests without affecting them (that is, producing an effect upon them, changing them in any way).

Ana. *Bear, pertain, appertain, apply, relate, belong: influence, sway, *affect, touch.

concern, n. 1 *Affair, business, matter, thing.

2 Solicitude, *care, anxiety, worry.

Ana. Thoughtfulness, considerateness or consideration, attentiveness or attention (see corresponding adjectives at THOUGHTFUL).

Ant. Unconcern. — Con. Indifference, aloofness, incuriousness, disinterestedness (see corresponding adjectives at INDIFFERENT).

concerned. Solicitous, careful, anxious, worried. See under CARE, n.

Ana. Engrossed, absorbed, *intent: impressed, affected, influenced, touched (see AFFECT, v.): troubled, distressed (see TROUBLE, v.).

Ant. Unconcerned. — Con. *Indifferent, incurious, aloof, detached: uninterested, *disinterested: *negligent, neglectful, remiss.

concerning. Regarding, respecting, *about, anent.

concert, v. *Negotiate, arrange.

Ana. *Discuss, debate, argue: concur, co-operate, *unite, conjoin, combine: conspire, collude, *connive.

concession. *Allowance.

Ana. Favor, boon, *gift: indulgence, leniency, tolerance, forbearance (see under FORBEARING).

conciliate. *Pacify, appease, placate, propitiate, mollify.

Ana. Arbitrate, adjudicate (see JUDGE, v.): mediate, intervene (see INTERPOSE): persuade, prevail on or upon (see INDUCE): calm, tranquilize (see corresponding adjectives at CALM): adjust, accommodate, reconcile, *adapt.

Ant. Antagonize. — Con. *Estrange, alienate, disaffect: *provoke, excite, stimulate, pique: *incite, foment.

concise. Concise, terse, succinct, laconic, summary, pithy, compendious agree in meaning briefly stated or presented or given to or manifesting brevity in statement or expression. A person is concise who speaks or writes briefly: a thing is concise that is brief because all superfluities have been removed and all elaboration avoided; as, a concise report; "I hadn't known Jane spoke so well. She has a clever, coherent way of making her points, and is concise in reply if questioned" (R. Macaulay). A thing (now rarely a person) is terse that is both concise and finished: the word implies both pointedness and elegance; as, "pure, terse, elegant Latin" (John Edwards); "His [Dante's] verse... has the terseness and edge of steel" (J. R. Lowell); a terse style; "And where [other than in the poetry of Pope], in fine, in all our English verse, A style more trenchant and a sense more terse" (Dobson); "it is a relief to come to a diction that is frequently crisp, and incisive, and terse" (Lowes). A person or thing is succinct that compresses or is marked by compression into the smallest possible space: the term suggests great compactness and the use of no more words than are necessary; as, a succinct writer; "A strict and succinct style is that, where you can take away nothing without loss, and that loss to be manifest" (B. Jonson); "Dryden imported a trimmer and succincter dress" (Landor); "A book must have a title, and to-day it must have a succinct title; therefore this book appears as Richelieu" (Belloc). A person or thing is laconic that is characterized by such succinctness as to seem curt, brusque, unperturbed, mystifying, or the like; as, "This laconic fool makes brevity ridiculous" (Davenant); "I cannot exactly say with Caesar, 'Veni, vidi, vici': however, the most important part of his laconic account of success applies to my present situation" (Byron); "[Diary entries] Bare and laconic; yet those first days had been crammed... with feelings, ideas, and discoveries" (Jan Struther). A thing (rarely, if ever, a person in this sense) is summary that presents only the bare outlines or the main points without details; as, a summary account of the year's events under a few main headings: the term often suggests almost rude curtness or extreme generality; as, "the terms I use here are exceedingly summary. You may interpret the word 'salvation' in any way you like" (W. James); "her diary and her letters continued to be mainly the swift and summary record of crowded and delightful days" (H. Ellis). A thing (less often a person) is pithy that is not only terse or succinct but full of substance and meaning, and therefore especially forcible or telling; as, pithy epigrams; "In all these particulars [he] was very short but pithy" (Addison); "the displacement of the long-drawn-out epic similes by... pithy and succinct comparisons" (Lowes); "His speech was blacksmith-sparked and pithy" (Masefield). That is compendious which is concise, summary, and weighted with matter: it is applied to a type of treatment that distinguishes the typical compendium; as, a compendious account of the Reformation; a compendious style; "The compendious scholarly words which save so much trouble" (T. E. Brown).

Ana. Condensed, compressed (see CONTRACT, v.): compacted, concentrated (see COMPACT, v.): abridged, abbreviated, shortened (see SHORTEN): *brief, short.

Ant. Redundant. — Con. Prolix, diffuse, verbose, *wordy.

conclude. 1 *Close, finish, terminate, end, complete.

Ant. Open. — Con. Commence, *begin, start, initiate, inaugurate.

2 Judge, gather, *infer, deduce.

Ana. Reason, speculate (see THINK): *conjecture, surmise, guess.

concluding, adj. *Last, final, terminal, latest, ultimate, extreme.

Ana. Closing, terminating, ending, finishing, completing (see CLOSE, v.).

Ant. Opening. — Con. Beginning, commencing, starting, initiating or initial, inaugurating or inaugural (see corresponding verbs at BEGIN).

conclusion. Judgment, deduction, inference. See under INFER.

conclusive. Conclusive, decisive, determinative, definitive come into comparison when they mean having or manifesting qualities that bring something to a finish or end. Conclusive applies most frequently to an argument, evidence, reasoning, or the like, that is irrefutable or so convincing that it compels certainty or certitude and puts an end to all question or debate concerning a matter; as, the proof that the signature was not forged gives conclusive evidence of the authenticity of the will. "There is one very convincing text which so strongly supports the tradition that it seems conclusive" (Belloc). Decisive (as here considered: see also DECIDED) applies mainly to acts, events, influences, arguments, and the like, that put an end to fighting, to a controversy or competition, to vacillation, to uncertainty, to indefiniteness of course, or the like: it often comes close in meaning to critical; as, the decisive battle of the war had not yet been fought; "The decisive word about Lessing [in the controversy regarding Lessing's claim to fame] was really uttered by Goethe: We may, he said, have another intelligence like Lessing, but we shall wait long before seeing another such character" (Babbitt). Determinative applies especially to decisions, judgments, operative causes, influences, and the like, which put an end to uncertainty, wavering, fluctuation, etc., and serve to give a fixed direction, goal, or character to a life, a course, a movement, etc.; as, "Incidents...determinative of their course" (I. Taylor); the determinative cause of the country's decision to take part in the war; the determinative influence in shaping his career. Definitive, which is often opposed to tentative and, sometimes, to provisional, applies to anything which is put forth as final and as serving to make further questioning, dispute, uncertainty, or experiment needless, or to put an end to an unsettled state or condition where temporary measures have been necessary; as, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are definitive; a definitive treaty; a definitive edition of an author's work (i.e., one that claims to have said the last word on all textual problems). "Not until there is a settled and definitive world order can there be such a thing as a settled and definitive version of human history" (A. Huxley). "Jefferson in these dawning days of his power...is ineffably happy over the triumph of his principles and the definitive acceptance of his political philosophy" (C. G. Bowers).

Ana. Convincing, telling, cogent (see VALID): *certain, inevitable, necessary, apodictic.

Ant. Inconclusive. — Con. *Doubtful, dubious, questionable, problematic: *theoretical, speculative, academic: *plausible, credible, specious.

concomitant, adj. Coincident, concurrent, synchronous, simultaneous, contemporaneous, *contemporary, coeval.

Ana. Attending or attendant, accompanying (see corresponding verbs at ACCOMPANY): associated, connected, related, linked (see JOIN).

Con. Antecedent, *preceding, foregoing, previous, precedent: following, succeeding, ensuing (see FOLLOW).

concomitant, n. *Accompaniment.

concord. *Harmony, consonance, accord.

Ana. Agreement, concurrence, coincidence (see corresponding verbs at AGREE): peacefulness or peace, tranquillity, serenity, placidity, calmness (see corresponding adjectives at CALM): amity, comity, good will, *friendship.

Ant. Discord. — Con. Strife, conflict, dissension, contention, variance (see DISCORD): dissonance, discordance (see under DISSONANT).

concordat. Covenant, compact, pact, treaty, entente, convention, cartel, *contract, bargain, indenture, mise.

concrete, adj. Specific, particular, individual, *special, especial, respective.

Ana. Tangible, palpable, *perceptible, sensible: *material, physical, corporeal, objective.

Ant. Abstract. — Con. Ideal, transcendental, transcendent (see ABSTRACT): intangible, impalpable, *imperceptible, insensible: general, generic, *universal. concupiscence. *Desire, appetite, appétence, lust, passion, urge, yen.

Ana. Longing, yearning, pining, hungering or hunger, thirsting or thirst (see corresponding verbs at LONG): coveting, craving (see DESIRE, v.).

Con. *Will, volition.

concur. 1 Conjoin, *unite, combine, co-operate.

Ana. Accord, harmonize, *agree, jibe: *conduce, contribute, redound.

2 *Agree, coincide.

Ana. Consent, *assent, accede, acquiesce, agree: collude, conspire, *connive.

Ant. Contend: altercate. — Con. Fight, battle, war (see CONTENT): quarrel, wrangle (see under QUARREL, n.): dispute, debate, argue (see DISCUSS).

concurrent. Coincident, simultaneous, synchronous, concomitant, contemporaneous, *contemporary, coeval.

concussion. Shock, percussion, *impact, impingement, collision, clash, jar, jolt, brunt.

Ana. Beating, pounding, buffeting (see BEAT, v.): striking, smiting, swatting, slapping (see STRIKE, v.).

condemn. 1 Denounce, censure, blame, reprobate, reprehend, *criticize.

Ana. *Judge, adjudge: *decry, belittle, depreciate, disparage: *disapprove, deprecate.

Con. *Commend, applaud, compliment: *praise, laud, extol, acclaim, eulogize: condone, *excuse, pardon, forgive.

2 *Sentence, doom, damn, proscribe, attain.

Con. *Free, release, liberate, discharge: acquit, absolve, exonerate, *exculpate, vindicate: *rescue, redeem, save, deliver.

condense. *Contract, shrink, compress, constrict, deflate.

Ana. Abridge, abbreviate, *shorten, curtail: reduce, diminish, *decrease: *compact, concentrate, consolidate.

Ant. Amplify (a speech, article, etc.). — Con. *Expand, swell, distend, dilate, inflate.

condescend. *Stoop, deign.

Ana. Favor, accommodate, *oblige: vouchsafe, concede, *grant.

Ant. Presume.

condign. *Due, rightful.

Ana. Just, equitable, *fair: merited, deserved (see corresponding nouns at DUE).

condition, n. *State, situation, mode, posture, status, estate.

Ana. Circumstance, *occurrence, event: occasion, antecedent, *cause: *phase, aspect, side, facet, angle.

conditional. *Dependent, contingent, relative, adjective.

Ana. Problematical, questionable (see DOUBTFUL): *provisional, tentative: subject, prone, *liable, open: *accidental, fortuitous, incidental.

Ant. Unconditional.

condolence. Sympathy, *pity, commiseration, compassion, ruth, empathy, bowels.

Ana. Consoling or consolation, solacing or solace, comforting (see corresponding verbs at COMFORT).

Con. Felicitation, congratulation (see corresponding verbs at FELICITATE).

condone. *Excuse, forgive, pardon, remit.

Ana. Disregard, overlook, forget, ignore (see NEGLECT, v.): *exculpate, absolve, acquit.

Con. *Punish, chastise, discipline, castigate, correct: condemn, denounce, censure, reprobate, reprehend (see CRITICIZE): *disapprove, deprecate.

conduce. Conduce, contribute, redound, accrue are not close synonyms but they bear in common the meaning to serve as an effective aid or impetus. Only that which in itself tends toward a certain result or has a capacity for furthering some aim can conduce or lead to an end, usually an inevitable or desired end. "The people have an original right to establish...such principles as...shall most conduce to their own happiness" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "To divert interest from the poet to the poetry... would conduce to a juster estimation of actual poetry, good and bad" (T. S. Eliot). Only that which with other agencies effects a result can contribute, or share in leading, to an end or consequence; as, low wages and high prices contributed to popular discontent. Only that which has consequences which in turn affect the agent or those with whom he is associated can redound, or flow back, to his or their advantage or disadvantage, or credit or discredit. "Seekers often make mistakes, and I wish mine to redound to my own discredit only, and not to touch Oxford" (Arnold). Only that which in itself represents or effects a gain can accrue, or come by way of increase, to one for one's profit or advantage; as, advantages accruing to society from the freedom of the press. "A trifling percentage of this value accruing to the inventor... may make him a millionaire" (J. A. Hobson).

Ana. Further, promote, forward, *advance: *help, aid, assist: lead, *guide: effect, accomplish, achieve, fulfill (see PERFORM).

Ant. Ward (off). — Con. *Prevent, preclude, obviate, avert: *hinder, impede, obstruct, block: *arrest, interrupt, check: interfere (see INTERPOSE).

conduct, n. *Behavior, deportment.

Ana. Act, deed, *action: demeanor, mien, deportment, manner, *bearing.

conduct, v. 1 Escort, convoy, *accompany, attend, chaperon.

Ana. *Guide, lead: convey, transmit, *carry.

Manage, which literally means to train a horse so that it can be ridden or driven with ease or grace, in its now ordinary sense usually implies the handling, manipulating, or maneuvering of a person or persons or a thing or things so as to bring about a response or submission to one's wishes or attempts to use, guide, lead, or command (as, he manages the sailboat admirably; he cannot manage himself, so how can he be expected to manage others; to manage a refractory child; "the boy... could not yet manage his 'r's' and 'th's' aright"—Kipling; "the first condition for an artist in glass is to know how to manage blue"—Viollet-le-Duc, trans. by H. Adams; "[the prince's] choice of [dancing] partners, which seemed so spontaneous, was often managed"—V. Heiser). But manage is also often used to imply the action of one who is in authority and charged with the handling of groups of employees, or of all the details of a business or industry or of one of its departments, or of any complex or intricate system or organization; as, he manages a theater; to manage the financial affairs of the company; to manage a chain of restaurants. Control originally meant to check one thing by another, especially one register or account by a duplicate register or account. This sense is now comparatively rare except in science (thus, a controlled experiment is one that is checked or verified by counter or parallel experiments) but the idea of keeping within the bounds of what is correct, essential, proper, or the like, still prevails, with the result that the term usually implies a regulation or a restraining by getting or keeping the upper hand; as, "no attempt was made... to control by public authority the production and distribution of wealth" (G. L. Dickinson); "in order to make its highways most useful, the business traffic upon them must be controlled" (Justice Holmes); "the capitalist system... became a sort of blind monster which neither we nor the capitalists could control" (Shaw); "It was apparently regarded as impossible to root out bad desires; all we could do was to control them" (B. Russell). Sometimes, however, control implies little more than domination or the complete subjection of the dominated person or thing to one's will; as, he has learned to control himself (or his emotions); "The struggle between two strong-willed women to control one weak-willed man is the usual motive of the French drama in the nineteenth century" (H. Adams). Direct (as here considered: see also COMMAND; DIRECT, 1; DIRECT, 2) implies a regulation of the activities, as of a group of persons, or of the course or courses which they follow: it carries no suggestion of a desire or aim to dominate, but of an intent or purpose to keep the persons or things involved straight, well organized, or properly administered; as, the president and trustees direct the affairs of the institution; the architect directed the building of the bank; the principal directs the teachers, pupils, and janitors who make up the organization of his school.

Ana. Supervise, oversee (see corresponding nouns at OVERSIGHT): *govern, rule: engineer, pilot, steer, lead (see GUIDE, v.): operate, work, function (see ACT, v.).

3 Demean, deport, *behave, comport, acquit, quit.

confederacy, confederation. Federation, coalition, fusion, *alliance, league.

confederate, n. 1 *Partner, copartner, colleague, ally. Ana., Ant., & Con. See those at ALLY.

2 Confederate, conspirator, accessory (or accessary), abettor (or abetter), accomplice. As used in law these words all convey the idea of complicity or common guilt in a wrongful act. Confederate is the general term applied to any person who in conjunction with others intentionally contributes to the commission of an unlawful act, whether the act be a crime or a civil injury, as a tort. For civil joint wrongdoers the specific term is conspirator. An accessory is neither the chief actor (principal) in an offense nor a person present at its performance, but one who accedes to or becomes involved in its guilt, by some act either previous or subsequent, as of instigating, encouraging, aiding, or concealing, etc. In treason or misdemeanors no distinction is made between an accessory and a principal. An abettor is one who is actually or constructively present at the commission of the deed and contributes to it by moral or physical force. An accomplice is one who with criminal intent participates in the commission of an offense, whether as principal, abettor, or accessory. Legal usage does not recognize the distinction made by laymen between principal and accomplice.

confer. 1 Bestow, present, *give, donate, afford.

Ana. Accord, award, vouchsafe, *grant.

2 Confer, commune, consult, advise, parley, treat, negotiate are synonyms when they are used intransitively and bear the meaning to carry on a conversation or discussion, especially in order to reach a decision or settlement. Their derivative nouns of action also manifest the same likenesses and differences in meaning. Confer implies comparison of views or opinions, and, as a rule, equality in those participating in the discussion, or conference; as, the executives confer weekly about important business affairs. "The Dauphin and his train Approacheth, to confer about some matter" (Shak.). Commune, once a close synonym of confer, now is rare in this sense. "We were communing on important matters" (Walpole). In current use, it implies spiritual intercourse (or communion), as in prayer or meditation, or in a close union of minds and spirits. "There, sitting on the ground, the two [mother and child] would commune with each other by the hour" (Hudson). Consult adds to confer the implication of seeking or taking counsel; as, the president will not make his reply to the ambassador until he has consulted with the cabinet; the doctors will hold a consultation tomorrow. Advise often is not clearly distinguishable from consult, except that it is more suitable for use regarding personal matters on which one seeks advice; as, before he makes his decision, he will advise with his friends. Parley, treat, and negotiate all imply conference for the sake of settling differences or of coming to an agreement on terms. Parley stresses the talk involving the discussion of terms. "They are at hand, To parley or to fight" (Shak.). Treat adds to parley the implication either of a common will to adjust differences or of the need of diplomacy; as, the warring nations were ready to treat for peace. Negotiate implies compromise or bargaining; as, after the preliminaries were over, they proceeded to negotiate; a treaty is usually an agreement reached by negotiation.

Ana. Converse, talk, *speak: *discuss, debate, argue.

conference. Convocation, council, synod, *convention, congress.

confess. 1 Avow, *acknowledge, admit, own.

Ana. *Grant, concede, allow: disclose, divulge, *reveal, discover: *declare, proclaim, publish.

Ant. Renounce (one's beliefs, principles, etc.).

2 Confess, shrive, absolve, remit are often misused in their technical religious senses. All of them imply as agent (and, therefore, take as subject in the active voice) a priest performing his sacerdotal function as confessor in the sacrament of penance. A priest confesses, or shrives, when he listens to a penitent's avowal (or confession) of sins and when, if assured of the latter's contrition and desire for amendment, he pronounces the forgiveness of these sins. Shrive is now found only in literary use; confess, because of its more common application to the act of the penitent, is often avoided except in its derivative form confessor, which is always used of the priest. A priest absolves when as the final act in confessing, or shriving, he pronounces absolution, or the words imparting forgiveness of sins. Remit (see also excuse) takes only sin or sins for its object; to remit sin(s) is an elliptical expression meaning to remit the eternal punishment merited by a person for his sins. In the doctrine of churches accepting sacramental confession, the real agent (remitter) is Christ, and the priest serves as his instrument. Remission of sins is therefore the effect of absolution.

confession. *Creed, symbol, catechism.

confidant. Intimate, *friend, acquaintance.

Ana. Comrade, crony, chum, pal, companion (see ASSOCIATE, n.).

confide. Entrust, *commit, consign, relegate.

Ana. Bestow, present, *give: *grant, vouchsafe, accord, award.

confidence. 1 *Trust, reliance, dependence, faith.

Ana. Certitude, assurance, conviction, *certainty: credence, credit, *belief, faith.

Ant. Doubt: apprehension. — Con. *Distrust, mistrust: despair, hopelessness (see under DESPONDENT).

2 Confidence, self-confidence, assurance, self-assurance, self-possession, aplomb come into comparison as denoting either a state of mind free from diffidence, misgivings, or embarrassment, or the easy, cool, or collected bearing or behavior resulting from this attitude.

Confidence stresses faith in oneself and in one's powers; it does not as a rule imply conceit nor preclude the suggestions of support from external agencies or influences or of modest recognition of that assistance. "Far better that the task should be entrusted to one who had . . . a sincere confidence in his power of dealing with the difficulties of the situation" (A. C. Benson). "The confidence that springs from complete mastery of his subject" (Grandgent). When self-sufficiency is connoted, self-confidence is preferable to confidence; as, "he has the self-confidence of one who has made money" (Shaw); "in extreme youth one has to be second-hand . . . one lacks self-confidence" (R. Macaulay). Assurance is distinguishable from confidence only by its far stronger implication of certainty and its frequent suggestion of arrogance; thus, one meets a situation with confidence when one's belief in one's powers is strong, but with assurance when one never questions the outcome or the rightness of what one is saying or doing. "There was indeed in the personality of that little old lady the tremendous force of accumulated decision—the inherited assurance of one whose prestige had never been questioned" (Galsworthy). "No experience so far served to reveal the whole offensiveness of the man's assurance" (M. Austin). Self-assurance is often preferred to assurance when the attitude, bearing, or behavior are obtruded on one's attention; as, his self-assurance has been a bar to his getting a good position. Self-possession implies that ease or coolness arising from command over one's powers; it connotes, usually, controlled but not repressed emotions and actions, or speech free from flurry and appropriate to the situation. "She was rather afraid of the self-possession of the Morels, father and all . . . It was a cool, clear atmosphere, where everyone was himself, and in harmony" (D. H. Lawrence). Aplomb describes the behavior or, less often, the bearing, of one whose assurance (real or assumed) or self-assurance is conspicuously, but not necessarily disagreeably, manifest; as, "ignoring with admirable aplomb the fact that we are tardy" (Lowes). "It is native personality, and that alone, that endows a man to stand before presidents and generals . . . with aplomb" (Whitman).

Ana. *Courage, resolution, mettle, spirit, tenacity: self-reliance, reliance (see corresponding adjectives at RELIANT).

Ant. Diffidence. — Con. Modesty, bashfulness, shyness (see corresponding adjectives at SHY): misgiving, *apprehension.

confident. Confident, assured, sanguine, sure are here compared only as applied to a person, or to his temperament, looks, manner, acts, utterances, and the like, and as meaning not inhibited by doubts, fears, or a sense of inferiority. Confident may or may not imply a strong belief in oneself or one's powers, but it nearly always implies freedom from fear of failure, frustration, or attack and, as a corollary, certitude of success, fulfillment, or approval. As a rule, it is not a depreciative term, and often is complimentary; as, his voice was manly and confident; "the happy and joyous temper, which characterizes a fresh and confident faith" (Inge). "Do you grapple the task that comes your way With a confident, easy mind?" (E. Guest). Assured suggests the absence of any question in one's mind as to whether one is right or wrong, secure or insecure in one's position, likely to fail or to succeed, and the like; it may also imply certitude of one's rightness, security, success, but this is not one of its consistent or emphatic implications; as, "talking with assured authority about places we have not visited, plays we have not seen" (Lucas); "the assured gaze of one who is accustomed to homage" (Bennett); "she had the casual, assured way of speaking" (T. Wolfe). Sanguine implies a greater measure of optimism than confident, sometimes suggesting this as a weakness rather than as a virtue; it often also connotes other qualities suggestive of vigorous health, such as cheerfulness, ardor, or the like. "Mr. Britling's thoughts were quick and sanguine and his actions even more eager than his thoughts" (H. G. Wells). "If the Liberals expect quick results, they are too sanguine, for the love of truth is not very common" (Inge). "Sanguine and very susceptible to flattery, Haydon was always ready to believe that the smallest stroke of good fortune must be the herald of complete success" (A. Huxley). Sure implies that one's freedom from doubts or fears is the consequence of certainty or of complete confidence in one's skill, rather than of temperament or health. The word also often connotes a steady and disciplined mind, mental or emotional stability, or unfailing accuracy; as, a sure scholar; a sure craftsman; a sure thinker; "As he is slow he is sure" (Steele). Sure is applicable also to any part of the body equipped to do a certain kind of work under the control of the brain, or to the work itself; thus, a sure hand works with unflinching skill and accuracy; sure feet pick their way fearlessly over slippery rocks; a sure eye is necessary for a sure aim; hence, a pianist's sureness of touch; "the sure rhythm of their tiny moccasined feet" (Cather).

Ana. Courageous, intrepid, *brave, bold, dauntless, undaunted, valiant: positive, certain, *sure: self-reliant, *reliant.

Ant. Apprehensive: diffident. — Con. *Fearful, afraid: nervous, uneasy, jittery (see IMPATIENT): *shy, bashful, modest: dubious, *doubtful.

confidential. Close, intimate, *familiar, chummy, thick.

Ana. Privy, *secret: trusty, tried, trustworthy (see RELIABLE).

configuration. Conformation, figure, shape, *form, Gestalt.

Ana. *Outline, contour, silhouette, profile, skyline.

confine, n. Bound, bourn, *limit, end, term.

Ana. *Boundary, border, frontier, march: verge, edge, *border: *circumference, periphery, compass.

confine, v. Circumscribe, *limit, restrict.

Ana. Bind, *tie: *restrain, curb, inhibit, check: *hamper, trammel, fetter, shackle, hog-tie, manacle: *imprison, incarcerate, immure, intern, jail.

confirm. 1 *Ratify.

Ana. *Assent (to), consent (to), acquiesce (in), accede (to), subscribe (to): validate (see CONFIRM, 2): sanction, *approve, endorse.

Con. Reject, refuse, *decline.

2 Confirm, corroborate, substantiate, verify, authenticate, validate agree in meaning to attest to the truth, genuineness, accuracy, or validity of something. Confirm and corroborate are both used in reference to that which is doubtful or not yet proved. Confirm, however, usually implies the resolving of all doubts, as by an authoritative statement or by indisputable facts; as, the president confirmed the rumor of Bryan's appointment as secretary of state; his failure to pay his debts confirmed their suspicion that he was not to be trusted. "It was expectation exquisitely gratified, superabundantly confirmed" (H. James). Corroborate suggests particularly the strengthening of one statement or piece of evidence by another; as, the bystanders corroborated his story. "Having considered the evidence given by the plays themselves . . . let us now inquire what corroboration can be gained from other testimony" (Johnson). Substantiate presupposes something to be demonstrated or proved and implies the offering of evidence sufficient to sustain the contention or to create a strong presumption in its favor; as, they were able to substantiate their claim to the property when the long-lost deed was found; Darwin spent nearly a lifetime in gathering evidence to substantiate his theory of the origin of species. Verify has for its distinctive implication the established correspondence of the actual facts or details to those that are given in an account, a statement, or the like. When that which is in question is a suspicion, a fear, a probability, or the like, it can be verified only in the result, event, or fulfillment; as, the prediction of a severe storm was verified in every detail. "It [faith] begins as a resolution to stand or fall by the noblest hypothesis. . . ; but it is verified progressively as we go on" (Inge). In its more common current sense, verify implies a deliberate effort to establish the accuracy or truth of something by putting it to a test such as a comparison with ascertainable facts, an original, or a series of control experiments; as, to verify all the citations in a book; statements of accounts due are not sent out until they are verified; the careful scientist verifies every step in an experiment; "I do not think that they [my opinions] are such as can either be verified or refuted by scholars" (T. S. Eliot). Authenticate presupposes question of a thing's genuineness or validity, and therefore implies a demonstration of either of these by one in a position to know or to determine, such as an expert or the proper authority; as, the collector refused to purchase the manuscript until it had been authenticated by experts; the bank authenticated the signatures on the note. Validate is now more often used than authenticate when applied to legal papers requiring an official signature or seal before becoming valid; as, to validate a passport or a contract. It is, however, also used when the soundness of a judgment, of a belief, of a policy, or the like, is in question; as, "the expansion of demand which alone can validate the policy" (J. A. Hobson); he validated his conclusion when he demonstrated that his facts and his reasoning were correct in every detail. Validate is also used in reference to the election of a candidate for office when all the returns are in and the result is officially confirmed; as, the mayor's election will not be validated until there has been a recount of the votes. Ana. *Support, uphold, back: vouch for, attest, *certify.

Ant. Contradict. — Con. Gainsay, *deny, traverse, impugn, contravene, negative: confute, refute, controvert, *disprove.

confirmed. *Inveterate, chronic, deep-seated, deep-rooted.

Ana. Established, fixed, set, settled, firmed (see SET, v.): *hardened, indurated, callous.

confiscate. Appropriate, *arrogate, usurp, pre-empt.

Ana. Seize, *take, grab: condemn, attain, proscribe (see SENTENCE, v.).

conflict, n. 1 Combat, fight, *contest, affray, fray.

Ana. Engagement, *battle, action: *encounter, skirmish, brush: controversy, dispute, *argument.

2 Strife, contention, dissension, variance, *discord.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ana. Clash, collision, impingement, *impact: antagonism, hostility, *enmity: incompatibility, incongruousness, inconsistency, inconsonance, discordance (see corresponding adjectives at INCONSONANT).

Ant. Harmony. — Con. Consonance, concord, accord (see HARMONY): comity, amity, *friendship: compatibility, congruity (see corresponding adjectives at CONSONANT).

conform. 1 *Adapt, adjust, accommodate, reconcile.

Ana. *Harmonize, tune, attune: *assent, accede, acquiesce: accept, *recede.

2 *Agree, accord, comport, harmonize, correspond, square, tally, jibe.

Ant. Diverge. — Con. *Differ.

conformation. Configuration, *form, shape, figure, Gestalt.

Ana. *Structure, anatomy, framework, skeleton.

confound. 1 Dumfound, nonplus, bewilder, mystify, *puzzle, perplex, distract.

Ana. Flabbergast, amaze, astound, astonish, *surprise: discomfit, faze, rattle, abash, *embarrass, disconcert.

2 Confuse, *mistake.

Ana. Muddle, addle, *confuse: *mix, mingle.

Ant. Distinguish, discriminate.

confuse. 1 Confuse, muddle, bemuddle, addle, fuddle, befuddle agree in meaning to throw one out mentally so that one cannot think clearly or act intelligently. Confuse usually implies intense embarrassment or bewilderment. "'Come down, LHy. You've got to go through with it.' The young woman, delicately confused and blushing, obeyed" (Bennett). "You confuse me, and how can I transact business if I am confused? Let us be clear-headed" (Dickens). Muddle (literally, to make muddy) and bemuddle, in present use often connote floundering in deep waters. In earlier use, muddle frequently suggested stupefaction, as by drink. Both usually imply blundering, aimless, but not necessarily unsuccessful, attempts to deal with ideas, situations, or tasks beyond one's powers of analysis or one's capacity; as, subjects so abstruse as to muddle (or bemuddle) the brains of all but exceptional students. "We have muddled through so often that we have come half to believe in a providence which watches over unintelligent virtue" (Inge). Addle (literally of an egg, to make rotten and infertile) suggests staleness or emptiness of mind and resulting mental impotence. "I have addled my head with writing all day" (Dickens). Fuddle and the more common befuddle imply tipping or indulgence in a drug that clouds the mind and makes one's thinking and speech absurdly incoherent; as, Shakespeare's Falstaff is most amusing when he is completely befuddled.

Ana. Confound, bewilder, mystify, perplex, *puzzle: discomfit, disconcert, faze, rattle (see EMBARRASS): fluster, flurry (see DISCOMPOSE).

Ant. Enlighten.

2 *Mistake, confound.

Ant. Differentiate.

confusion. Confusion, disorder, chaos, disarray, jumble, clutter, pie, snarl, muddle come into comparison when they mean the state or a condition in which things are not in their right places or arranged in their right relations to each other, or an instance of such a state or condition. Confusion suggests such mixing or mingling as obliterates clear demarcation or distinction; disorder implies lack, more frequently disturbance or breach, of due order or arrangement; as, his desk was in confusion (that is, with objects of all sorts mixed together), in disorder (that is, with objects deranged or thrown out of place); mental confusion (an inability to perceive distinctly or to understand even simple ideas), mental disorder (derangement of functions). "'Mid the misery and confusion Of an unjust war" (Shelley). "Cowardice has succeeded to courage, disorder to discipline" (G. L. Dickinson). Chaos suggests the absolute, or sometimes hopeless, confusion associated with the ancient Greek conception of Chaos, the unorganized state of primordial matter before the creation of distinct and orderly forms; the term therefore usually implies lack of organization rather than derangement. "A work where nothing's just or fit; One glaring chaos and wild heap of wit" (Pope). "The Essays of Montaigne... a chaos indeed, but a chaos swarming with germs of evolution" (J. R. Lowell). Disarray, more even than disorder, implies disarrangement; it is therefore preferable when the breaking up of order or discipline is to be suggested. "The disarray into which society had been thrown by this deplorable affair made their presence in town more necessary than ever" (E. Wharton). Jumble implies the mixing of incongruous things with resulting confusion; as, "The house they lived in... was a heterogeneous architectural jumble" (Meredith). "A vulgar Darwinism which is exactly the jumble of Naturalism with pieces of other and incompatible philosophies" (Inge). Clutter, which is now chiefly dialectal in British use, is still accepted by good American speakers and writers; it implies confusion and crowding, and often suggests a disagreeable or more or less messy state. "Lord, what a mess This set is in! If there's one thing I hate Above everything else... It's clutter" (Millay). Pie, literally a printer's term applied to a confusion or disarrangement of type, is by extension applied to any disarrangement of things that should be in a set order or in right relations to each other if they are to work or attain their ends; as, his finances are all in pie; "To make pie of the European arrangements for securing peace" (Spectator). Snarl, literally applied to a tangle of hairs, threads, and the like, implies confusion and entanglement; it therefore suggests great difficulty in unraveling and ordering; as, his affairs are in a snarl. Muddle also implies confusion and entanglement, but in addition it suggests the influence of bungling and a more or less hopeless condition. "We both grub on in a muddle" (Dickens). "Hitherto... the world's been confused and poor, a thorough muddle; there's never been a real planned education for people" (H. G. Wells).

Ana. Derangement, disarrangement, disorganization, disturbance (see corresponding verbs at DISORDER): *din, babel, pandemonium, hullabaloo: *anarchy, lawlessness.

Con. Ordering or order, systematization, organization (see corresponding verbs at ORDER): system, *method.

confute. Controvert, refute, *disprove, rebut.

congenial. *Consonant, consistent, compatible, congruous, sympathetic.

Ana. Companionable, co-operative, *social: sociable, genial, cordial, *gracious, affable: pleasing, *pleasant, agreeable.

Ant. Uncongenial: antipathetic (of persons): abhorrent (of tasks, duties, etc.).

congenital. Inborn, *innate, hereditary, inherited, inbred.

Ana. *Inherent, constitutional, ingrained: *native.

Con. Acquired (see GET): *accidental, adventitious.

conglomerate, conglomeration. Agglomerate, agglomeration, *aggregate, aggregation.

Ana. Mass, heap, pile, stack (see under HEAP, v.): accumulation, amassment, hoarding or hoard (see corresponding verbs at ACCUMULATE).

congratulate. *Felicitate.

Con. Console, solace, *comfort: commiserate, condole (with), pity (see corresponding nouns at PITY).

congregate. *Gather, assemble, collect.

Ana. Convoke, convene, *summon, muster: swarm, *teem.

Ant. Disperse.

congregation. Assembly, assemblage, gathering, collection. See under GATHER, v.

Ana. Audience, *following, public: *crowd, throng, press, crush.

congress. Council, convocation, *convention, synod, conference.

Ana. Assembly, assemblage, gathering, congregation (see under GATHER): *association, order, society.

congruous. Compatible, congenial, *consonant, sympathetic, consistent.

Ana. Harmonizing or harmonious, according or accordant, corresponding or correspondent, agreeing or agreeable (see corresponding verbs at AGREE): seemly, proper, comme il faut (see DECOROUS): meet, appropriate, fitting, *fit.

Ant. Incongruous. — Con. Incompatible, uncongenial, *inconsonant, discordant, discrepant.

conjectural. Hypothetical, suppositious, *supposed, supposititious, reputed, putative.

Ana. Presumed, assumed, postulated (see PRESUPPOSE): *theoretical, speculative: alleged (see ADDUCE).

Con. Proved, demonstrated (see PROVE).

conjecture, v. Conjecture, surmise, guess come into comparison both as verbs, meaning to draw an inference from slight evidence, and as nouns, denoting an inference based upon such evidence. Conjecture implies formation of an opinion or judgment upon what is recognized as insufficient evidence; as, "We saw below us... a hut, which we conjectured to be a bark hut" (D. Wordsworth); "Mysteries which must explain themselves are not worth the loss of time which a conjecture about them takes up" (Sterne). Surmise implies still slighter evidence, and exercise of the imagination or indulgence in suspicion; as, "What thoughts he had beseeems not me to say, Though some surmise he went to fast and pray" (Dryden); "Just how long the small multiplied impressions will take to break into surmise... nobody can tell" (Quiller-Couch). Guess, in current best usage, implies a hitting upon (or to attempt to hit upon), either at random or from insufficient, uncertain, or ambiguous evidence; as, "You would never guess from meeting them that anyone would pay them for their ideas" (R. Macaulay). "My daughter Lucie is... such a mystery to me; I can make no guess at the state of her heart" (Dickens). The use of guess in the sense of think, believe, or suppose, although sanctioned by older usage (as, "Of twenty year of age he was, I gesse"—Chaucer), is now merely colloquial; when employed (as frequently in the United States) with reference to a fact or purpose about which there is no uncertainty, it is a vulgarism; as, I guess I'll go to bed.

Ana. *Infer, gather, conclude, judge, deduce: speculate, reason, *think: imagine, fancy, conceive (see THINK).

Con. Ascertain, determine, learn, *discover: *prove, demonstrate, test, try.

conjecture, n. Surmise, guess. See under CONJECTURE, v.

Ana. Theory, *hypothesis: *opinion, view, belief, sentiment: inference, deduction, conclusion, judgment (see under INFER).

Ant. Fact.

conjoin. Combine, *unite, concur, co-operate.

conjugal. *Matrimonial, marital, connubial, nuptial, hymeneal.

Ant. Single.

conjure. Adjure, implore, supplicate, beseech, *beg, entreat, importune.

Ana. Plead, appeal, pray, sue. See under PRAYER.

connect. *Join, link, associate, relate, unite, combine.

Ana. Attach, *fasten, affix: articulate, concatenate, *integrate: *cement, glue, agglutinate.

Ant. Disconnect. — Con. Sever, sunder, divorce, *separate, part, divide: *detach, disengage.

connivance. Collusion, conspiracy. See under CONNIVE.

Ana. Intrigue, machination, conspiracy, *plot, frame-up, cabal.

connive. Connive, collude, conspire are not interchangeable synonyms, but they come into comparison because they mean to take part by a secret understanding or agreement in furthering something, typically something that is evil or injurious. The same distinctions in implications and connotations are evident in their corresponding nouns connivance, collusion, conspiracy. Connive (etymologically, to wink) and connivance imply a shutting of one's eyes or a feigned ignorance of what is being or is about to be perpetrated, thereby giving tacit permission to the actual perpetrators or actual encouragement of an unlawful, criminal, or otherwise reprehensible act; as, "the early persecutions [of Christians] were like Russian 'pogroms,' instigated or connived at by the government" (Inge); "In presence of his ladylove... and certainly with her connivance, he was unmercifully thrashed" (Stevenson); "All the traditions of honour and probity in which she had been brought up forbade her to connive at such a plan" (E. Wharton). Collude (etymologically, to play with) and collusion imply acting with another privily and underhandedly to trick a third person or party into giving what cannot be rightfully gained, or to frustrate his (or its) plans or ends; as, cross-examination of witnesses tended to prove that the defendant colluded with the plaintiff in an attempt to win a verdict for high damages; the divorce was obtained by the collusion of the husband with his wife; "a blundering world, in collusion with a prejudiced philosophy" (Pater). Conspire (etymologically, to blow or breathe together; hence, to agree) and conspiracy differ from the preceding terms in usually (though not invariably) suggesting the action not of one person or party but of two or more; also, conspire and conspiracy may be used figuratively of impersonal agencies; as, Brutus and Cassius conspired to murder Caesar; "And when they [Joseph's brethren] saw him afar off... they conspired against him to slay him" (Genesis xxxvii. 18); "Princes conspire against me" (Lyttton); "the accidents and conspiracies which had led to his being defeated three times in the ring" (Shaw); "the historical circumstances of recent years have conspired to intensify nationalism" (A. Huxley).

Ana. Abet, instigate, *incite, foment: *wink, blink.

connoisseur. Virtuoso, dilettante, *aesthete.

Ana. *Epicure, gourmet, bon vivant: *expert, adept.

Con. *Amateur, tyro, dabbler.

connotation. Denotation (see under DENOTE).

Ana. Suggestion, implication, intimation (see corresponding verbs at SUGGEST): evoking or evocation (see corresponding verb at EDUCE): import, signification, *meaning, significance, sense.

connote. *Denote.

Ana. *Suggest, imply, intimate, hint: *express, voice, utter: import, signify, *mean, denote.

connubial. Conjugal, *matrimonial, marital, nuptial, hymeneal.

conquer. Conquer, vanquish, defeat, beat, lick, subdue, subjugate, reduce, overcome, surmount, overthrow, rout agree in meaning to get the better of or to bring under one's power by the exertion of force or strategy. Conquer usually implies the gaining possession or mastery of something (less frequently of someone), vanquish, the complete overpowering or discomfiture of someone (less frequently of something); as, to conquer a difficulty; to vanquish an opponent in debate; "We conquered France, but felt our captive's charms" (Pope); "a Roman by a Roman valiantly vanquished" (Shak.). Vanquish is more likely than conquer to refer to a single engagement. "Miss Goff is a celebrated lawn-tennis player. She vanquished the Australian champion last year" (Shaw). Defeat does not imply the finality of vanquish; it may even imply no more than a temporary checking or frustrating; as, "But though defeated, the Cotton States were not vanquished" (Westminster Rev.); "Two factions, each intent not merely on defeating the other, but on excluding it altogether from political rights" (G. L. Dickinson). Beat is a somewhat colloquial term for defeat, but it often carries the connotation of finality so obvious in vanquish. "The Russo-Japanese war...furnishes another proof of the saying that Russia is always defeated but never beaten" (The Spectator, 1913). Lick, a slang term, suggests a thorough and humiliating beating; as, to lick the opposing team. Subdue implies not only a defeating but a suppressing, or often, a compulsion to submission; as, "the tumults and disorders of the Great Rebellion had hardly been subdued" (T. S. Eliot); "the desire to meet and subdue it [skepticism]...was the motive of his [Plato's] philosophy" (G. L. Dickinson). Subjugate implies as a result complete subjection, as under a yoke; as, "The line of distinction between the...free and the subjugated races" (Ch. Just. Taney). "Austria making the murder of the Archduke a pretext for subjugating Serbia" (Shaw). Reduce, as here compared (see DECREASE), often implies a bringing to capitulation or surrender; it applies especially to a beleaguered town or fortress; as, "reduced a province under Roman yoke" (Milton). The term, however, often implies subjugation, especially a gradual one. "The difficulty of their country made it necessary to reduce them step by step" (Buchan). Overcome and surmount suggest a conquering of someone or something that confronts one and must be (in the case of overcome) overpowered or (in the case of surmount) exceeded or surpassed, as in power, force, skill, or the like; as, "Where there is an enemy to be overcome [by school children], let it be matter rather than other human beings" (B. Russell); to overcome one's fears; to surmount an obstacle; "This crisis will be surmounted if the Church has the faith and courage...to face it candidly" (Inge). Both overthrow and rout imply disaster as well as defeat, overthrow often implying destruction, and rout, flight and complete dispersion. "They are not overthrown by revolutionists. They collapse first, and then the revolutionists take charge of affairs" (W. Lippmann). "A small English force...sufficed to rout the disorderly levies" (J. R. Green).

Ana. *Frustrate, thwart, foil, circumvent, outwit, baffle, balk.

Con. Surrender, submit, capitulate (see corresponding nouns at SURRENDER): *yield, succumb, bow, cave in.

conqueror. Vanquisher, *victor, winner, champion.

conquest. *Victory, triumph.

Ana. Subjugation, subdual, defeating or defeat, overthrowing or overthrow, routing or rout (see corresponding verbs at CONQUER).

consanguinity. *Kinship, affinity, cognation, agnation, enation.

conscientious. Scrupulous, honorable, honest, *upright, just.

Ana. Righteous, virtuous, ethical, *moral: strict, *rigid: particular, fastidious, finical, *nice: meticulous, punctilious, *careful.

Ant. Unconscientious, unscrupulous. — Con. Slack, lax, remiss, *negligent, neglectful: *careless, heedless, thoughtless.

conscious. Sensible, *aware, cognizant, alive, awake.

Ana. Attending or attentive, minding or mindful, watching (see corresponding verbs at TEND): *watchful, alert, vigilant: perceiving, noticing, noting, remarking, observing (see SEE).

Ant. Unconscious. — Con. Ignoring, overlooking, disregarding (see NEGLECT, v.): *forgetful, unmindful, oblivious.

consecrate. Hallow, dedicate, *devote.

Con. Desecrate, profane (see corresponding nouns at DESECRATION): defile, pollute (see CONTAMINATE).

consecutive. Consecutive, successive, sequent, sequential, serial, discrete are not all synonyms of one another, but, as here considered, they agree in meaning following one after the other in order. Consecutive and successive apply to objects which follow one another without interruption or break. But consecutive is somewhat more emphatic, stressing the immediacy of the succession, the regularity or fixedness of the order, and the close connection as in time, space, logic, etc., of the units; successive is applicable to things that follow regardless of differences in duration, extent, or the like, or the length of the interval between the units; as, it rained four consecutive days; a group of ten consecutive numbers; three successive (not consecutive) leap years; the successive strokes of a piston; his last five successive books are of higher quality than any of his first five. Consecutive is also applicable to a person or to thought that manifests logical sequence; as, "consecutive thinking absolutely requires personal initiative" (C. W. Eliot). Sequent and sequential apply to an arrangement or to things (sometimes a thing) following a sequence, such as a causal, logical, or chronological sequence, or some settled order; as, the events of the narrative do not follow in sequent order; "The galleys Have sent a dozen sequent messengers This very night at one another's heels" (Shak.); changes which proceed with sequential regularity. Serial, when used in the sense here considered, always implies that the thing or things so qualified form a series or will appear as a series: it therefore suggests likeness or uniformity in the units and, usually, a prearranged order, especially in time or space; as, the fifth of the serial concerts; the story will first be published serially (that is, in successive installments in a periodical); from the publisher's point of view, mystery stories make good serial narratives. Discrete (as here considered: see also DISTINCT) comes into comparison with the other terms only when it applies to a number of things that follow each other in time or space or are massed together. In this sense, it stresses discontinuousness, and the distinctness or separateness of each unit; thus, a "discrete series" in mathematics is a series in which every element, except the first, has a predecessor, and every element, except the last, has a successor. "The trend of all but the best current poetry is away from the consecutive [i.e., from chronological or logical order] and towards the discrete [i.e., towards an arrangement where there is no connection between the details or units]. I have read volumes of recent verse in which little fragment after little fragment is dropped into the receptive mind" (Loves).

Ana. Following, succeeding, ensuing (see FOLLOW): continuous, *continual, incessant: coherent (see corresponding noun COHERENCE): *logical.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

Ant. Inconsecutive, unconsentive. — Con. Alternate, *intermittent, recurrent, periodic: desultory, *random, haphazard, hit-or-miss.

consent, v. *Assent, accede, acquiesce, agree, subscribe. Ana. *Yield, submit, defer, relent: permit, allow, *let: *approve, sanction: concur (see AGREE).

Ant. Dissent. — Con. Refuse, *decline: *disapprove, deprecate: *demur, balk, stick, stickle, strain.

consequence. 1 Result, *effect, aftereffect, aftermath, issue, outcome, event, upshot, sequel.

Ant. Antecedent. — Con. *Cause, determinant, reason, occasion: *origin, source, root.

2 *Importance, moment, weight, significance, import.

Ana. Necessity, *need, exigency: *worth, value: renown, honor, reputation, repute, *fame: eminence, illustriousness, distinction (see corresponding adjectives at FAMOUS).

consequently. *Therefore, hence, then, accordingly, so.

conserve, v. Preserve, *save.

Ana. Protect, shield, safeguard, guard, *defend.

Ant. Waste, squander.

conserves. See under SAVE, v.

consider. 1 Consider, study, contemplate, weigh, revolve, excogitate come into comparison chiefly as transitive verbs meaning to fix the mind for a time on something in order to increase one's knowledge or understanding of it or to solve a problem involved in it. Consider often suggests little more than an applying of one's mind (as, a proposal so unreasonable that one does not need to consider it), but sometimes it also carries a restricting implication such as that of a definite point of view (as, "In the last paragraphs we have considered science as a steadily advancing army of ascertained facts"—Inge), or as that of thinking over (as, the publishers told him they would consider his book; "marriage is an action too freely practised and too seldom adequately considered"—R. Macaulay), or as that of casting about in order to reach a suitable conclusion, opinion, decision, or the like (as, "Her father considered a little before he answered"—Dickens). Study implies greater mental concentration than consider; usually, it also suggests more care for the details or minutiae and more of an effort to comprehend fully or to learn all the possibilities, applications, variations, or the like; as, the president said that the bill must be studied before he reached a decision regarding the signing or vetoing of it; a work of architecture that deserves to be studied closely; to study a patient's reactions to the new treatment for pneumonia. "I like very naturally to think that I am being read; but the idea that I am being studied fills me, after the first outburst of laughter, with a deepening gloom" (A. Huxley). "Bryce, who had studied the matter . . . thoroughly, was wont to insist . . . [that] the smallest democracies . . . stand highest in the scale" (H. Ellis). Contemplate (as here compared: see also SEE) implies, like meditate (see under PONDER), the focusing of one's attention upon a thing and a close dwelling upon it: the term, however, does not always carry a clear implication of the purpose or result. When the object on which the mind rests is a plan, a project, an imaginative conception, or the like, the word usually suggests its formulation in detail or its enjoyment as envisioned; as, "Henchard bent and kissed her cheek. The moment and the act he had contemplated for weeks with a thrill of pleasure" (Hardy); "the poet 'has an idea,' and in the course of contemplating it he draws up from his subconscious a string of associated ideas and images" (Day Lewis). When the object contemplated lies outside the mind and has either material or immaterial existence, the term suggests an attempt to increase one's knowledge and comprehension of it through meditation upon it or through stimulating the activity of a higher mental power such as intuition; as, "Nature is beautiful only to the mind which is prepared to apprehend her beauty, to contemplate her for her own sake apart from the practical delight she brings" (S. Alexander); "the opinion . . . widely held, that while science, by a deliberate abstraction, contemplates a world of facts without values, religion contemplates values apart from facts" (Inge). Weigh (cf. PONDER), in the extended sense here considered, implies evaluation of something, usually of one thing in respect to another and relevant thing or things: it suggests an attempt to get at the truth by balancing counterclaims, contradictory data, conflicting evidence, and the like. "In teaching the young to think hard, any subject will answer. The problem is to get them to weigh evidence, draw accurate inferences . . . and form judgments" (C. W. Eliot); "As the great Morgagni had said much earlier, it is not enough to count, we must evaluate; 'observations are not to be numbered, they are to be weighed'" (H. Ellis). Revolve implies a consideration by mentally turning over and over a problem, a question, a plan, or the like, so that all its aspects or phases are taken into account; as, he knew that he must revolve the matter before he could decide how to deal with it; "Should he write to his son? For a time he revolved a long, tactful letter in his mind" (H. G. Wells). Excogitate, a now rare word usually replaced by think out, implies the application of the mind to something so that one may find the solution of the problems involved; as, "In style, to consider what ought to be written, and after what manner, he must first think and excogitate his matter" (B. Jonson); to excogitate a plan whereby poverty may be relieved without unduly burdening the taxpayers.

Ana. *Ponder, meditate, ruminate, muse: reflect, cogitate, *think, reason, speculate: inspect, examine, *scrutinize, scan.

Con. Ignore, *neglect, overlook, disregard, slight.

2 Consider, regard, account, reckon, deem, denote in common to hold the view or opinion that someone or something is as described or designated. They are commonly used interchangeably without attention to their fine shadings of meaning. Consider, in discriminating use, suggests a conclusion reached through reflection; as, he considers exercise a waste of energy; some persons consider poor relief an incentive to laziness. Regard, in exact use, does not lose its primary implication of looking upon. Sometimes, it suggests a judgment based on appearances. "I was . . . plainly regarded as a possible purchaser" (L. P. Smith). Often, it implies a point of view, sometimes merely personal, sometimes partisan. "The regulations of the state were not regarded by the Greeks—as they are apt to be by modern men—as so many vexatious, if necessary, restraints on individual liberty" (G. L. Dickinson). "A church . . . which regarded all dissentients as rebels and traitors" (Inge). Account and reckon retain their etymological implications of counting or calculating: they are most precisely employed when they imply evaluation, differentiation, or the like; as, these trees were not accounted (or reckoned) of much value. "I account the justice which is grounded on utility to be the . . . most sacred and binding part of all morality" (J. S. Mill). Deem is now chiefly literary. It is often used as the equivalent of consider, but it distinctively stresses judgment rather than reflection. "Behind the economic problem lies a psychological or ethical problem, that of getting persons to recognise truths which they deem it to their interest to avoid" (J. A. Hobson). "The first time he [Don Quixote] made a helmet, he tested its capacity for resisting blows, and battered it out of shape; next time he did not test it, but 'deemed' it to be a very good helmet" (B. Russell).

Ana. *Think, conceive, imagine, fancy: judge, gather, *infer, conclude.

considerate. *Thoughtful, attentive.

Ana. Kindly, *kind: *tender, sympathetic, warm-hearted, compassionate: obliging, complaisant, *amiable.

Ant. Inconsiderate. — Con. *Forgetful, unmindful, oblivious: *careless, heedless, thoughtless.

considered. *Deliberate, premeditated, advised, designed, studied.

Ana. Intentional, *voluntary, willful: planned, projected, schemed (see corresponding verbs under PLAN, n.).

Ant. Unconsidered. — Con. *Precipitate, impetuous, headlong: impulsive, *spontaneous, instinctive.

consign. *Commit, entrust, confide, relegate.

Ana. Transfer, *move, remove, shift: assign, allocate, *allot: resign, surrender, yield (see RELINQUISH).

consistent. Congruous, *consonant, compatible, congenial, sympathetic.

Ana. *Conforming or conformable, tallying, jibing, squaring (see corresponding verbs at AGREE): matching, equalling (see MATCH, v.): identical, alike, *similar, like.

Ant. Inconsistent. — Con. Discrepant, discordant, incongruous, *inconsonant, incompatible: contradictory, contrary, *opposite, antithetical.

consist. 1 In form consist of. Consist in, comprise, *compose, constitute.

Ana. *Include, comprehend, embrace, involve: *contain, hold.

2 In form consist in. Consist of, comprise, *compose, constitute.

console, v. *Comfort, solace.

Ana. Assuage, alleviate, mitigate, *relieve, allay: calm, tranquilize (see corresponding adjectives at CALM): *satisfy, content.

Con. *Trouble, distress: *discompose, disturb, perturb, agitate, upset, disquiet.

consolidate. *Compact, unify, concentrate.

Ana. *Integrate, articulate, concatenate: amalgamate, merge, fuse, blend (see MIX): condense, compress (see CONTRACT, v.): *weave, knit.

Con. Dissolve, melt, *liquefy: *separate, sever, sunder, part: *distribute, dispense, divide: dissipate, *scatter, disperse.

consolidation. Consolidation, merger, amalgamation are here compared as terms denoting a union of two or more corporations. Consolidation is often used loosely as a general term; strictly, however, it implies the fusion of the companies or corporations, with dissolution of their separate corporate identities and transference of their combined assets, franchises, good will, etc., to a single corporate unit, often under an entirely new name. Merger, in its technical sense, is a form of consolidation in which the assets, franchises, good will, etc., of one or more companies or corporations are transferred to, or merged into, one of the units without change in the name of the absorbing unit. In a merger, additional shares of stock are issued by the absorbing company or corporation to replace on an agreed basis the shares of the units absorbed. Amalgamation is often loosely or generally used of any form of consolidation or merger. It may be applied narrowly to a consolidation in which a new corporation with an entirely new name and corporate identity results. In British use, however, it is more commonly applied to a union of the merger type. These technical distinctions are observed only in precise use and have not (with the possible exception of merger) been clearly established.

Ant. Dissolution.

consonance. *Harmony, concord, accord.

Ana. Agreement, conformity, correspondence (see corresponding verbs at AGREE): concurrence, coincidence (see corresponding verbs at AGREE): compatibility, congruity (see corresponding adjectives at CONSONANT).

Ant. Dissonance (in music): discord. — Con. Inconsonance, discordance, incompatibility, incongruity, discrepancy (see corresponding adjectives at INCONSONANT).

consonant, adj. Consonant, consistent, compatible, congruous, congenial, sympathetic come into comparison when they mean in agreement with one another or agreeable one to the other. Consonant (now usually followed by with, rarely by to) implies agreement with a concurrent circumstance or situation, or conformity to an accepted standard, or harmony between two things that must come into contact or comparison with each other: the term suggests absence of discord; as, "She...first sounded their inclinations, with which her sentiments were always strictly consonant" (Fielding); "Fijians possessed a physical endurance consonant with their great stature" (V. Heiser); "it is...more consonant with the Puritan temper to abolish a practice than to elevate it and clear away abuses" (Quiller-Couch); "to pursue callings more consonant with Buddha's teaching" (Binyon); "Nature has no ends consonant with...the desires of man which would make it possible for him to accord himself to her" (J. W. Krulch). Consistent (often followed by with but sometimes used attributively) suggests such agreement or harmony between things or between the details of the same thing as implies the negation of contradiction; as, "That their letters should be as kind as was consistent with proper maidenly pride" (De Quincy); "Congress...may require that they [contracts for public works] shall be carried out only in a way consistent with its views of public policy" (Justice Holmes); "No one has yet imagined a consistent picture of what the electron and proton really are" (Jeans). Compatible (often followed by with) implies a capacity for existing or coming together without disagreement, discord, disharmony, or the like: the term does not necessarily suggest positive agreement or harmony, but it does imply the absence of such conflict between two (or more) things as would make their association or combination impossible; as "With all the eagerness compatible with...elegance, Sir Walter and his two ladies stepped forward to meet her" (Austen); "To combine, in the highest measure in which they are compatible, the two elements of refinement and manliness" (Froude); "Many bad qualities are of course compatible with vitality—for example, those of a healthy tiger. And many of the best qualities are compatible with its absence" (B. Russell). Congruous (sometimes followed by to or with) implies more positive agreement or harmony than compatible does: ordinarily it implies the fitness, suitability, or appropriateness of one thing to another so that their association or combination, no matter how much they are in contrast, produces a pleasing or, at least, a not disagreeable impression; as, the congruous furnishings of a room; "Not congruous to the nature of epic poetry" (H. Blair); "Thoughts congruous to the nature of their subject" (Cowper). The negative form incongruous is currently far more common than congruous. Congenial (sometimes followed by to) is most often used of persons or things that are in such harmony with the taste of a person that they afford him pleasure, or delight, or satisfaction; as, a congenial companion; "a pair of not very congenial passengers" (Conrad); "the reticence and understatement of the method may be especially congenial [to the Chinese]" (Binyon); "[Hobbes's] theory of government is congenial to that type of person who is conservative from prudence but revolutionary in his dreams" (T. S. Eliot). Occasionally, however, congenial is used of things in the sense of wholly and satisfyingly congruous; as, "all such introduced ideas are congenial to the subject" (S. Alexander); "statement, overstatement and understatement in letters. Given a congenial context, every one of them is right" (C. E. Montague). Sympathetic (as here compared: see also TENDER), like congenial, usually suggests qualities in the person or thing so described that make him or it in agreement with another person's likings or tastes but, in contrast with congenial, it suggests a more subtle appeal and, often, a less hearty acceptance; as, "every author who is 'sympathetic' to them" (Bradley); "To my generation...he [Matthew Arnold] was a more sympathetic prose writer than Carlyle or Ruskin" (T. S. Eliot); "an air of rather self-conscious bravado [in myself] which...was a little repellent to one or two who loved me and my work...and was not sympathetic to my own most genuine tastes" (H. Ellis).

Ana. Conforming or conformable, harmonizing or harmonious, agreeing or agreeable, according or accordant (see corresponding verbs at AGREE): concurring or concurrent, coinciding or coincident (see corresponding verbs at AGREE).

Ant. Inconsonant: dissonant (in music). — Con. Discordant, discrepant, inconsistent, incompatible, incongruous (see INCONSONANT).

conspectus. Synopsis, epitome, *abridgment, abstract, brief.

Ana. *Compendium, syllabus, digest, survey, sketch, précis, aperçu.

conspicuous. Prominent, salient, signal, *noticeable, remarkable, striking, arresting, outstanding.

Ana. Patent, manifest, *evident, distinct, obvious: eminent, distinguished, celebrated, illustrious, notorious (see FAMOUS).

Ant. Inconspicuous. — Con. *Common, ordinary: *obscure, vague: lowly, *humble, modest: hidden, concealed (see HIDE): *secret, covert, privy.

conspiracy. 1 Collusion, connivance. See under CONNIVE.

Ana. *Combination, combine, ring, cabal, junto, faction. 2 Complot, cabal, intrigue, machination, *plot, frame-up.

Ana. *Sedition, treason: treacherousness or treachery, perfidiousness or perfidy, disloyalty, faithlessness, falseness or falsity (see corresponding adjectives at FAITHLESS).

conspirator. *Confederate, accessory, accomplice, abettor.

conspire. *Connive, collude.

Ana. *Unite, combine, conjoin, concur, co-operate: plot, scheme (see under PLAN, n.): *conduce, contribute. constable. Officer, *policeman, catchpole, bobby, peeler, copper, cop, bull, bailiff.

constant, adj. 1 *Faithful, true, loyal, leal, stanch, steadfast, resolute.

Ana. Abiding, enduring, persisting or persistent, lasting (see corresponding verbs at CONTINUE): dependable, trustworthy, *reliable, trusty, tried.

Ant. Inconstant, fickle. — Con. Unstable, capricious, mercurial (see INCONSTANT): disloyal, *faithless, false, perfidious.

2 *Steady, uniform, even, equable.

Ana. Established, settled, set, fixed (see SET, v.): invariable, immutable, unchangeable (see affirmative adjectives at CHANGEABLE): *regular, normal, typical, natural.

Ant. Variable. — Con. *Changeable, changeful, mutable, protean: fluctuating, wavering (see SWING).

3 *Continual, incessant, continuous, perpetual, perennial.

Ana. Persisting or persistent, persevering (see corresponding verbs at PERSEVERE): pertinacious, dogged, *obstinate, stubborn: chronic, confirmed, *inveterate.

Ant. Fitful. — Con. *Intermittent, alternate: spasmodic (see FITFUL): occasional, sporadic, *infrequent.

consternation. Panic, terror, alarm, fright, *fear, dread, dismay, horror, trepidation.

Ana. Confusion, muddlement or muddle, bemuddlement (see corresponding verbs at CONFUSE): bewilderment, distraction, perplexity (see corresponding verbs at PUZZLE): agitation, perturbation (see corresponding verbs at DISCOMPOSE).

Con. Sang-froid, composure, *equanimity, phlegm: aplomb, self-possession (see CONFIDENCE).

constituent, n. Component, *element, ingredient, integrant, factor.

Ana. *Part, portion, piece, detail, member: *item, particular.

Ant. Whole, aggregate. — Con. *System, complex, organism, economy: composite, compound, blend, amalgam (see MIXTURE).

constitute. *Compose, comprise, consist in, consist of.

Ana. Form, *make, fashion, shape, fabricate, forge.

constitutional, adj. *Inherent, intrinsic, essential, ingrained.

Ana. Congenital, *innate, inborn: *native: natural, normal (see REGULAR): *characteristic, individual, peculiar.

Ant. Advenient. — Con. *Accidental, adventitious, fortuitous: unnatural, *irregular, anomalous: foreign, alien, extraneous, *extrinsic.

constrain. Oblige, coerce, compel, *force.

Ana. Impel, drive, *move, actuate: require, exact, *demand.

constraint. Compulsion, coercion, duress, restraint, *force, violence.

Ana. Suppression, repression (see corresponding verbs at SUPPRESS): impelling or impulsion, driving or drive (see corresponding verbs at MOVE): goad, spur, *motive, spring: *obligation, duty.

constrict. Compress, *contract, shrink, condense, deflate.

Ana. *Tie, bind: restrict, confine, circumscribe, *limit: *restrain, curb, snaffle.

Con. *Expand, dilate, distend, swell, inflate: enlarge, *increase.

constringent, adj. *Astringent, styptic.

constructive. *Implicit, virtual.

Ana. Inferential, illative, ratiocinative (see under INFERENCE): implied, involved (see INCLUDE).

Ant. Manifest. — Con. Express, *explicit, definite: *evident, patent, obvious.

construe, v. Explicate, elucidate, interpret, expound, *explain.

Ana. *Analyze, resolve, break down, anatomize, dissect: *understand, comprehend, appreciate.

construe, n. *Translation, version, paraphrase, metaphor.

consuetude. Custom, usage, use, wont, practice, *habit, habitude.

Ant. Desuetude.

consult. *Confer, advise, parley, commune, treat, negotiate.

Ana. *Discuss, debate: deliberate, cogitate (see THINK): counsel, advise (see under ADVICE).

consume. Engross, absorb, *monopolize.

consummate, adj. Consummate, finished, accomplished agree in meaning brought to completion or perfection. Their distinctions lie chiefly in the degree of perfection, in the means by which this perfection is attained, and, at times, in their application: for consummate and finished apply to persons or to things; accomplished, as a rule, to persons only. That is consummate which attains the highest possible point or degree of perfection or which possesses the highest possible qualities, whether natural or acquired; as, consummate wisdom or skill; consummate happiness; as, consummate hypocrite. "The little band held the post with consummate tenacity" (Molloy). "A man of perfect and consummate virtue" (Addison). "Pope . . . is . . . one of the most consummate craftsmen who ever dealt in words" (Lowes). That which is finished manifests such care and exquisiteness in performance or workmanship that nothing additional is required to perfect it or to increase its technical excellence; as, a finished gentleman is always courteous; finished actors usually give finished performances. "The most finished bat [i.e., batsman] of his day" (A. J. Balfour). One is accomplished who is distinguished for his skill, his versatility, and his finesse; the word often suggests mastery in whatever is attempted; as, an accomplished musician; an accomplished villain. "They . . . are more accomplished and ingenious in this sort of rationalizing than Arnold was" (T. S. Eliot). Accomplished sometimes implies merely the acquirement of social arts and graces, or accomplishments; as, accomplished young ladies (cf. ACQUIREMENT).

Ana. *Perfect, whole, entire, intact: complete, *full: flawless, *impeccable, faultless: *supreme, superlative, transcendent, peerless, surpassing.

Ant. Crude. — Con. Rough, *rude, callow, green, raw: primitive, primeval (see PRIMARY): defective, *deficient.

contagion. *Infection.

contagious. *Infectious, communicable, catching.

Ana. Toxic, pestilential, pestilent, virulent, mephitic, miasmatic, miasmatic (see POISONOUS).

contagium. See under INFECTION.

contain. Contain, hold, accommodate denote in common to have, or be capable of having, within. To contain is to have within, or as an element, fraction, or part; to hold is to have the capacity to contain or to retain; as, the bookcase contains (that is, actually has in it) fifty volumes, but holds (that is, is capable of containing) a hundred; a bushel contains (not holds) four pecks; a bushel basket holds (not contains) a bushel; these boxes contain apples; the compound contains iron, which it holds in solution; his philosophy contains some elements of truth. "Of Plato himself we know nothing . . . that could not be held in a single sentence" (H. Ellis). But the distinction between hold and contain is often inconsiderable or disregarded. To accommodate is to hold without crowding and inconvenience; as, thirty passengers were crowded into a bus built to accommodate twenty; the parking lot accommodates fifty cars. "The earth can accommodate its present population more comfortably than it does or ever did" (Shaw). This is sometimes an attendant implication of accommodate (see OBLIGE, 2) as used of the provision of lodgings; as, the hotel was unable to accommodate all who applied for rooms.

Ana. *Receive, admit, take: *harbor, shelter, lodge, house.

contaminate. Contaminate, taint, attain, pollute, defile agree in meaning to debase by rendering impure or unclean. Contaminate implies the presence or the influence of something external which by entering into or by coming in contact with a thing destroys or may destroy the latter's purity; as, the city's water supply was in danger of being contaminated by surface drainage; Mrs. Brown refused to allow her children to play with other children for fear their manners and morals might be contaminated; the contamination of air in a mine by gases. Taint differs from contaminate in stressing the effect rather than the cause; that which is contaminated has been touched by or mixed with that which will debase or corrupt; that which is tainted is no longer pure, clean, unspoiled, or the like, but is in some measure or degree sullied or stained, or is in process of corruption or decay; as, tainted meat. "His unkindness may defeat my life, But never taint my love" (Shak.). "Woman! above all women glorified, Our tainted nature's solitary boast" (Wordsworth). "The Claudii, brilliant, unaccountable, tainted with some deep congenital madness" (Buchan). By an etymological confusion with taint, the now rare attaint acquired many of the implications of the former term and became its close synonym: in some uses, however, it has retained from its primary sense of to sentence to outlawry or death (see SENTENCE) a hint of sully the purity of one's name or the honor of one's family or line by actual or imputed nefarious crimes. "Wherein a good name hath bin wrongfully attainted" (Milton). "No breath of calumny ever attainted the personal purity of Savonarola" (Milman). Pollute implies that the process which begins with contamination is complete and manifest and that what was literally or figuratively pure and clean has lost its clearness or fairness and has become muddy, or filthy, or poisoned. "The nuisance set forth in the bill was one which would be of international importance—a visible change of a great river from a pure stream into a polluted and poisoned ditch" (Justice Holmes). Pollute, in discriminating use, is the preferred term when the reference is to something that ideally is clean, clear, or bright; as, to pollute the minds of children by obscenities; to keep one's honor unpolluted. Defile strongly implies befouling of that which ought to be clean, pure, or held sacred. It, therefore, usually suggests violation, profanation, or desecration, and is highly opprobrious in its connotations. "An evil bird that defiles his own nest" (Latimer). "For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies: These are the things which defile a man" (Matthew xv. 19–20). "Scenes such as these, 'tis his [the hunter's] supreme delight To fill with riot, and defile with blood" (Cowper).

Ana. *Debase, vitiate, corrupt, deprave: impair, spoil, *injure, harm.

contemn. *Despise, disdain, scorn, scout.

Ana. Repudiate, reject (see DECLINE): slight, *neglect, disregard: flout, *scoff, jeer.

Con. Venerate, *revere, reverence: respect, esteem, admire, regard (see under REGARD, n.).

contemplate. 1 Study, *consider, weigh, revolve, excogitate.

Ana. *Ponder, meditate, muse, ruminate: reflect, cogitate, speculate, *think.

2 Observe, survey, notice, remark, note, perceive, discern, *see, view, behold, descry, espy.

Ana. *Scrutinize, inspect, examine, scan.

contemplative. Meditative, reflective, *thoughtful, speculative, pensive.

Ana. *Intent, rapt, engrossed, absorbed: musing, ruminating, pondering (see PONDER): reflecting, cogitating, reasoning, thinking (see THINK).

contemporaneous. *Contemporary, coeval, synchronous, simultaneous, coincident, concomitant, concurrent.

Con. *Preceding, antecedent, previous, prior, foregoing; following, ensuing, succeeding (see FOLLOW).

contemporary, adj. Contemporary, contemporaneous, coeval, synchronous, simultaneous, coincident, concomitant, concurrent come into comparison when they mean existing, living, or occurring at the same time. In contemporary and contemporaneous (of which contemporary is applied more frequently to persons, contemporaneous to events), the time regarding which agreement is implied is known only through the context; as, Shakespeare was contemporary with Cervantes, who died in the same month; Shelley's last year was contemporaneous with Matthew Arnold's first; the reign of Louis XIV was contemporaneous with the Commonwealth in England, as also with the Restoration and the revolution of 1688; a recent history of the 15th century based on contemporary accounts. Contemporary, but not contemporaneous, may imply reference to the present; it then means of the same time as that of the speaker or writer; as, "we are not without contemporary talent" (E. Wharton); "most contemporary novels Jane found very bad" (R. Macaulay). Coeval usually implies contemporaneousness for a long, or at a remote, period or time; as, "Every one knows that the Roman Catholic religion is at least coeval with most of the governments where it prevails" (Burke); "The theory requires that these coeval stars should be of nearly the same mass and brightness" (Eddington). Synchronous implies an exact correspondence between the (usually brief) periods of time involved; simultaneous more frequently denotes agreement in the same point or instant of time; as, two pendulums so adjusted that their movements are synchronous; the two shots were simultaneous. "French speech has run a similar and almost synchronous course with English" (H. Ellis). "It was proposed that there should be simultaneous insurrections in London...and at Newcastle" (Macaulay). Coincident applies to events that are regarded as falling or happening (sometimes in a notable or singular manner) at the same time; as, the discovery of America was almost coincident with the capture of Granada; his sudden departure was suspiciously coincident with the stranger's arrival. Concomitant carries so strong an implication of attendance or association that it often imputes a subordinate character; however, only when it implies coincidence or synchronisness is it truly a synonym of the other words; as, the concomitant circumstances of this event cannot be ignored. "As the beauty of the body always accompanies the health of it, so certainly is decency concomitant to virtue" (Spectator). Concurrent adds to synchronous the implication of parallelism or agreement in length of existence, in quality or character, or the like; as, concurrent terms in prison; the concurrent operation of many machines.

Ana. Living, existing, subsisting (see BE).

Con. See those at CONTEMPORANEOUS.

contempt. Despite, disdain, scorn. See under DESPISE, v.

Ana. Abhorrence, detestation, loathing, hatred, hate (see under HATE, v.): aversion, *antipathy: repugnance, distaste (see corresponding adjectives at REPUGNANT).

Anf. Respect. — Con. Esteem, admiration, *regard: *reverence, awe, fear.

contemptible, adj. Contemptible, despicable, pitiable, sorry, scurvy, cheap, beggarly come into comparison when they mean arousing or deserving scorn or disdain. Contemptible applies to that which inspires such scorn or disdain for any reason, as for being insignificant, or mean, or vile, or utterly base. "There is no vice or folly...which, by ill management, makes so contemptible a figure [as vanity]" (Swift). "Why mayn't they [women] do what men do?...I hate that contemptible narrow-mindedness" (Meredith). "The one disgraceful, unpardonable, and to all time contemptible action of my life was to allow myself to appeal to society for help and protection" (Wilde). Despicable is a stronger term, and frequently implies keen and scornful, sometimes indignant, disapprobation. "I know none so despicable as those who despise others" (Fielding). "The immorality of James's Court was hardly more despicable than the imbecility of his government" (J. R. Green). Pitiable, as here compared (see also PITIOUS), implies the inspiring of pity mixed with contempt; as, a pitiable show of weakness; a pitiable attempt at reform. Sorry is often used interchangeably with pitiable without marked loss; however, the word often distinctively implies contemptible or ridiculous inadequacy, wretchedness, or sordidness; as, sorry accommodations for the travelers; "mounted...upon a lean, sorry, jack-ass of a horse" (Sterne); "thus...ideals die; not in the conventional pageantry of honoured death, but sorribly, ignobly, while one's head is turned" (Bennett). Scurvy (etymologically covered with scurf or scabs) implies extreme despicability and meanness and the arousing of disgust as well as scornful contempt; as, a scurvy trick; a scurvy impostor. "What difference betwixt This Rome and ours... between That scurvy dumb-show and this pageant sheen...?" (Browning). Cheap often implies contemptibility that results from undue familiarity or accessibility. "Had I so lavish of my presence been... So stale and cheap to vulgar company" (Shak.). More often, however, cheap and beggarly imply contemptible pettiness, cheap by falling far below the standard of what is worthy, beggarly by its remoteness from that which is adequate; as, cheap politics; "a cheap and nasty life" (Shaw); "About his shelves A beggarly account of empty boxes" (Shak.); a beggarly exhibition; a beggarly wage.

Ana. Detestable, abominable, abhorrent, odious, *hateful: vile, low, *base: object, *mean, sordid, ignoble.

Anf. Admirable, estimable: formidable. — Con. *Splendid, sublime, glorious, superb.

contend. Contend, cope, fight, battle, war come into comparison when they mean to strive in opposition to someone or something. Contend, the most general of these words, always implies a desire or an effort to overcome that which is opposed, but it may imply rivalry rather than animosity, the use of argument rather than the exercise of physical strength or skill or the employment of weapons, a nonhuman rather than a human antagonist, and the like; as, "Although Mrs. Smith and Stephen were always contending, they were never at enmity" (Hardy); "the river was stronger than I, and my arms could not for many hours contend with the Thames" (Jefferies); "since they had left the Española country behind them, they had contended first with wind and sand-storms, and now with cold" (Cather); "The Manichean theory of a good and an evil spirit contending on nearly equal terms in the arena" (Inge). Cope (followed by with) implies contending (often struggling with a problem) successfully or on equal terms: because of this added implication, cope is often used in negative (or, in effect, negative) statements to imply the impossibility of success and in affirmative statements to suggest victory or triumph; as, "Do not imagine that you can cope with me in a knowledge of Julias and Louisas" (Austen); "Once he had the subject chosen, he could cope with nature singlehanded, and make every stroke a triumph" (Stevenson); "The burden of the mystery, the weight of all this incorrigible world...was really more than I could cope with" (L. P. Smith); "It is a good thing to make pupils feel that their education is fitting them to cope with matters about which the world is excited" (B. Russell). Fight in its earliest and still most common sense implies a struggle involving physical strength or prowess, originally between men (whether with the fists or with weapons) and later also between animals; as, "Fight, gentlemen of England! fight, bold yeomen!" (Shak.); a dog that will fight other dogs larger than himself. In extended use, fight differs from contend not so much in its range of application (for both may imply other than a human adversary) as in its stress on a rigorous effort to achieve one's ends, and in its suggestion of a struggle against odds or great difficulties; as, to fight for the defeat of a bill; to fight for breath; to fight against a growing evil. Battle and war are more picturesque or more poetic terms than fight: they are used chiefly in a figurative sense, the first to suggest a continuous assailing or attacking of the enemy or other method characteristic of open battle, and the second to suggest the noise, fury, or tumult of war; as, he found he must battle his way to success; "[I] Sometimes a patriot, active in debate, Mix with the world, and battle for the State" (Pope); "Who loved, who suffer'd countless ills, Who battled for the True, the Just" (Tennyson); "He *war*s with darkling Powers (I war with a darkling sea)" (Kipling).

Ana. Quarrel, wrangle, altercation, squabble (see under QUARREL, n.): resist, combat, withstand, *oppose: compete with, vie with, *rival.

content, contented. Satisfied (see under SATISFY).

Ana. Gratifed, pleased (see PLEASE): sated, satiated, cloyed, surfeited (see SATIATE): replete (see FULL).

content, v. *Satisfy.

Ana. Gratify, *please: sate, *satisfy, surfeit, cloy.

Con. Tantalize, tease (see WORRY): pique, stimulate, *provoke, excite.

contention. Dissension, variance, strife, *discord, conflict.

Ana. *Quarrel, wrangle, altercation, squabble: controversy, dispute, *argument: contending, fighting, warring (see CONTENT).

Con. Agreement, concurrence, coincidence (see corresponding verbs at AGREE): *harmony, accord, concord, consonance.

contentious. Quarrelsome, bellicose, litigious, *belligerent, pugnacious.

Ana. *Contrary, perverse, froward: captious, faultfinding, caviling, carping (see CRITICAL): *aggressive, militant.

Ant. Peaceable. — Con. *Pacific, peaceful, irenic: serene, tranquil, *calm: *amiable, good-natured, complaisant, obliging.

conterminous. Contiguous, abutting, adjoining, *adjacent, tangent, juxtaposed.

contest, n. Contest, conflict, combat, fight, affray, fray agree in denoting a battle between opposing forces for supremacy, for possessions, or the like. Contest is the broadest term; originally it referred merely to strife in argument but it is now applicable to any struggle, whether friendly or hostile, for a common object, that involves a test of ability, strength, endurance, or strategic skill; as, a swimming contest; a contest of wits. "What mighty contests rise from trivial things" (Pope). Conflict always implies discord and warfare (literal or figurative); it also suggests a closer engagement than contest. "Arms on armor clashing brayed...dire was the noise of conflict" (Milton). Figuratively, conflict frequently denotes a struggle (often spiritual or mental) between opposing principles or forces. "There is [in a Shakespearean tragedy] an outward conflict of persons and groups, there is also a conflict of forces in the hero's soul" (Bradley). Combat is less commonly used in a figurative sense (as, a combat against despair): it implies an encounter, especially an armed encounter, between two (individuals, parties, or forces), frequently for the determination of a dispute. "Let these have a day appointed them for a single combat in convenient place" (Shak.). Fight usually implies a hand-to-hand conflict and therefore emphasizes the individual participants. It ranges in dignity from a spiritual struggle (as, "Fight the good fight of faith" — 1 Timothy vi. 12) to actual fisticuffs; as, a prize fight. Affray commonly refers to a tumultuous disturbance, such as a street fight between mobs or factions, that inspires terror. Legally, an affray is a fight that disturbs the public peace; in literary use the word is often applied to an unseemly or acrimonious dispute; as, "the suppressing of riots and affrays" (Burke); "days of European crises, diplomatic affrays, hecatombic accidents" (C. E. Montague); "some bloody affray between scholars" (Quiller-Couch). Fray is now chiefly either a literary term, often with more dignified connotations than affray of which it is otherwise a very close synonym, or it is, in colloquial use, a humorous or hyperbolic substitute for contest, game, etc. "Where are the vile beginners of this fray?" "O noble prince, I can discover all The unlucky manage of this fatal brawl" (Shak.). Ana. *Encounter, skirmish, brush: competition, emulation, rivalry (see corresponding verbs at RIVAL): *battle, engagement, action, push.

contiguous. Adjoining, abutting, conterminous, *adjacent, tangent, juxtaposed.

Ana. *Nearest, next: *close, near, nigh, near by.

continence. *Temperance, abstemiousness, sobriety, abstinence.

Ana. Chasteness or chastity, purity (see corresponding adjectives at CHASTE): moderateness or moderation, temperateness (see corresponding adjectives at MODERATE).

Ant. Incontinence. — Con. Lecherousness, lustfulness, lewdness, lasciviousness, licentiousness, wantonness (see corresponding adjectives at LICENTIOUS): excessiveness, inordinateness (see corresponding adjectives at EXCESSIVE).

continent, adj. Temperate, unimpassioned, *sober.

Ana. Restrained, bridled, curbed, inhibited (see RESTRAIN): decent, *chaste, pure: self-denying, self-abnegating (see corresponding nouns under RENUNCIATION).

Ant. Incontinent.

contingency. Emergency, exigency, pinch, *juncture, pass, strait, crisis.

Ana. Chance, break, *opportunity, occasion, time, tide.

contingent. 1 *Accidental, fortuitous, casual, incidental, adventitious.

Ana. Possible, *probable, likely: unforeseen or unforeseeable, unanticipated or unanticipable (see affirmative verbs at FORESEE).

Con. Inevitable, necessary, *certain.

2 Conditional, *dependent, relative, adjective.

Ana. Subject, *liable, open, exposed, incident.

Con. Absolute, *ultimate, categorical.

continual. Continual, continuous, constant, incessant, perpetual, perennial are here compared as meaning characterized by continued occurrence or recurrence over a relatively long period of time. Continual implies a close or unceasing succession or recurrence; continuous, an uninterrupted continuity or union, of objects, events, parts, or the like; as, to ensure a continual supply of provisions at regular intervals; "a continuous series" (De Quincey); "continual and regular impulses of pleasurable surprise from the metrical arrangement" (Wordsworth); "Analytic studies are continuous, and not to be pursued by fits and starts, or fragmentary efforts" (De Quincey); "The continual suggestion of the landscape... entering... into the texture of continuous intelligent narration" (Stevenson). As applied to objects in the singular, continual also stresses frequently the idea of going on indefinitely (though not without interruptions) in time, rather than (like continuous) that of unbroken connection or substance; thus, "continual industry" (Stevenson) implies that one is always at it; "continuous labor" (Haslitt), that the work itself is performed at a stretch; so, "He that is of a merry heart hath a continual feast" (Proverbs xv. 15); "That dull and continuous burden of the sea heard inland before or after a great storm" (J. R. Lowell). Continuous refers to both time and space, continual only to time; as, a continuous (not continual) expanse; a continual (or continuous) noise; "Humanism has been sporadic, but Christianity continuous" (T. S. Eliot). Constant, as here compared, implies uniform, steady, or persistent occurrence or recurrence; it usually connotes lack of change or variation in character, degree, or the like; as, constant interruptions; the constant throbbing of the engine; "Such a career meant constant toil" (Buchan). Incessant implies ceaseless or uninterrupted activity; perpetual (as here compared: see LASTING) unending repetition or lasting duration; as, "an incessant cough" (Cowper); "perpetual colds" (Cowper); "the most delightful little girl in the world chattering incessantly" (FitzGerald); "the perpetual fuel of controversy" (J. H. Newman). Perennial carries the implication of existence over an indeterminate number of years; in older use this idea was stressed and that of exhaustlessness was often connoted; as, "the perennial beauty and heroism of the homeliest human nature" (J. R. Lowell); "the perennial feeling of silent worship" (Carlyle). In current use, probably because of the application of the term to plants that die down to the roots and spring up again seasonally over a number of years, perennial often implies continual recurrence or constant renewal; as, "revolt is perennial" (Lowes); "the perennial question of the relation between 'ought' and 'is,' of obligation and fact" (S. Alexander). Ana. Unceasing, endless, never-ending, interminable, *everlasting: eternal (see INFINITE): *lasting, permanent, perdurable.

Ant. Intermittent. — Con. Recurrent, periodic, alternate (see INTERMITTENT): *fitful, spasmodic.

continuance. *Continuation, continuity.

Ana. Endurance, persistence, lasting (see corresponding verbs at CONTINUE): perseverance, persistence (see corresponding verbs at PERSEVERE): remaining, staying, tarrying (see STAY).

continuation. Continuation, continuance, continuity are often confused, especially when meaning the quality, the act, or the state of continuing or of being continued or an instance revealing such a quality, action, or state. Continuation suggests prolongation or resumption; as, the continuation of a line, a story; "It's the continuation of a philosophic plan" (Meredith). "The boy from a good classical school finds that his college Latin, Greek, and mathematics are the natural continuation of what he has already acquired" (Grandgent). Continuance implies duration, perseverance, or stay; as, "eleven years' continuance" (Shak.); "patient continuance in well doing" (Romans ii. 7); our continuance in the city depends on our boy's health; "the idleness and vice of many years' continuance" (Austen). Continuity stresses uninterrupted or unbroken connection, sequence, or extent; as, the continuity of a series, a surface, a discourse; continuity of attention; "the entire breach of continuity in your history made by the Revolution" (Arnold). "Space and time are thus vehicles of continuity by which the world's parts hang together" (W. James). In the technical language of those engaged in making motion pictures or in radio broadcasting, continuity denotes that which is written in advance (such as the scenario of a motion picture or the lines to be spoken in a radio broadcast) as provision for perfection in sequence and in timing of the performance. Ana. Extending or extension, prolonging or prolongation, protracting or protraction (see corresponding verbs at EXTEND).

Ant. Cessation.

continue. Continue, last, endure, abide, persist agree in meaning to remain indefinitely in existence or in a given condition or course. Continue distinctively refers to the process, and stresses its lack of an end rather than the duration of, or the qualities involved in, that process. Often, in addition, it suggests an unbroken course. "What a man is as an end perishes when he dies; what he produces as a means continues to the end of time" (B. Russell). Last, and especially its derivative lasting, when unqualified usually stress length of existence passing that which is normal or expected. "The anger of slow, mild, loving people has a lasting quality" (Deland). When qualified, last often loses this distinctive implication; as, the refrigerator is guaranteed to last five years; the tire lasted only three months. Endure adds to last the implication of resistance, especially to destructive forces or agencies. "For living things, who suffer pain, May not endure till time can bring them ease" (Amy Lowell). "An art... which endured... until man changed his attitude toward the universe" (H. Adams). Abide, and its derivative abiding, imply stability or constancy, especially in opposition to mutability or impermanence. "Tho' much is taken, much abides" (Tennyson). Persist adds to continue the implication of outlasting the appointed or normal time; it often also connotes recurrence, especially in sporadic instances. "...an attitude towards life, which... persists, with many changes but no breaks, till the closing of the Athenian lecture-rooms by Justinian" (Inge).

Ana. Remain, *stay: survive, *outlive, outlast.

Con. *Arrest, interrupt, check: *stop, cease, desist, quit, discontinue: suspend, stay, intermit, *defer, postpone.

continuity. *Continuation, continuance.

Ana. *Succession, sequence, chain, train, progression.

Con. Intermittence, recurrence, alternation, periodicity (see corresponding adjectives at INTERMITTENT): fitfulness (see corresponding adjective at FITFUL).

continuous. Constant, perpetual, perennial, *continual, incessant.

Ana. Connected, related, linked (see JOIN): successive, *consecutive, sequent, serial: *steady, constant, uniform.

Ant. Interrupted. — Con. *Intermittent, recurrent, periodic, alternate.

contort. Distort, gnarl, warp, *deform.

Ana. Twist, bend, turn, *curve.

contour. *Outline, silhouette, sky line, profile.

Ana. Configuration, shape, *form, conformation, figure.

contract, n. Contract, bargain, compact, pact, treaty, entente, convention, cartel, covenant, concordat, indenture, mise designate an agreement reached after negotiation and ending in an exchange of promises between the parties concerned. Contract applies especially but not exclusively to a formal written agreement, often of a business nature, couched in such explicit terms as to be enforceable at law. "A regular contract to the above effect was drawn up by a lawyer, and signed and sealed in the presence of witnesses" (N. Hawthorne). Bargain applies especially to an agreement regarding purchase and sale; as, this bargain provides for an exchange of so much American wheat and cotton for so much British rubber and tin. A compact is an earnest or solemn exchange of promises, sometimes between state or political groups and often between persons. A compact may be unwritten or undocumented, the only assurance of its execution being the trust which each party places in the word of honor of the other or others. The word is used when a keen sense of the obligation which it imposes is assumed of each of the parties. "Men and women... marry and promise loyalty to some one person. They can keep that compact and yet not shut themselves away from other men and other women" (R. Macaulay). "Let us make a compact. I shall do everything to please you, and you must promise to do everything to please me" (Hudson). "The National Assembly, inspired by Thiers's patriotism, adopted... the 'Compact of Bordeaux,' whereby it was agreed that political differences should be put aside in order to carry through expeditiously the work of reconstruction" (J. S. Schapiro). Pact, as used of an agreement between persons or groups is usually interchangeable with compact; but, except in certain stereotyped expressions (as, suicide pact, an agreement between two persons to commit suicide), pact is much rarer than compact for an agreement between persons. "The Pact of Corfu was a constitutional pact wherein leaders of the southern Slavs agreed to join in a unitary kingdom" (The Nation). Since the World War, especially, helped perhaps by the popularity with newspaper headline writers which its brevity won for it, pact has been used with increasing frequency in the (often unofficial) title of agreements between states; in this use it is frequently interchanged with treaty, which is the generic term for an agreement between states, made by negotiation or diplomacy; as, the Lateran Pact or Treaty (establishing Vatican City); the Locarno Pact or Treaty; a nonaggression pact or treaty; a trade pact, a commercial treaty. Treaty, and never pact, however, is the term for an agreement establishing peace after a period of armed hostility; as, the Treaty of Versailles. Entente is the French word for understanding; as used in English, it is often short for entente cordiale, a cordial or amicable agreement between nations in regard to their foreign affairs, as a promise of joint military action in case of aggression against any adherent to the entente; as, the Triple Entente (between France, Great Britain, and Russia). An entente may or may not be set forth in a published document; in fact, it may not be in writing at all: it may be based simply on an exchange of promises between heads of government, or may be merely a state of mind of the peoples concerned. "Captain Lindbergh is busily occupied in establishing an exceedingly cordial entente between France and the United States" (Springfield [Mass.] Union). The word is also used of an understanding between groups, as between economic competitors. "The signing of the steel entente... by the producers of Germany, France, Belgium, Luxemburg, and the Saar marked another step in the effort of these continental countries to coordinate their production and sales to avoid cutthroat competition" (U. S. Daily). Convention, in current use, is usually an agreement which is either less formal or more specific than a treaty; it may be an agreement between several states regulating matters affecting all of them, such as postage, copyright, the conduct of war, etc., or an agreement between commanders of armies in respect to military operations. "The conventions for suspending hostilities agreed upon by me with Marshals Soult and Suchet" (Wellington). A cartel (see also MONOPOLY) is a written agreement or convention between opposing nations as, in view of or during war, for the regulation of intercourse between them. Cartels provide for the treatment and exchange of prisoners, for postal and telegraphic communication, for the mode of reception of bearers of flags of truce, for the treatment of the wounded, etc. Covenant has special reference to a sworn or solemn engagement to uphold or defend a faith, a principle, or the like; as, the Scottish National Covenant of 1638 (a covenant to support Presbyterianism), the Covenant of the League of Nations. "I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth" (Genesis ix. 13). Concordat usually applies to an agreement between the pope and a secular government for regulating the relations between church and state; as, the Concordat of Worms, an agreement with Germany (1122) regulating investiture of bishops and abbots. Less often, the term is used for any agreement regulating ecclesiastical matters. "The prospect of a union of the Protestant Episcopal church and the Presbyterian Church... which a concordat proposed a year ago" (Springfield [Mass.] Republican). An indenture is an agreement in writing between two or more parties, whereof each party has usually a counterpart or duplicate. Such agreements were originally executed in duplicate, the parts being indented by a notched cut or line either by laying them together and cutting them, or, when written on the same piece of parchment, by cutting them apart along a notched line so that the two papers or parchments corresponded to each other. Specifically, the word is used (especially in the plural) for a contract by which an apprentice is bound to a master, or a servant to service in a colony, etc. Mise implies a determination of expenses, and a settlement of these by agreement; as, the mise of Amiens (1264) between King Henry III of England and the rebelling barons.

contract, v. 1 Pledge, covenant, engage, *promise, plight.

2 Catch, *incur.

Con. *Escape, avoid, evade, elude, shun, eschew: avert, ward off, *prevent.

3 Contract, shrink, condense, compress, constrict, deflate agree in denoting to decrease in bulk, volume, or content, but they vary widely in their suggestion as to how this decrease is effected and what consequences it has. Contract means to draw together the sides or the particles of, especially by a force from within, with a consequent reduction in compass or a compacting of the mass; as, the heart, by contracting and dilating rhythmically, keeps up the circulation of the blood; molten iron contracts as it cools. Shrink means to contract (literally or figuratively) so as to fall short of its original length, bulk, or volume; as, to shrink cloth; his assets have shrunk; apples often shrink before rotting. Condense denotes reduction, usually of something more or less homogeneous, to greater compactness without material loss of content; as, to condense a gas to a liquid; to condense a speech into a few paragraphs. Compress, which also means to reduce to a compact state, differs from condense in that it connotes a pressing (often, a squeezing) of something formless or diffused into definite shape or into a small compass; as, to compress air; to compress cotton into bales; to compress the events of a lifetime into a play taking three hours to present. Constrict means to make narrow or smaller in diameter either by contraction or by squeezing; as, the pores of certain bodies are constricted under the influence of cold; the throat is constricted by too tight a collar. Deflate means to cause to shrink by exhausting of gas, air, or figuratively, of something insubstantial; as, to deflate a balloon; to deflate a wild rumor or an undeserved reputation.

Ana. Dwindle, diminish, *decrease, reduce.

Ant. Expand. — Con. Dilate, swell, distend, inflate (see EXPAND).

contradict. *Deny, gainsay, negative, contravene, traverse, impugn.

Ana. *Dispute (see DISCUSS): controvert, *disprove, refute, confute: belie (see MISREPRESENT).

Ant. Confirm. — Con. Corroborate, verify, authenticate, substantiate (see CONFIRM).

contradictory, adj. Contrary, antithetical, *opposite, antonymous, antipodal.

Ana. Negating, nullifying (see NULLIFY): counter, counteractive, antagonistic, *adverse.

Con. Agreeing, squaring, tallying, jibing (see AGREE).

contradictory, n. Contrary, antithesis, opposite, antonym, antipodes. See under OPPOSITE, adj.

Ana. *Converse, reverse.

contraption. Gadget, *device, contrivance.

Ana. Appliance, tool, instrument, *implement, utensil: *machine, engine, apparatus: expedient, makeshift (see RESOURCE).

contrary, adj. 1 Antithetical, *opposite, contradictory, antonymous, antipodal.

Ana. Divergent, disparate, *different: counter, antagonistic, *adverse: negating, nullifying (see NULLIFY).

2 Contrary, perverse, restive, balky, froward, wayward come into comparison when they mean given to opposing wishes, commands, conditions, circumstances, and the like. A person is contrary who by nature or disposition is so self-willed that he cannot or will not accept dictation or advice (as, she is the most contrary child I have ever seen) or who vigorously objects to any arrangements or plans made by others (as, "They've been in your way all these years, and you've always complained of them, so don't be contrary, sir"—Calder). A person (or, by extension, one of his acts, utterances, or desires) is perverse who by temperament or disposition, or sometimes by physical constitution or moral character, runs counter to what is right, true, correct, in keeping with human nature, or the like, especially as determined by the moral law, by custom, or by the law of nature or the state. Sometimes, like contrary, the term suggests obstinate willfulness, but even then it usually carries a stronger suggestion of wrongheadedness; as, "Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth" (1 Timothy vi. 5); "They will not be resolute and firm, but perverse and obstinate" (Burke). More often, however, the term suggests defiance or disobedience to the law, especially the moral law or the established proprieties; as, "she knows how to manage perverse children" (H. Adams); "The poet's sense of responsibility to nothing but his own inner voice, is perhaps his only way of preserving poetic integrity against the influences of a perverse generation" (Day Lewis). In current use, perverse sometimes suggests perversion, or a sexual maladjustment that reveals itself in aberrant or abnormal desires or acts. "The presence of a small minority of abnormal or perverse persons . . . affords no excuse for restricting the liberty of the many to the standard of the few" (H. Ellis). "The last perverse whim which has taken possession of the debauchee" (J. W. Krutch). A person is restive (in the strict sense in which it is here considered: see also RESTLESS) who obstinately refuses to obey the commands or the will of another: the term may imply inaction or a turning in another direction (as, "This Parliament—We'll summon it . . . I'll care For everything. . . . 'If they prove restive. . . ' I shall be with you"—Browning) but more often it suggests intractability or unruliness (as, "Your colonies become suspicious, restive, and untractable"—Burke). A person or, more often, an animal such as a horse is balky when he or it stops short and refuses to go further, as in the desired direction or in the performance of something undertaken; as, the horse never proved balky until he reached the foot of a steep hill; a child often becomes balky when he is asked to solve a problem beyond his powers. A person (often a child) is froward who is so contrary or so prone to disobedience that he will not comply with the most reasonable of requests or suggestions: the term usually suggests a characteristic rather than an occasional or a justifiable reaction. "All the words of my mouth are in righteousness; there is nothing froward or perverse in them" (Proverbs viii. 8). "I never entered on disobedience without having settled with myself that the fun of it would be worth the pains, scorned repentance, and endured correction with a philosophy which got me the reputation of being a hardened and froward child" (M. Austin). A person is wayward who is so perverse that he is incapable of government by those in authority over him and therefore goes his own way, however wanton, capricious, or depraved it may be; as, an institution for wayward girls; "I have been wild and wayward, but you'll forgive me now" (Tennyson). Things that are erratic or follow no clear law or principle are also describable as wayward; as, wayward fancies; wayward opinions.

Ana. Refractory, recalcitrant, intractable, headstrong, *unruly: contumacious, rebellious, *insubordinate.

Ant. Good-natured, complaisant. — Con. *Amiable, obliging: *compliant, acquiescent: amenable, tractable (see OBEDIENT).

contrary, n. Antithesis, opposite, contradictory, antonym, antipodes. See under OPPOSITE, adj.

Ana. *Converse, reverse.

contrast, v. *Compare, collate.

contrast, n. *Comparison, collation, parallel, antithesis.

Ana. Distinction, difference, divergence, *dissimilarity, unlikeness: conflict, *discord.

contravene. *Deny, contradict, traverse, impugn, negative.

Ana. *Oppose, combat, resist: controvert, *disprove, transgress, violate (see corresponding nouns at BREACH): *trespass, encroach, infringe.

Ant. Uphold (law, principle, etc.): allege (right, claim, privilege).

contravention. Trespass, transgression, violation, infringement, *breach, infraction.

Ana. *Offense, vice, sin, crime.

Con. Compliance, acquiescence (see under COMPLIANT).

contribute. *Conduce, redound, accrue.

Ana. Concur, co-operate, combine, *unite: *help, aid, assist: promote, further, forward, *advance.

contribution. *Donation, benefaction, alms.

Ana. Grant, subvention, subsidy, *appropriation: *gift, present, largess, boon.

contributory. *Auxiliary, ancillary, adjuvant, subservient, accessory.

Ana. Concurring, co-operating (see UNITE): helping or helpful, aiding, assisting or assistant (see corresponding verbs at HELP).

contrition. Attrition, repentance, *penitence, compunction, remorse.

Ana. *Sorrow, grief, regret: confessing or confession, shriving or shrift, absolving or absolution, remitting or remission (see corresponding verbs at CONFESS).

contrivance. *Device, gadget, contraption.

Ana. Invention, creation, discovery (see corresponding verbs at INVENT): *implement, tool, instrument, appliance, utensil: *machine, engine, apparatus.

contrive. *Manage, afford.

Ana. Plan, plot, scheme, design (see under PLAN, n.).

A colon (:): groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

control, v. Direct, manage, *conduct.

Ana. *Govern, rule: regulate, *adjust: *guide, lead, pilot, engineer, steer: *restrain, curb, check.

control, n. 1 Command, dominion, authority, *power, jurisdiction, sway.

Ana. Ascendancy, *supremacy: might, puissance, *power, force: management, direction (see corresponding verbs at CONDUCT).

Con. Mutiny, revolt, *rebellion.

2 *Corrective, check, antidote.

Ana. Regulation, *law, ordinance, rule, precept, statute, canon: experiment, *experience.

controversial. Controversial, eristic, polemic, polemical, apologetic (or apologetical) come into comparison when they mean disputatious in character or intent. Controversial, like all the other words in this group, is applicable to writings and speeches involving disputation, and to the tone or temper of the disputants, but it does not as expressly indicate the method or the purpose as some of the others; as, the controversial writings of Theodore Roosevelt; his object in this article is didactic rather than controversial. When specifically applied to subjects, questions, issues, proposals, and the like, controversial is richer in its implications and suggests provocativeness, violent difference of opinion, and sometimes the activities of propagandists; as, controversial subjects should be avoided in drawing-room conversation; to exclude controversial matter from the radio. "Boys and girls ought to be encouraged to take an interest in current controversial questions of importance. . . and . . . to read all sides in such controversies, not only the orthodox side" (B. Russell). Eristic (the least frequent of these words) stresses the method of disputation more than its purpose or its subject matter; it often specifically implies sophistry, quibbling, captiousness, or attention to details rather than to the larger issues involved. "He fought the combat syllogistic With . . . skill and art eristic" (T. Moore). Polemic and polemical both emphasize the spirit and the methods of combat, or of ardent defense of one's beliefs or views, or especially of the doctrines of one's religious faith. Usually the words imply the intent to refute errors or to make converts but because of their association with violent religious controversies they have acquired unpleasant connotations of contentiousness, rancor in argument, and intemperance in attack; as, the discussion took on a polemic tone; the polemical style of Milton's treatises on divorce. "After the fiery stimulants, compounded of brimstone and bigotry, offered by the polemic theologians, the gentle sedative of Montaigne's conversation comes like a draft of nepenthe" (Preserved Smith). Apologetic, also, suggests partisanship, and the defense of one's beliefs, especially of one's religious beliefs. But it often implies an expository rather than an argumentative method, and stresses the clearing up of misunderstandings by an appeal to reason rather than the refutation of errors on the other side or the indication of agreements between both sides. "It was also stipulated [by the editor] that the essays should not be directly apologetic in tendency. The book is neither a defence of Christianity nor a criticism of it" (Inge).

Ana. Disputed or disputable, debated or debatable, argued (see corresponding verbs at DISCUSS); argumentative, disputatious (see corresponding nouns at ARGUMENTATION).

controversy. Dispute, *argument.

Ana. Contention, dissension (see DISCORD): disputation, *argumentation, forensic, debate.

controvert, v. Rebut, refute, *disprove, confute.

Ana. Contravene, traverse, impugn, *deny, gainsay:

*oppose, combat: dispute, debate, agitate, argue, *discuss.

Ant. Assert. — Con. Defend, justify, *maintain, vindicate.

contumacious. Rebellious, *insubordinate, mutinous, seditious, factious.

Ana. *Contrary, perverse, froward: refractory, recalcitrant, intractable, ungovernable, *unruly, headstrong.

Ant. Obedient. — Con. *Compliant, acquiescent, resigned: amenable, tractable, docile (see OBEDIENT).

contumelious. *Abusive, opprobrious, vituperative, scurrilous, scurrile, scurril.

Ana. Insolent, overbearing, arrogant, disdainful (see PROUD): humiliating, demeaning, debasing, abasing (see ABASE): flouting, scoffing, jeering, sneering (see SCOFF).

Ant. Obsequious. — Con. Complimenting or complimentary, commending or commendatory, applauding (see corresponding verbs at COMMEND).

conundrum. Puzzle, riddle, enigma, problem, *mystery.

convenance. Convention, usage, *form.

convene. Convoke, muster, *summon, call, cite.

Ana. *Gather, congregate, assemble, collect.

Ant. Adjourn. — Con. Disperse, *scatter: dissolve, prorogue (see ADJOURN): dismiss, *eject.

convent. *Cloister, nunnery, monastery, abbey, priory.

convention. 1 Convention, convocation, conference, congress, council, synod are the most general terms in English use designating a body of representatives, executives, or the like, called together for deliberation and action on the affairs of a larger body. In American use, convention is the most general of these terms, usually implying little more than a meeting of representatives for a common and definitely stated purpose or purposes. It is the ordinary term for an annual or periodic meeting of representatives from all the branches of an association or organization within a given area, such as a county, a state, or a nation, for the purpose of transacting business and electing officers; as, the state convention of the American Legion; the annual convention of the National Education Association. It is also applied to a meeting of elected representatives of a political party in the nation or a state to nominate candidates for a coming election and to frame a party platform; as, in 1940, the Democratic convention was held in Chicago, the Republican convention in Philadelphia. A meeting of elected representatives to frame a new constitution or to amend an old constitution for one of the states of the United States is called a constitutional convention. In British use, the term is even more general, for it equals assembly: when applied to any gathering of representatives in the American sense, it usually suggests a more or less informal character. The preferred terms in British use are convocation (especially for a formal assembly of the clergy of a province of the Church of England or their representatives [as, the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury; the Convocation of the Province of York] or for a deliberative or advisory body composed of all or some of the graduates of one of the universities) and conference for formal and, often, periodic meetings of representatives of an organization or association (as, the annual conference of the National Union of Teachers; an international monetary conference). But conference is used for an annual assembly of Methodist ministers, as of a given district (sometimes also called a conference), for the transaction of ecclesiastical business, or an assembly of representatives or committees from the various branches of a legislative body for consultation or adjustments of legislation, or, in a more general sense, for any assembly of representatives or executives of an organization or corporation whose chief purposes are to consult, deliberate, and decide. Congress, because of its use as a designation of the body which exercises legislative power in a country, especially in the United States, is not so common in general use as formerly. It still applies, however, to any formal assembly or large body gathered in formal assembly to discuss and decide questions of great significance: the term usually imputes an exalted character to the representatives who make up that body and, therefore, is used especially of a conference of princes, envoys, deputies, or the like; as, a pan-American congress; an international congress in the interest of peace, the Congress of Vienna readjusted territories and governments after the Napoleonic wars. The term is also applied to any extremely large assembly or body composed not of appointed or elective representatives but of voluntary attendants from far and near who meet for a common purpose; as, a Eucharistic congress. Council is applicable to a body, small or large, assembled for consultation, deliberation, and decision or advice. It is the historical term for any of the great bodies of ecclesiastics convened to legislate on matters of doctrine, discipline, morals, or law affecting the Christian church or, since the Reformation, the Roman Catholic Church; thus, the great councils, such as the Nicene Council, convoked from the entire church, are called ecumenical councils; a council convoked and presided over by a bishop and composed of the clergy of his diocese is called, in the Roman Catholic and some other churches, a diocesan council. In Protestant churches where council is used, it applies to a deliberative and advisory rather than a legislative body. Council is also specifically applied both to a smaller advisory group, such as one (termed executive council) that advises the executive of a nation or state (as, specifically, the king's privy council in Great Britain, a governor's council in some states of the United States, the executive council in some British colonies) and to a legislative body of a city, borough, county, or the like; as, a city council (sometimes, common council); a county council. Synod, which in general denotes an ecclesiastical council, is used largely by Protestant and Orthodox denominations, with, however, great variations in application; thus, the holy synod of an Orthodox church, such as the Russian or Greek Orthodox churches, is its governing body; in Presbyterian, Lutheran, and Dutch (and other) Reformed churches, it is a governing or advisory body having only the powers and jurisdiction granted it by the congregations which send members or delegates to it: in the Protestant Episcopal Church, a synod is a provincial assembly of bishops and elected clerical and lay diocesan representatives.

Ana. Assembly, assemblage, congregation, gathering (see under GATHER).

2 Entente, compact, pact, treaty, covenant, cartel, concordat, *contract, bargain, indenture, mise.

Ana. *Agreement, accord, understanding.

3 *Form, convenience, usage.

conventional. Formal, ceremonious, *ceremonial, solemn.

Ana. *Decorous, proper, comme il faut, seemly, decent: *correct, right, precise.

Ant. Unconventional. — Con. *Negligent, slack, lax, remiss: *natural, simple, unsophisticated, ingenuous, naïve, artless.

conversant. Conversant, versed come into comparison because they agree in meaning being familiar with something: they are seldom, if ever, found in attributive use. Conversant (usually followed by with) implies a familiarity with a subject, a field of knowledge, the writings on that subject or in that field, or the like, that comes from long association, long experience, frequent intercourse, or many dealings with them; as, "Those men who are most conversant with American affairs" (J. Bright); "Like Walpole... he was thoroughly conversant with questions of finance" (Lecky); "The Pilgrim's Progress is known not only to everyone who is conversant with the other writings of the period, but to thousands, the world around, who never heard of... [Bacon's] Essays" (Lowe). Versed (followed by in), though often used interchangeably with conversant, in discriminating use carries not only an implication of familiarity with something, but of skill, adeptness, proficiency, or the like, as in an art or a profession; thus, to be versed in law (but, to be conversant with the laws of all European countries); to be versed in medicine (but, to be conversant with all the new methods of treating pneumonia). Because of this added implication, versed is often used in combination; as, well-versed; ill-versed; poorly versed. "I don't think him [Leigh Hunt] deeply versed in life" (Byron).

Ana. Intimate, *familiar: informed, acquainted (see INFORM): *learned, erudite: adept, *proficient, skilled, expert, skillful.

Ant. Ignorant.

conversation, converse. Communion, commune, communication, *intercourse, commerce, traffic, dealings, correspondence.

Ana. Conversing, talking or talk, speaking or speech (see corresponding verbs at SPEAK).

converse, v. Talk, *speak.

Ana. *Express, voice, broach, air, ventilate, vent, utter: *chat, chatter, gabble: *gossip, tattle: *discourse, descant, expatiate, dilate.

converse, n.¹ See CONVERSATION.

converse, n.² Converse, obverse, reverse are frequently confused when they mean that which is the opposite of another thing. Converse applies chiefly to statements or to propositions; because it etymologically connotes a turning about, in strict use it implies an interchange or transposition of the important terms; as, the converse of "None but the brave deserves the fair" is "None but the fair deserves the brave." Converse is not to be confused with contradictory (see under OPPOSITE, adj.); thus, the contradictory of "None but the brave deserves the fair" would be "All but the brave deserve the fair." So long as the important terms are transposed, one proposition is the converse of another whether or not it is its opposite. "The feeling that society needs protection against the individual rather than the converse" (Brownell). Obverse and reverse are specifically applied to the two faces of a coin, medal, etc.; obverse applying to the one containing the head or principal inscription, reverse to the other. More generally, obverse refers to the more, reverse to the less, apparent or intentionally conspicuous side or face of anything (or, in colloquial language, obverse to the right, reverse to the wrong, side or face) as, "Looking at the fair tapestry of Life, with its royal and even sacred figures, he dwells not on the obverse alone, but here chiefly on the reverse; and indeed turns out the rough seams, tatters, and manifold thrums of that unsightly wrong side" (Carlyle).

Ana. Opposite, contrary, antithesis, contradictory (see under OPPOSITE, adj.).

conversion. Transformation, metamorphosis, transmutation, transmogrification, transfiguration. See under TRANSFORM.

convert, v. *Transform, metamorphose, transmute, transmogrify, transfigure.

Ana. Manufacture, fabricate, forge, *make: apply, utilize, employ, *use.

convert, n. Convert, proselyte are synonyms only in their applicability to the same person. Both denote a person who has embraced another creed, opinion, or doctrine than the one he has previously accepted or adhered to. Convert is commonly used in a good sense, implying a sincere and voluntary change of belief: it is, therefore, the designation preferred by the church, the party, or the school of thought of which such a person becomes a new member. Convert is also applied to a person who undergoes the religious experience called conversion, or a turning from a life of sin or indifference to one guided by religious (specifically, Christian) principles and motives. Proselyte was originally applied to any convert to another religion: it is still used in reference to a convert to Judaism who manifests his sincerity and fidelity by strict adherence to religious laws and practices. In general use, however, the term always suggests a being won over, usually by an apostle, a missionary, or a zealot, but, sometimes, by another with less praiseworthy motives; as, "Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte" (Matthew xxiii. 15). Proselyte is often, but not invariably, the designation preferred by the members of a church for one formerly of their number who has been converted to another faith. The term is also applied to any person won over to a party, a cause, or a way of life in which he has formerly expressed disbelief; as, "You agree with the rest of the married world in a propensity to make proselytes" (Shenstone).

Ana. Neophyte, *novice.

Con. Apostate, *renegade, pervert, backslider, recreant, turncoat.

convertible. *Reciprocal, correspondent, correlative, complementary.

Ana. Interchangeable, exchangeable (see corresponding verbs at EXCHANGE).

convey. 1 Transport, *carry, transmit, bear.

Ana. *Move, remove, shift, transfer: take, fetch, *bring.

2 *Transfer, deed, alienate, alien.

Ana. Consign, *commit, relegate: *sell, vend, trade, auction, barter.

convict, n. *Prisoner, captive.

conviction. 1 Assurance, certitude, *certainty.

Ana. Faith, *belief, credence, credit: *creed, confession, symbol.

Con. Doubt, *uncertainty, dubiety, dubiousity, skepticism: disbelief, *unbelief, incredulity.

2 Belief, persuasion, *opinion, view, sentiment.

Ana. Tenet, dogma, *doctrine: judgment, conclusion (see under INFER).

convincing. Telling, cogent, *valid, sound.

Ana. Proving, demonstrating (see PROVE): persuading or persuasive, inducing (see corresponding verbs at INDUCE): forceful, forcible, potent, *powerful.

convivial. Companionable, *social, gregarious, hospitable, co-operative.

Ana. Sociable, genial, cordial, affable, *gracious: gay, *lively, vivacious: *merry, jocund, jolly, jovial: hilarious, mirthful (see corresponding nouns at MIRTH).

Ant. Taciturn: staid. — Con. Reserved, reticent, *silent: *serious, sober, grave, sedate, solemn: asocial, *unsocial.

convocation. *Convention, conference, congress, council, synod.

Ana. Assembly, assemblage, congregation, gathering (see under GATHER).

convoke. Convene, muster, *summon, call, cite.

Ana. Assemble, *gather, congregate, collect: *invite bid.

Ant. Prorogue, dissolve. — Con. *Adjourn: disperse, *scatter.

convoy, v. Escort, conduct, *accompany, attend, chaperon.

Ana. Protect, shield, guard, safeguard, *defend: *guide, lead, pilot.

convulse. Rock, *shake, agitate.

Ana. *Discompose, disturb, disquiet, perturb.

convulsion. Spasm, paroxysm, *fit, attack, access, accession.

convulsive. Spasmodic, *fitful.

Con. *Steady, uniform, even, equable, constant.

cool. 1 Chilly, *cold, frosty, frigid, freezing, gelid, icy, glacial, arctic.

Ant. Warm.

2 Cool, composed, collected, unruffled, imperturbable, nonchalant come into comparison when applied to persons, their manners, appearance, temper, or acts, in the sense of showing or seeming to show freedom from agitation or excitement. Cool basically implies such self-control that no hint is given of any emotion or motive that might warm, inflame, excite, or impassion. Specifically, it may further imply detachment or dispassionateness (as, "Modest youth, with cool reflection crown'd"—Pope; "My work, I am often told, is cool and serene, entirely reasonable and free of passion"—H. Ellis), or calm courage in assault or under attack (as, soldiers cool under fire), or deliberateness or determination in gaining one's ends (as, "The coquette [Queen Elizabeth] of the presence chamber became the coolest and hardest of politicians at the council board"—J. R. Green), or calm assurance or effrontery (as, "It is the cool manner in which the whole is done that annoys you"—Haslitt), or actual or seeming indifference (as, a cool lover). Composed implies the freedom from signs of agitation or excitement that is characteristic of a decorous, sedate temperament or is the result of self-discipline; as, "In her composed, schooled manner she despised and disliked both father and daughter exceedingly" (Conrad); "She was composed without bravado, contrite without sanctimoniousness" (A. Repplier); "She was pale, and looked as if she hadn't slept, but composed, as she always is" (R. Macaulay). Collected stresses a concentration of the mind or spirit with resulting elimination of all distractions: otherwise it differs little from composed; as, "Be collected: No more amazement" (Shak.); "The most collected spectator" (Arnold); "Mrs. Hawthorne wore her collected Sunday expression, and Tony knew that she did not allow them to talk of mundane affairs on these expeditions to and from church" (Arch. Marshall). Unruffled implies coolness, placidity, and often, poise, in the midst of excitement or when there is cause for agitation; as, while others fretted and fumed, he remained unruffled; "Her mind was unruffled by the spiritual problems which were vexing the minds around her" (J. R. Green). Imperturbable implies such coolness and assurance that one cannot be abashed, annoyed, disconcerted, alarmed, or otherwise disturbed: it usually implies a temperamental rather than an acquired frame of mind; as, "Franklin's imperturbable common sense" (Arnold); "Gautier, working imperturbably in the midst of the clatter of printing presses" (Lowes); "a very good-looking, rosy little man with . . . a soft voice and a manner of imperturbable urbanity" (H. G. Wells). Nonchalant stresses an easy coolness of manner, or casualness that suggests, rather than necessarily implies, indifference or unconcern: it often connotes lightheartedness or off-handedness; as, "God . . . knows, if he is not as indifferent to mortals as the nonchalant deities of Lucretius" (Byron); "Dallying with a cigar, which he smoked nonchalantly as he sang" (T. E. Brown); "He walked in a nonchalant fashion" (D. H. Lawrence).

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

Ana. *Calm, tranquil, serene, placid: detached, aloof, *indifferent: *impassive, stoic, phlegmatic.

Ant. Ardent: agitated. — Con. Fervid, fervent, passionate, perfervid, *impassioned: perturbed, discomposed, disturbed, upset, flustered, flurried (see DIS-COMPOSE).

co-operate. Conjoin, *unite, combine.

Ana. Coincide, *agree, concur: conspire, collude, *connive.

Ant. Counteract. — Con. *Neutralize, negative: *nullify, negate, annul.

Ana. Sociable, cordial, genial, affable, *gracious: helping or helpful, aiding, assisting (see corresponding verbs at HELP).

Ant. Un-co-operative. — Con. *Unsocial, asocial.

cop, v. 1 *Catch, capture, nab, trap, snare, entrap, ensnare, bag.

Ana. Grab, seize, *take, snatch, clutch, grasp.

2 *Steal, filch, pinch, snitch, swipe, lift, pilfer, purloin.

cop, n. *Policeman, officer, copper, bull, bobby, peeler, constable, catchpole, gendarme.

copartner. *Partner, colleague, ally, confederate.

Ana. *Associate, companion, comrade.

cope. *Contend, fight, battle, war.

Ana. Compete with, vie with, *rival, emulate: *oppose, combat, resist, withstand.

copious. *Plentiful, abundant, ample, *plenteous.

Ana. *Profuse, lavish, exuberant, prodigal, luxuriant, lush.

Ant. Meager. — Con. Scanty, scant, scrimpy, sparse, exiguous, spare (see MEAGER): *thin, slight, tenuous, slim, slender.

copper. *Policeman, officer, cop, bull, bobby, peeler, constable, catchpole, gendarme.

copy, n. *Reproduction, duplicate, carbon, carbon copy, transcript, facsimile, replica.

Ana. Counterpart, *parallel: imprint, print, *impression, impress: *image, simulacrum, effigy.

Ant. Original. — Con. Archetype, *prototype.

copy, v. Copy, imitate, mimic, ape, mock agree in meaning to make something like an already existing thing in form, appearance, obvious or salient characteristics, or the like. Copy implies duplication of an original and thereby as close a resemblance as is possible under the circumstances; as, to copy a letter; to copy Da Vinci's "Mona Lisa"; to copy the clothes of a great designer. Imitate stresses following something as a pattern or model; it does not therefore preclude variations from the original; thus, a writer who imitates Keats may merely re-echo enough of that poet's rhythms, images, or sentiments to produce poetry reminiscent of Keats. Imitate may imply emulation (as, to imitate the example of one's elders): it may imply representation in another medium (as, art imitates nature; the dramatist imitates life; the music imitates a storm): it may imply simulation (as, fabrics that imitate leather). Mimic usually implies an exact copying, especially of a person's movements, gestures, voice, mannerisms, etc., sometimes for the sake of making sport of them, but often with the intention of giving a lifelike representation of them. " 'This is disgraceful,' said Maisie, mimicking Mrs. Jennett's tone" (Kipling). "I am sure I repeat her words, though I cannot mimic either the voice or air with which they were spoken" (Fielding). The word sometimes suggests a counterfeiting clever enough to seem real; it therefore often implies the skill of an actor. "I might mimic a passion that I do not feel, but I cannot mimic one that burns me like fire" (Wilde). Ape also implies close copying, sometimes in the spirit of mimicry, but often also in the spirit of emulating that which one admires. "The stout, tall captain... becomes their pattern, upon whom they fix their whole attention, and ape all his tricks" (Cowper). Mock commonly adds to mimic the implication of a derisive intent. It often distinctively suggests immediate repetition of the words or actions mimicked; as, to mock one's teacher; "the babbling echo mocks the hounds" (Shak.); "her shadow still Glower'd about... As though... to mock behind her back" (Keats).

Ant. Originate.

coquet, v. Flirt, *trifle, dally, toy.

cordial. Genial, affable, *gracious, sociable.

Ana. Warm, warmhearted, responsive, sympathetic, *tender: *sincere, heartfelt, hearty, wholehearted.

Con. Cool, *cold, frosty, frigid: *indifferent, aloof, detached, disinterested: reserved, taciturn, *silent.

core, n. *Center, middle, midst, hub, focus, nucleus, heart, omphalos.

corner. 1 Corner, angle denote in common the space included between converging surfaces or lines. In common usage, corner applies to the space included or the projection formed by the convergence of the actual two or three sides or edges of a material structure; as, the corner of a box, a table, a room, a house; a street corner; a chimney corner; to drive into a corner. Angle has usually the more technical sense of the space included between, or the degree of inclination of, two converging lines or planes; as, a right angle; the angle of the faces of a crystal; the walls forming the corner met at an obtuse angle. Angle is also used in the sense of a sharp projection; as, "We rub each other's angles down" (Tennyson); compare "I hit my head against the sharp corner of the table."

Ana. Edge, verge, *border.

2 Pool, *monopoly, syndicate, trust, cartel.

corporal, adj. Corporeal, *bodily, physical, somatic.

Ana. Fleshly, *carnal, animal, sensual.

corporeal. 1 *Material, physical, sensible, phenomenal, objective.

Ana. Actual, *real: tangible, palpable, ponderable, *perceptible.

Ana. Burly, husky, brawny, *muscular: thickset, chunky, stubby, dumpy (see THICK).

Ant. Spare. — Con. *Lean, gaunt, rawboned, angular, lanky, lank, skinny, scrawny: slender, slim, slight, *thin.

corpus. Thesaurus, treasury, *anthology, chrestomathy, chapbook, garland, florilegium.

corpuscle. *Particle, atom, molecule.

correct, v. 1 Correct, rectify, emend, remedy, redress, amend, reform, revise agree in meaning to set or make right that which is wrong. One corrects that which is inaccurate, untrue, or imperfect, or that which contains errors, faults, or defects, when one by substitutions brings it into conformity with a standard or rule of accuracy, truth, or perfection; as, to correct one's mistakes in pronunciation; to correct printers' proofs. "It [appellate jurisdiction]... corrects the proceedings in a cause already instituted" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Also, one corrects a person when one points out his errors or faults for disciplinary purposes (see also PUNISH). "She's been with me such a long time. . . . She takes liberties. I've corrected her once or twice" (Bennett). One thing corrects another thing when the former serves to counteract or neutralize the bad effect of the latter; as, alkaline tablets that correct stomach acidity; his head corrects his heart in the choice of friends. One rectifies something which requires straightening out or ordering because it deviates from the rule or standard of what is right, just, equitable, properly controlled or directed, or the like; as, to rectify a mistake in an account; to rectify an error of judgment; to rectify mischief one has done. "Reason is here no guide, but still a guard: 'Tis hers to rectify, not overthrow, And treat this passion [one's ruling passion] more as friend than foe" (Pope). One emends a thing when one frees it from error or defects; specifically one, as an editor, emends a corrupt text when one replaces doubtful readings with others that are judged to be closer to the original or to the intention of the author; as, the eighteenth-century editors of Shakespeare freely emended the texts of his plays. One remedies that which is a source of evil or harm when one makes such corrections as will either bring about its eradication or restore that which is harmed to a normal, sound, or prosperous condition; as, to remedy an abuse of a privilege; to remedy the maldistribution of relief; to remedy a social evil. One redresses something which involves unfairness, injustice, or lack of proper balance in any way; the word usually suggests reparation or compensation. "There is no calamity which right words will not begin to redress" (Emerson). "The Church looked to charity, not to legislation, to redress social wrongs" (Inge). "The balance [of electricities] is redressed by a mass migration of the electrons out of the overpopulated substance" (Karl K. Darrow). One amends something when one makes such corrections or changes in it that it is bettered or raised to a much higher standard; as, to amend one's ways; to amend one's life. "Laws that are not repealed are amended and amended" (Shaw). One reforms something when one makes drastic changes in it in an attempt to eliminate imperfections; the word usually implies a new form or character; as, to reform the church. "The fact is that the world does not care to be reformed. . . . This makes the way of the improver hard" (S. M. Crothers). One revises something when one looks it over to discover where it requires correction or amendment and makes the necessary changes; as, to revise a book before its second printing; to revise a state constitution. "There can be no doubt as to the jurisdiction of this court to revise the judgment of a Circuit Court" (Ch. Just. Taney).

Ana. *Improve, better, ameliorate; offset, *compensate, counterbalance, balance: *neutralize, counteract: *adjust, regulate, fix: *reprove, reprimand, admonish, chide.

Con. Impair, spoil, mar, *injure, damage, harm, hurt: aggravate, *intensify.

2 Discipline, *punish, chastise, chasten, castigate.

Con. *Indulge, pamper, spoil, humor, baby: condone, *excuse.

correct, adj. Correct, accurate, exact, precise, nice, right agree in meaning conforming to standard, fact, or truth. Correct, the most colorless term, implies scarcely more than freedom from fault or error, as judged by some (usually) conventional or acknowledged standard; as, correct dress, style, deportment. "A supposed center of correct information, correct judgment, correct taste" (Arnold). "Sedley's valet, the most solemn and correct of gentlemen" (Thackeray). Accurate implies, more positively, fidelity to fact or truth attained by the exercise of care; as, an accurate investigation, statement, observer. "A reasonably accurate and refined use of the mother-tongue" (C. W. Eliot). Exact emphasizes the strictness or rigor of the agreement, which neither exceeds nor falls short of the fact, standard, or truth; as, an exact likeness; the exact value; his exact words. "The acquisition of exact knowledge. . . is essential to every kind of excellence" (B. Russell). Precise stresses rather sharpness of definition or delimitation, or scrupulous exactness; as, the precise meaning of a word. "Precise statements of principles" (A. C. Benson). "She did not . . . understand . . . the precise nature of what she was doing" (Conrad). Nice, as here compared, implies great, occasionally excessive, precision and delicacy, as in discrimination, adjustment, or the like; as, a nice calculation, distinction, point of law. "Overbalance the nice adjustment on either side of the scale, and loss is the inevitable result" (Lowes). "This method [of calculating longitude], though theoretically possible, is not sufficiently nice to be of practical value" (Preserved Smith). Right (as here compared: see also GOOD) stresses an absence of deviation from and, therefore, a strict accordance with the facts, the truth, or the standard. Often, it is so close in meaning to correct, that it is only in collocations where the latter's stress on freedom from error or fault is set up against right's emphasis on strict accordance with the facts, truth, or a standard that one can determine which word is preferable; thus, an answer to a problem in arithmetic may be said to be either correct or right; she knows the right (or correct) use of "each" and "every"; a correct (not right) gentleman; the right (not correct) people were invited; though he gave an assumed name the police know his right (better than correct) name.

Ana. *Impeccable, faultless, flawless: punctilious, punctual, scrupulous, meticulous, *careful.

Ant. Incorrect. — Con. *False, wrong: fallacious, casuistical (see under FALLACY).

corrective, n. Corrective, control, check, antidote are here compared only in their extended senses where they agree in denoting something which serves to keep another thing in its desired place or condition. Corrective is applied to any agency or influence which keeps true a thing that is subject to aberration or deviation, or which rectifies or remedies any departure in it from truth, soundness, health, or the like. "The sight of the product [of our work] put to its full uses. . . is the best corrective to our blunders" (H. Suzzallo). "[Louis MacNeice's] work should be a salutary corrective to the sometimes facile optimism and mass-hypnotized rhetoric of the revolutionary poets" (Day Lewis). Control is applied to any predetermined device, rule, agency, or the like, which sets a guard upon a person or thing so as to prevent his (or its) overpassing prescribed limits or so as to enable him or it to be discovered if in error; thus, the Constitution of the United States sets up various controls for the three branches of government, such as the veto power of the president; a scientific investigator sets up a control for an experiment when he provides a means (usually a similar experiment identical in all but one factor) for testing the accuracy of his findings. Check is applied to anything which affords a means of securing or insuring accuracy, uniformity in quality, or the maintenance of a standard; as, duplicate records are kept by different clerks as a check upon each other; by means of state-wide examinations of pupils, the regents keep a check on the efficiency of the schools. Antidote, literally a remedy that counteracts a poison, implies that the harm has been done and that a corrective which will neutralize or nullify these effects is necessary. "There is no antidote against the opium of Time" (Broume). "The

Con. Liberal, progressive: all-round, many-sided, *versatile.

Ant. Provincial: insular: parochial.

cosmos. Universe, macrocosm, *earth, world.

cost, n. Expense, *price, charge.

costly, adj. Costly, expensive, dear, valuable, precious, invaluable, priceless agree in meaning having a high value or valuation, especially in terms of money. Costly, expensive, dear refer to the expenditure or sacrifice involved in obtaining or procuring a thing. Costly applies to that which costs much: it usually implies sumptuousness, rarity, fine workmanship, or the like; as, their home is filled with costly furniture; "I took a costly jewel from my neck. A heart it was, bound in with diamonds" (Shak.). Expensive applies chiefly to that which is high-priced, especially with the implication of a cost beyond the thing's value or the buyer's means; as, an expensive suit of clothes; "The father... was unable to give the child as expensive an education as he had desired" (Froude). Both costly and expensive may be applied to that which involves great losses or is a drain upon one's resources, not only in money but in time, effort, or the like; as, a costly (or expensive) error; costly litigation; a costly (but not, usually, when lives are concerned, expensive) victory. "The rat is expensive to get rid of,

but even more expensive to maintain" (V. Heiser). Dear, as here compared (opposed to cheap), commonly suggests a high, often an exorbitant, price or excessive cost: usually it implies a relation to other factors than the intrinsic worth of a thing; as, "butter is cheap when it is plentiful, and dear when it is scarce" (Shaw); "if she took it into her head to live in the dearest hotel in England" (Bennett); "relatively high wages of building labour bring dearer housing" (J. A. Hobson). Valuable, when applied to things which have monetary value, usually suggests the price they will bring in a sale or exchange; as, the most valuable dog in the kennel; he stores away all his valuable effects when he goes on a tour; a valuable piece of property. Valuable, however, often suggests worth that is not measured in material goods, but in usefulness, serviceableness, advantageousness, or the like; as, a valuable citizen; the most valuable course in one's college career; a valuable piece of evidence; "Food is valuable to the animal and moisture to the plant" (S. Alexander); "Beauty which is humanly valuable but biologically useless" (J. W. Krutch). Precious etymologically comes closer in meaning to costly than to valuable of which it is now a very close synonym. But it carries a heightened implication of worth and often applies to something or someone whose value can scarcely be computed in terms of money; as, "precious friends" (Shak.); "[Wisdom] is more precious than rubies" (Proverbs iii. 15); "To any one who has ever looked on the face of a dead child or parent the mere fact that matter could have taken for a time that precious form, ought to make matter sacred ever after" (W. James); "And these two things, judgment and imagination, are, with knowledge itself, the most precious results of well directed schooling" (Grandgent). When applied to a thing of monetary value, precious usually means that it is one of the rarest and most costly of the class that is named; as, precious stones; "an alabaster box of very precious ointment" (Matthew xxvi. 7), but it may mean that the thing so described is too scarce (and therefore, often, too expensive) to use freely or generally (as, be careful of the butter; it's too precious to waste). Invaluable and priceless literally imply worth that cannot be estimated in any terms. They are sometimes used when precious is actually meant but would seem not quite in keeping for one reason or another; as, an invaluable servant; a priceless jewel. Therefore their use tends to be hyperbolic and often, especially in the case of priceless, loosely intensive; as, I've just heard a priceless story; isn't that dress priceless?

Ana. Exorbitant, extravagant, *excessive: sumptuous, *luxurious, opulent.

Ant. Cheap. — Con. Beggarly, sorry, scurvy, *contemptible: poor, *bad.

coterie. Circle, *set, clique.

couch, v. *Lurk, skulk, slink, sneak.

Ana. *Hide, conceal, screen, secrete, ensconce.

couchant. Recumbent, reclining, dormant, supine, *prone, prostrate.

council. Conference, synod, convocation, congress, *convention.

Ana. Assembly, assemblage, gathering, congregation (see under GATHER).

⚠ Do not confuse council with counsel.

counsel, n. 1 *Advice.

Ana. Admonishing or admonition, chiding, reproaching or reproach (see corresponding verbs at REPROVE): warning, forewarning, cautioning or caution (see corresponding verbs at WARN): precept, rule (see LAW).

⚠ Do not confuse counsel with council.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

2 *Lawyer, counselor, barrister, advocate, attorney, solicitor, proctor, procurator.

counsel, v. Advise (see under ADVICE).

Ana. Admonish, chide (see REPROVE): *warn, forewarn, caution: remonstrate, expostulate (see OBJECT, v.): instruct, direct (see COMMAND, v.).

counselor. *Lawyer, barrister, counsel, advocate, attorney, solicitor, proctor, procurator.

count, v. 1 Count, tell, enumerate, number come into comparison when they mean to ascertain the total of units in a collection by noting one after another or one group after another. Count is often employed in a more or less extended sense, but in strict literal use it implies computation of a total by assigning to each unit or each group of units as noted its proper numeral in succession, such as one, two, three, etc., or three, six, nine, etc.; as, they were counting the books one by one when he told them it would be quicker to count them by fives. "As many as thirty bonfires could be counted within the whole bounds of the district" (Hardy). Tell, which is now archaic or dialectal in this sense, was once commoner than count, but usually it carried the implication of counting one by one; as, the shepherd tells his sheep. "Thou shalt have as many dolours for thy daughters as thou canst tell in a year" (Shak.). "He telleth the number of the stars" (Psalms cxlvii. 4). Enumerate implies a listing or mentioning of each one in a series not only that their total may be ascertained, but that they may be individually known or specified; thus, to enumerate the population of a city is not merely to count it but to get a record of every individual's name, address, occupation, and the like; so, to enumerate the powers of the supreme court; to enumerate the species of plants found on an island; to enumerate the various dishes served at a dinner. Number, as here compared, is somewhat literary or archaic for either count or enumerate; in some uses also it carries a suggestion of allotment or limit; as, the days of every man are numbered; to number the flowers of the field; "But even the very hairs of your head are all numbered" (Luke xii. 7); "His hosts of blind and unresisting dupes The despot numbers" (Shelley).

Ana. *Calculate, compute, reckon, estimate: *add, sum, figure, total, cast, foot.

2 *Rely, depend, bank, trust, reckon.

count, n. *Paragraph, verse, article, clause, plank.

countenance, n. 1 *Face, visage, physiognomy, mug, puss.

2 *Favor, good will.

Ana. Supporting or support, backing, upholding (see corresponding verbs at SUPPORT): *approbation, approval.

Ant. Disapproval, disapprobation. — Con. Ill will, malevolence, malignity, spite, *malice.

counter. Antagonistic, counteractive, *adverse.

Ana. Contrary, *opposite, antithetical, antipodal, antonymous, contradictory: hostile, inimical (see corresponding nouns at ENMITY).

counteract. *Neutralize, negative.

Ana. *Correct, rectify: offset, counterbalance, counter-vail, counterpoise, balance, *compensate.

Ant. Co-operate. — Con. Conjoin, concur, *unite, combine.

counteractive. Counter, *adverse, antagonistic.

Ana. Countervailing, counterbalancing, counterpoising, compensating, offsetting, balancing (see COMPENSATE): correcting (see CORRECT, v., 1): neutralizing (see NEUTRALIZE).

counterbalance, v. Offset, *compensate, countervail, balance, counterpoise.

Ana. *Stabilize, steady, poise: *correct (sense 1).

Con. *Overturn, upset, capsize, overset.

counterfeit, n. Fraud, sham, fake, *imposture, cheat, humbug, deceit, deception, simulacrum.

Ana. *Reproduction, copy, facsimile.

counterfeit, v. Feign, sham, simulate, pretend, *assume, affect.

Ana. *Copy, imitate, mimic, ape: dissemble, *disguise.

counterpart. Correlate, *parallel, analogue.

Ana. *Complement, supplement: duplicate, copy, facsimile, replica, *reproduction.

Con. Antithesis, opposite, contradictory. See under OPPOSITE, adj.

counterpoise, v. Balance, countervail, counterbalance, *compensate, offset.

Ana. Poise, *stabilize, steady, balance, ballast, trim.

Con. Upset, capsize, *overturn, overset.

countervail, v. Offset, balance, *compensate, counterbalance, counterpoise.

Ana. *Correct (sense 1): counteract, *neutralize, negative: overcome, surmount (see CONQUER): foil, thwart, *frustrate.

county. Gentry, *aristocracy, gentilefolk, elite, nobility, society.

coup d'oeil. Glimpse, glance, peep, peek, *look, sight, view.

couple, n. Couple, pair, brace, yoke agree in meaning two things of the same kind. Couple applies to two things of the same sort, regarded as in some way associated, but not necessarily (except in the case of a married or betrothed pair) matched or belonging together; it frequently means no more than two; as, "Make me a couple of cakes" (2 Samuel xiii. 6); "a couple of short-legged hens" (Shak.); a couple of hours or dollars. Pair, in modern usage, applies to two things that belong or are used together, frequently so that one is useless or defective without the other; it also applies to a single object composed of two corresponding or complementary parts; as, "one pair of English legs" (Shak.); "a pair of gloves" (Pope); "wedded pair" (Milton); "a pair of shears" (Shak.); a pair of trousers, spectacles, compasses, tongs; a matched pair of carriage horses. Brace commonly applies to a couple of certain birds or animals (as, a brace of pheasants, ducks, greyhounds); occasionally, to a couple of inanimate objects (as, a brace of pistols); rarely, to persons, with contemptuous or humorous connotation (as, "a brace of dukes"—Goldsmith). Yoke applies to two animals linked together; it is used of persons only in contempt; as, "plowing with twelve yoke of oxen" (1 Kings xix. 19); "a yoke of his discarded men" (Shak.).

courage, n. Courage, mettle, spirit, resolution, tenacity come into comparison when they mean a quality of mind or temperament which makes one resist temptation to give way in the face of opposition, danger, or hardship. Courage (in its earliest English senses, either the heart regarded as the seat of feeling and thought, or what is in one's heart) stresses firmness of mind or purpose and a casting aside of fear (for courage meaning courageousness, see courageous under BRAVE): it implies a summoning of all one's powers in order that one's desires or ends may be achieved; as, a reformer must have the courage of his convictions; "But screw your courage to the sticking place, And we'll not fail" (Shak.); "the unconquerable will... And courage never to submit or yield" (Milton). Mettle (which seems to have some etymological relation to metal, in the sense of a substance capable of being tempered) suggests an ingrained or characteristic capacity for meeting strain or stress in a manner suggestive of a finely tempered sword blade; as, the challenge put him on his mettle. It often implies resiliency, ardor, fearlessness, fortitude, gallantry, or other qualities associated less with physical strength than with mental or spiritual vigor. "Now I see there's mettle in thee, and even from this instant do build on thee a better opinion than ever before" (Shak.). "Doing one's bit, putting one's shoulder to the wheel, proving the mettle of the women of England, certainly had its agreeable side" (R. Macaulay). Spirit, like mettle, refers to a temperamental quality, but unlike the latter word, it suggests something far more volatile or fragile. It implies an ability to hold one's own, or to assert oneself or one's principles, or to keep up one's morale when opposed, interfered with, frustrated, tempted, or the like. "I do not think I can forgive you entirely, even now—it is too much for a woman of any spirit to quite overlook" (Hardy). "To quit a comrade on the road, and return home without him: these are tricks which no boy of spirit would be guilty of" (Meredith). "Successive crop failures had broken the spirit of the farmers" (Calver). Resolution, like courage, implies firmness of mind and purpose, but it stresses determination to achieve one's ends in spite of opposition or interference of men or of circumstances rather than a casting aside of fear of danger or a dread of hardship. "Good-humoured-looking on the whole, but implacable-looking, too; evidently a man of a strong resolution and a set purpose; a man not desirable to be met rushing down a narrow pass with a gulf on either side, for nothing would turn the man" (Dickens). "He saw that England was saved a hundred years ago by the high spirit and proud resolution of a real aristocracy" (Inge). Tenacity adds to resolution the implications of stubborn persistence and of unwillingness to acknowledge defeat; as, the tenacity of the bulldog breed. "This is not to say that the French lack tenacity. . . Having determined upon a thing, the French character tends to exceed in its pursuit, and, while fighting for it, to hold out to the death" (Belloc).

Ana. Bravery, boldness, audacity, dauntlessness, intrepidity, doughtiness (see corresponding adjectives at BRAVE): valor, *heroism, gallantry: *fortitude, grit, pluck, guts, backbone, sand.

Ant. Cowardice. — Con. Pusillanimousness or pusillanimity, cowardliness, poltroonery (see corresponding adjectives at COWARDLY): timorousness, timidity (see corresponding adjectives at TIMID).

courageous. *Brave, bold, valiant, valorous, dauntless, undaunted, audacious, intrepid.

Ana. Mettlesome, *spirited, high-spirited, fiery: resolute, stanch (see FAITHFUL): stout, tenacious, *strong.

Ant. Pusillanimous. — Con. *Fearful, apprehensive, afraid: *timid, timorous: *cowardly, craven, poltroon, recreant, dastardly.

course, n. *Way, route, passage, pass, artery.

Ana. Circuit, ambit (see CIRCUMFERENCE): orbit, scope (see RANGE, n.): drift, trend, current, *tendency: procedure, *process.

court, n. Field, *arena, circus, lists, ring, cockpit, griddiron, diamond, rink.

court, v. *Invite, woo, bid, solicit.

Ana. Allure, *attract, captivate, charm, take: toady, truckle, *fawn, cringe.

courteous. Polite, *civil, courtly, gallant, chivalrous. Ana. *Gracious, affable, cordial: *suave, urbane, politic, diplomatic: considerate, *thoughtful, attentive: obliging, complaisant (see AMIABLE).

Ant. Discourteous. — Con. *Rude, impolite, uncivil, ill-mannered, ungracious: curt, brusque, gruff, blunt (see BLUFF): insolent, supercilious, overbearing (see PROUD).

courtesy. Courtesy, amenity, attention, gallantry, comity come into comparison when they denote a manner or an act which promotes agreeable or pleasant intercourse. Courtesy suggests consideration for others or deference to their rank, sex, age, or the like; it usually implies good, or even exquisite, breeding and acquired graces but, especially in modern use, it sometimes connotes innate gentleness or instinctive politeness rather than social training. "The beauty of an inherited courtesy . . . of a thousand little ceremonies flowering out of the most ordinary relations and observances of life" (Bin-yon). "Rising to receive him . . . with all the engaging graces and courtesies of life" (Dickens). Amenity implies a disposition to make easy and pleasant the approach to, or the continuance of, delightful social relations; when used concretely it may be applied not only to words or acts but to pursuits, interests, or the like, that bring men into rapport. "He [Joubert] was . . . a charming letter-writer; above all, an excellent and delightful talker. The gaiety and amenity of his natural disposition were inexhaustible" (Arnold). "Stopping now and then to exchange amenities with fellow-strollers" (R. Macaulay). "Would she be interested to read it? Might he send it to her? Joan's chaperon . . . put no bar upon these amenities" (H. G. Wells). Attention implies a singling out of a particular person for special favor or consideration, or as the recipient of courtesies manifesting one's admiration or love (as in courting); as, the elder son is paying attention to his chum's sister. "A well-bred man . . . takes care that his attentions for [to, in modern idiom] you be not troublesome" (Chesterfield). "She loved her children, but did not unduly spoil them or turn their heads with injudicious attentions" (R. Macaulay). Gallantry stresses devoted attention, sometimes amorous attention, to a lady or to ladies; it also often connotes ingratiating personal qualities such as ease of address, a dashing style, or a polished manner. "Now despise me if you dare." "Indeed I do not dare." Elizabeth, having rather expected to affront him, was amazed at his gallantry" (Austen). "Cashel, in a business-like manner, and without the slightest air of gallantry, expertly lifted her and placed her on her feet" (Shaw). Comity is now increasingly rare in its older sense of courtesy, especially among friends or equals. "Comity and Affability are the Ornaments of Converse" (Rules of Civility, 1673). "It is the rule of mere comity . . . to agree where you can" (Emerson). In modern use it is applied chiefly to the interchange of courtesies between states (as of the United States) or between nations, such as the recognition within their own boundaries of the laws and institutions of the others. "Gave him no rights or privileges in other States beyond those secured to him by the laws of nations and the comity of States" (Ch. Just. Taney).

Ana. Graciousness, cordiality, affability, geniality (see corresponding adjectives at GRACIOUS): politeness, courteousness, courtliness, chivalrousness or chivalry, civility (see corresponding adjectives at CIVIL): considerateness or consideration, attentiveness, thoughtfulness (see corresponding adjectives at THOUGHTFUL).

Ant. Discourtesy. — Con. Churlishness, boorishness (see primitive nouns under BOOR): rudeness, impoliteness, ungraciousness, incivility (see corresponding adjectives at RUDE).

courtly. Courteous, gallant, chivalrous, polite, *civil.

Ana. Ceremonious, formal, conventional, *ceremonial: elegant, dignified, graceful (see corresponding nouns at ELEGANCE): finished, *consummate.

Ant. Churlish. — Con. Ungracious, discourteous, ill-mannered, impolite, *rude, uncivil: *coarse, vulgar, gross: boorish, loutish (see under BOOR).

Ana. *Agreement, accord, understanding.

covenant, v. Pledge, engage, *promise, plight, contract.

Ana. *Agree, concur, coincide: *unite, combine, conjoin, co-operate.

cover, n. *Shelter, retreat, refuge, asylum, sanctuary, ark.

Ana. Hiding or hiding place, concealment, screening or screen (see corresponding verbs at HIDE): safety, security (see corresponding adjectives at SAFE).

Ant. Exposure.

covert. *Secret, clandestine, surreptitious, underhand, underhanded, privy, backstairs, stealthy, furtive.

Ana. Hidden, concealed, screened (see HIDE): disguised, dissembled, masked, cloaked (see DISGUISE, v.).

Ant. Overt. — Con. Open, plain, candid, *frank: plain, clear, manifest, patent, *evident, obvious.

covet. 1 Covet, envy, grudge, begrudge are not synonymous terms but they are sometimes confused because all carry the implication of a selfish desire to have something for one's own enjoyment or possession. To covet (for fuller treatment see DESIRE) is to long inordinately for something which belongs to another; as, to covet a neighbor's piece of property because of its fine view; to envy is to regard another with more or less chagrin, repining, jealousy, or hatred because he possesses something one covets or feels should have come to oneself; as, to envy a person his good fortune or his promotion; to grudge or begrudge implies reluctance or hesitation (often, but not necessarily, through selfishness, meanness, or stinginess) in giving another that which he (or it) ought to have because it is his (or its) due or need; as, "Surely you wouldn't grudge the poor old man Some humble way to save his self-respect" (Frost); to begrudge every penny given to one's child (or to a charity or spent on cabs); to grudge every moment spent on a disagreeable but necessary task.

2 Crave, *desire, wish, want.

Ana. Yearn (for), *long (for), pine (for), hanker (for), thirst (for), hunger (for): pant (after), aspire (to be, to know, etc.), *aim (at).

Ant. Renounce (something desirable). — Con. Resign, *relinquish, yield, surrender: *abjure, forswear: *decline, refuse, reject.

covetous. Covetous, greedy, acquisitive, grasping, avaricious agree in meaning having or manifesting a strong desire for possessions, especially material possessions. Covetous always implies inordinateness of desire; very often, with allusion to the last (or, in Roman Catholic use, last two) of the Ten Commandments, it implies longing for that which is rightfully another's. "Covetous of Shakespeare's beauty" (Cowper). It is, however, used with derogatory intent or effect only when envy is implied or wrongful means of acquiring possession are suggested. "Is not thy kindness subtle, covetous . . . Expecting in return twenty for one?" (Shak.) Greedy emphasizes absence of restraint in desire; it is a censorious term only when the object of longing is evil in itself or in immoderation, or cannot be possessed without harm to oneself or to others; as, greedy for knowledge; greedy for gold. "Exploitation [of provinces] by greedy proconsuls" (Buchan). "The Elizabethans . . . with their artistic greediness . . . for every sort of effect" (T. S. Eliot). Acquisitive implies not only eagerness to possess but the capacity for acquiring and retaining that which is desired. Thus, an acquisitive mind is not only greedy for knowledge but is capable of absorbing it in large amounts; the acquisitive classes of society not only covet possessions but have the means whereby they can constantly add to their possessions. Grasping always implies eagerness and capacity to acquire wealth of any sort and invariably implies selfishness, and often suggests use of wrongful or unfair means. "People who are hard, grasping . . . and always ready to take advantage of their neighbors, become very rich" (Shaw). Avaricious also implies eagerness and capacity to acquire wealth, but especially a form of wealth, such as money, which can be hoarded. It, more than any of the others, emphasizes extreme stinginess. "An unremitting, avaricious thrift" (Wordsworth).

Ana. *Envious, jealous: desirous, concupiscent, lustful (see corresponding nouns at DESIRE): avid, athirst, *eager: rapacious, ravening, gluttonous, ravenous, *voracious.

Con. Self-denying, self-abnegating (see corresponding nouns at RENUNCIATION): renouncing, abjuring, forswearing (see ABJURE).

covey. *Flock, herd, drove, pack, bevy, gaggle, flight, swarm, shoal, school.

cow, v. *Intimidate, browbeat, bulldoze, bully.

Ana. *Frighten, terrorize, terrify: daunt, *dismay, appall: abash, discomfit, rattle, faze, disconcert, *embarrass.

Con. Animate, *quicken, vivify, enliven: cringe, cower, *fawn.

cowardly, adj. Cowardly, pusillanimous, poltroon, craven, dastardly, recreant agree in meaning excessively timid or timorous. Cowardly, the most general term, implies a weak or ignoble, pusillanimous, a mean-spirited and contemptible, lack of courage; as, "He . . . plac'd behind With purpose to relieve and follow them, Cowardly fled, not having struck one stroke" (Shak.); "Cowardly dogs! ye will not aid me then?" (Shelley); "I lived in a continual, indefinite, pining fear; tremulous, pusillanimous, apprehensive of I knew not what" (Carlyle); "having no 'materialized' class above it, it [American vulgarity] is not obsequious and pusillanimous" (Brownell). Poltroon, craven, and dastardly are terms of extreme opprobrium. Poltroon (more frequently a noun) implies arrant cowardice; craven, abject pusillanimity; dastardly, especially the cowardly or skulking execution of an outrageous or malicious design; as, a poltroon surrender; a craven fear of death; a dastardly assassination; a dastardly stab in the back. Recreant implies cowardly submission, especially under a threat; in current use, it often implies apostasy or faithlessness; as, "Thou wear a lion's hide! doff it for shame, And hang a calf's-skin on those recreant limbs" (Shak.); "Yield thyself recreant, villain, or thou diest" (T. Heywood); "It is the breath of this spirit that pours through the 'Areopagitica' as through a trumpet, sounding the charge against whatever is base and recreant" (J. R. Lowell).

Ana. *Timid, timorous: cowed, intimidated, browbeaten, bullied, bulldozed (see INTIMIDATE): afraid, *fearful, apprehensive.

Ant. Bold. — Con. *Brave, courageous, valorous, valiant, audacious, intrepid, doughty, dauntless: *adventurous, daring, venturous, venturesome.

Ant. Discredit. — Con. Opprobrium, obloquy, ignominy, disrepute (see DISGRACE).

3 Credit, asset come into comparison when they mean a person or a thing that enhances another. Someone or something is a credit to another when he or it is a source of honor or of increase in good repute; as, the boy is a credit to his school; his integrity is a credit to his upbringing. Someone or something is an asset to another when he or it adds to the usefulness, the worth, the advantages, the attractiveness, or the like, of another; as, the new teacher is an asset to the school; his knowledge of how to deal with people made him an asset to his employer.

credit, v. Accredit, *ascribe, assign, attribute, impute, refer, charge.

creed. 1 Creed, confession, symbol, catechism come into comparison when they mean an authoritative summary of the beliefs and doctrines of a church. Creed, the usual and ordinary term, applies chiefly to one of the three brief summaries of Christian belief known as the Apostle's Creed, the Nicene Creed, and the Athanasian Creed, but it is also applicable to any brief formulation of beliefs of a congregation, a particular denomination, or the like, or, by extension, of an individual, a party, a profession, or of any group that for any reason wishes to make known the principles to which it or its membership adheres; as, "The League of Nations was to the peace-wishers as his creed is to the Christian" (R. Macaulay). Confession (more fully, confession of faith) applies strictly to one of the authoritative statements of the doctrines of one of the churches established after the Reformation; thus, the earliest of these, the Augsburg Confession (1530) presented the doctrines taught by Luther and Melancthon and became the chief creed of the Lutheran Church; the Westminster Confession (1646) is the authoritative statement of the beliefs of English-speaking Presbyterian churches. Symbol, in the sense of creed, was derived from a Latin sense of symbolum traceable to the second century after Christ when "The Creed" (the Apostles' Creed) was accepted as the sign or mark of a Christian. This sense now occurs chiefly in theology when the term is applied to a creed or a confession. "The Nicene Creed, the great symbol in which the divinity of Christ is asserted and defined" (C. Hazard). Catechism applies specifically to an authoritative presentation of the doctrines of a church in the form of question and answer, used in the instruction of members or prospective members of that church; thus, the Roman Catechism, a manual intended primarily for parish priests, was published by Pope Pius V in 1566; the Geneva Catechism of 1536 gives the doctrines of Calvinism; the Anglican Catechism (1549, 1604) provides instruction for a member of the Anglican Communion seeking to be confirmed by the bishop; the Westminster Larger Catechism and Shorter Catechism, prepared by the Westminster Assembly 1647, are used (the latter especially) by Presbyterian churches.

Ana. Tenet, dogma, *doctrine.

2 Faith, persuasion, *religion, denomination, sect, cult, communion, church.

creep, v. Creep, crawl agree in meaning to move slowly along the ground or floor in a prone or crouching position. In their literal senses, they were once interchangeable but, in current good English, creep is more often used of quadrupeds or of human beings who move on all fours and proceed slowly, or stealthily, or silently (as, a baby usually creeps before it walks; "Crouching down... in a corner... he made out the three fishermen creeping through some rank grass"—Dickens) and crawl of serpents, snakes, worms, etc., that move by drawing the body along the ground or a surface, or of human beings who imitate such movement (as, when she saw the snake crawling along the path, she screamed; slugs crawled along the stems and leaves of the plant; he was so badly injured that he could only crawl to the open door). Figuratively, both words often imply intolerable slowness; as, "To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow, Creeps in this petty pace from day to day" (Shak.); "That sad, disappointing, disillusioning... war crawled through that bitter winter of defeat" (R. Macaulay). Both often imply a slow movement of a person, especially into another's favor or into a given status or position, but creep usually suggests stealthy and insinuating methods (as, "But creep along the hedge-bottoms, an' thou'll be a bishop yet"—Tennyson; "these northerners [barbarian tribes]... were steadily creeping nearer [the frontiers of the Roman empire]"—Buchan; "even in later and more enlightened times, the study of Literature has crept its way into official Cambridge"—Quiller-Couch) and crawl, procedure by abjectness, servility, cringing, or groveling (as, "Cranmer... Hath crawl'd into the favour of the king"—Shak.; "pomp-fed king... art thou not the veriest slave that e'er Crawled on the loathing earth?"—Shelley). Both also imply a sensation such as might be produced by lice, fleas, or other human or animal parasites, but creep suggests a shivering, nervous reaction, and crawl, a feeling of loathing or intense repugnance; as, "Something in their countenances that made my flesh creep with a horror I cannot express" (Swift); my flesh crawls at the sight of such dirty, unkempt children.

crime. *Offense, vice, sin, scandal.

Ana. *Fault, failing, frailty, foible, vice.

Con. Virtue, *excellence, merit, perfection.

criterion. *Standard, touchstone, yardstick, gauge.

Ana. Test, proof, trial, demonstration (see under PROVE): *principle, axiom, law: judging or judgment, adjudgment, adjudication (see corresponding verbs at JUDGE).

critic. Variant of CRITIQUE.

critical. 1 Critical, hypercritical, faultfinding, captious, caviling, carping, ensorious agree in meaning exhibiting the spirit of one who detects and points out faults or defects. Critical, when applied to persons who judge and to their judgments, not only may, but in very precise use does, imply an effort to see a thing clearly and truly so that not only the good in it may be distinguished from the bad and the perfect from the imperfect, but also that it as a whole may be fairly judged or valued. "In the garden he prolonged the flower-picking process by minute and critical choice" (Deland). "A tête-à-tête with a man of similar tastes, who is just and yet sympathetic, critical yet appreciative... is a high intellectual pleasure" (A. C. Benson). In less precise but nevertheless good use, critical commonly implies a keen awareness of faults or imperfections with, often, the suggestion of loss of fairness in judgment. "The attitude of Euripides towards the popular religion is... clearly and frankly critical" (G. L. Dickinson). "The vast audience [at a beholding]... was wont to be exceedingly critical. Bungling work drew down upon the headsmen the execrations of the mob, and not infrequently placed his own life in danger" (A. Reppier). When this loss of balance is implied, or when the judge's undue awareness of defects and over-emphasis of them is to be suggested, very precise writers often prefer hypercritical to critical; as, the audience that night was, as the actors soon knew, hypercritical. "He was... exceedingly difficult to please, not... because he was hypercritical and exacting, but because he was indifferent" (Bennett). Faultfinding is the direct, somewhat colloquial term, sometimes taking the place of critical, sometimes of hypercritical, but usually suggesting less background, less experience, or less fastidiousness than either; it is therefore frequently used when an unreasonably exacting or a querulous temperament is also to be suggested; as, the continually faultfinding reviewer of books; a faultfinding parent. Captious implies a readiness, usually a temperamental readiness, to detect trivial faults or to take exceptions on slight grounds, because one is either unduly exacting or perversely hard to please. "Is it captious to say that, when Manoa's locks are called 'white as down,' whiteness is no characteristic of down?" (Landor). "The body [the Roman Senate] had lost corporate vitality...; its members... were inclined to be captious and childish, and to shirk their duties" (Buchan). Caviling usually implies a captious disposition but stresses the habit or act of raising picayune or petty objections; as, casiling legislators who delay the passage of a bill. "The most casiling mind must applaud their devoted sense of duty" (N. P. Willis). Carping, far more than hypercritical or fault-finding, implies ill-natured or perverse picking of flaws, and often in addition suggests undue emphasis upon them as blameworthy. "And to that end we wish'd your lordship here, To avoid the carping censures of the world" (Shak.). "That carping spirit in which she had been wont to judge of his actions" (Trollope). Censorious implies a disposition or a tendency to be both severely critical and condemnatory of that which one criticizes. "Such is the mode of these censorious days, The art is lost of knowing how to praise" (J. Sheffield). "French morality differs fundamentally from our own. But this is only all the more reason for replacing censoriousness by candor in any consideration of it" (Brownell).

Ana. Judicious (see WISE): *judicial: fastidious, finical, particular, *nice, fussy, squeamish: discriminating, discerning, penetrating (see corresponding nouns at DISCERNMENT): understanding, comprehending, appreciating (see UNDERSTAND).

Ant. Uncritical. — Con. *Superficial, shallow, cursory. 2 Crucial, *acute.

Ana. Decisive, determinative, *conclusive: momentous, consequential, weighty, significant, important (see corresponding nouns at IMPORTANCE).

criticism. Criticism, critique (or critic), review, blurb, puff are here compared only as meaning an essay or other discourse written (sometimes, delivered as a lecture) for the purpose of presenting one's conclusions after having examined a work of art or, especially, of literature. None of these terms has a clearly established meaning but, in general, each can be distinguished from the others with reference to its leading implications and its place in usage. Criticism is of all these terms the word of best repute, as preferred by the best writers and speakers and as carrying no derogatory connotations. The proper aim and the content of a criticism have never been definitely fixed, and are still subjects of controversy, but the term usually implies an author who is expected to have expert knowledge in his field, a clear definition of his standards of judgment, and an intent to evaluate the work under consideration; as, to read every criticism of a new play the day following its first performance. Criticism is even more often applied to the art, craft, or collective writings of such writers or speakers than to the individual article; as, "this feeling, that contemporary judgments are apt to turn out a little ludicrous... has converted much criticism of late from judgment pronounced into impression recorded" (Galsworthy). Because of this tendency to restrict the use of criticism to its general sense, critique (often spelled critic or critick in its use earlier than the mid-eighteenth century) is often preferred as a designation of a critical essay, especially of one dealing with a literary work. The use of this term has not been so common within the last half century as it was during much of the nineteenth century, so that currently it is often avoided as an affectation; as, Jeffrey's critiques in the Edinburgh Review. Review (often specifically book review) is now the common designation of a more or less informal critical essay dealing particularly with new or recent books. The term is frequently preferred by newspaper and magazine critics as a more modest designation of their articles than criticism or critique, and as permitting less profound or exhaustive treatment or as requiring a personal rather than a final judgment of the merits and faults of the work. Review, in present use, generally suggests literary criticism of a less pretentious kind, giving in general a summary of a book's contents and the impressions it produces on the reviewer; as, the Sunday editions of many newspapers have a supplement devoted to book reviews. Blurb, a word coined by Gelett Burgess to designate a short, fulsome, critical essay, is now applied chiefly to a publisher's description of a work printed usually on the jacket of a book for the purposes of advertisement. "As a term of reprobation for fulsomeness on the 'jackets,' or dust-cloaks, of new books, 'blurb' is a peach of the first order" (C. E. Montague). Puff, a word common in the eighteenth century for any unduly flattering account of a book, play, or the like, such as appeared in bills of a play or in journals, carried many of the connotations of blurb. In current use, it often applies to a review that seems animated by a desire to promote the sale of a book or the success of a play, regardless of its real merits, or to one that is markedly uncritical in its flattering comments.

criticize. Criticize, reprehend, blame, censure, reprobate, condemn, denounce come into comparison when they mean to find fault with someone or something openly, often publicly, and with varying degrees of severity. Criticize, in its strict etymological sense, does not carry fault-finding as its invariable, or even major, implication: rather it suggests a discernment of the merits and faults of a person or thing. "Know well each ancient's [classic poet's] proper character; His fable, subject, scope in ev'ry page; Religion, country, genius of his age: Without all these at once before your eyes, Cavil you may, but never criticize" (Pope). In ordinary use, however, the word does commonly imply an unfavorable judgment or a pointing out of faults and is probably the term most frequently used to express this idea; as, to criticize a play severely; averse to being criticized; to avoid criticizing a person's errors in speech. "It is foolish... to criticize an author for what he has failed to achieve" (A. Huxley). The current phrase "to criticize constructively (or destructively)" is confusing because the verb is ordinarily used in the second of these senses. Even if it is clear that the first, or strict, sense is intended, either adverb is incongruous because evaluation, not correction, is implied by the verb. In neither meaning does criticize imply suggestion of remedies. Reprehend, in earlier use, came closer to reprove and its synonyms (see REPROVE) than to criticize; in present-day English it takes a person as an object far less often than one of his faults, errors, sins, or the like. In such use, it not only explicitly suggests the approach of a critic, and his disapproval, but implies a more or less severe rebuke. "Why are the [dramatic] asides ridiculous, which Mr. Archer reprehends in A Woman Killed with Kindness? Because they are not a convention, but a subterfuge" (T. S. Eliot). "The thing to be reprehended is the confusing misuse of the word 'verse'" (Grandgent). Blame fundamentally implies speaking in dispraise of a person or thing rather than in his or its favor; in general, it also suggests the mental approach of a critic or detector of faults, who assumes that he has the knowledge or the competency to judge. "Some judge of authors' names, not works, and then Nor praise nor blame the writings, but the men" (Pope). "Heine... cared quite as much as his brethren [brother poets]... whether people praised his verses or blamed them" (Arnold). "Aristotle, while blaming the man who is unduly passionate, blames equally the man who is insensitive" (G. L. Dickinson). In colloquial use and, to an extent, in literary use, blame does not imply so strong an opposition to praise; often it suggests an imputation or accusation of wrongdoing (as, one cannot blame starving children who steal food) or of guilt (as, there is no one to blame [idiomatic for

to be blamed, that is, to be held guilty] but yourself). Sometimes, blame connotes ultimate responsibility rather than actual guiltiness and then may take a thing as well as a person for its object. "I would not have you so uncritical as to blame the Church or its clergy for what happened" (Quiller-Couch). "The drug-fiend will get drugs somewhere: if he finds his poppy and mandragora in poetry, you must blame his habit, not the poet" (Day Lewis). Since blame no longer invariably implies the reverse of commendation, censure is usually preferred to blame as the antonym of praise. The word carries a stronger suggestion of authority or competence in the critic or judge than does blame, as well as a clearer connotation of reprehension or, sometimes, of a reprimand; as, the judge censured the jury for their failure to render a verdict on the evidence; the official was not dismissed until after he had more than once been severely censured for his mistakes of judgment. "I lose my patience, and I own it too. When works are censur'd, not as bad but new" (Pope). "It is not one writer's business to censure others. A writer should expound other writers or let them alone" (F. M. Ford). Reprobate is often used loosely as though it were a close synonym of reproach or rebuke. "I put it to you, miss," she continued, as if mildly reprobating some want of principle on Lydia's part" (Shaw). In discriminating use, however, it implies not only strong disapproval and, usually, vigorous censure, but also a rejection or a refusal to countenance. "He reprobated what he termed the heresies of his nephew" (Irving). "That wanton eye so reprobated by the Founder of our Faith" (L. P. Smith). "Those who...reprobate what has been technically termed the post-habited prefix" (H. Ellis). Condemn carries even stronger judicial connotations than censure, for it implies a final decision or a definitive judgment; it commonly also suggests an untempered judgment which is wholly unfavorable and merciless. "Condemn the fault, and not the actor of it? Why, every fault's condemn'd ere it be done" (Shak.). "The freedom with which Dr. Johnson condemns whatever he disapproves, is astonishing" (Burney). "It is wise to be cautious in condemning views and systems which are now out of fashion" (Inge). Denounce adds to condemn the implication of public declaration or proclamation. "In all ages, priests and monks have denounced the growing vices of society" (H. Adams). "Nothing... makes one so popular as to be the moral denouncer of what everybody else denounces" (Van W. Brooks).

crochet, v. Knit, *weave, plait, braid, tat.

crocodile. Crocodile, alligator, cayman denote large long-tailed lizardlike reptiles, with a tough skin stiffened with small bony plates and horny scales, that belong to the same family (Crocodylidae) but to different genera. In strict usage crocodile is applied only to a reptile of the genus Crocodylus. However, the term has been extended to apply to any reptile of the family Crocodylidae or order Crocodylia. True crocodiles occur in the waters of tropical Africa, Asia, Australia, and America. In some localities they are dangerous to man, being much more aggressive and vicious than alligators. Alligator is applied correctly to any of several aquatic reptiles of the genus Alligator or allied genera. These reptiles have a shorter and broader snout than the crocodiles, and the large teeth of the lower jaw shut into pits in the upper jaw, instead of into marginal notches. True alligators occur only in the warmer parts of America, except for one species found in China. In many places crocodiles are popularly called alligators. Cayman is applied to any of several tropical American alligators differing from typical alligators chiefly in having the ventral armor composed of overlapping scales (scutes).

crony. Comrade, chum, companion, *associate, pal, buddy.

Ana. Intimate, *friend, confidant.

crooked. Crooked, devious, oblique agree in meaning not straight or straightforward. Crooked literally implies the presence of curves, turns, or bends; as, a crooked back; a crooked road; the crooked trunk of a tree. Figuratively, it implies fraudulence, cheating, graft, or other practices involving marked departures from rectitude; as, crooked dealings; a crooked politician; crooked policies; "They are a perverse and crooked generation" (Deuteronomy xxxii. 5). Devious, both literally and figuratively, implies departure from a direct, appointed, regular, or fixed course, and hence suggests wandering or errancy, and often, but not invariably, circuitousness. "We sought with relief the empty roads of the fens, and, by devious routes, wound our way between golden buttercups and brown cattle" (Lucas). "He went by devious ways, a little proud of himself for knowing the short cuts, through a building used as a thoroughfare from one street to another, through what had once been the churchyard of an ancient church" (Arch. Marshall). The term as applied to persons and their acts or practices usually implies unreliability and often trickiness or shiftiness; as, the devious policies of the administration; "he had been a devious rascal" (Bennett); "The marks of the thoroughbred were simply not there. The man was blatant, crude, overly confidential, devious" (Mencken). Oblique literally implies a departure from the perpendicular or horizontal direction, or a slanting course; as, an oblique tower; an oblique sunbeam. Figuratively, the term suggests indirection, or lack of perfect straightforwardness; as, an oblique glance; an oblique reference; an oblique accusation; "All censure of a man's self is oblique praise" (Johnson). "He shouldn't have done it, of course.... And he meant to pay the money back. I don't see anything so very wicked in that," she would sigh, with that singular moral obliquity which in money matters seems to belong to feminine love" (Deland).

cross, n. *Trial, tribulation, affliction, visitation.

cross, adj. Cranky, testy, techy, touchy, choleric, splenetic, *irascible.

Ana. Captious, carping, caviling, faultfinding (see CRITICAL): *irritable, fractious, peevish, petulant, snappish, waspish, querulous.

Con. Good-humored, good-tempered, good-natured (see GOOD NATURE).

crosswise, crossways. *Across, athwart.

crotchet. Whim, *caprice, vagary, freak, whimsey.

crow, v. *Boast, brag, vaunt, gasconade.

crowd, n. Crowd, throng, press, crush, mob, roul, horde come into comparison when they mean a more or less closely assembled multitude; usually, but far from always, of persons. Crowd, etymologically and in discriminating use, implies a close gathering and pressing together; as, "the crowd came pouring out with a vehemence that nearly took him off his legs" (Dickens). Especially in current use, crowd often implies a merging of the individuality of the units into that of the mass; as, to study the psychology of crowds; "no one in European art has rivalled Keaton in the mastery of crowds of men each individually alive yet swept along by a common animating impulse, whether the raging passion of the victors or the panic of the routed" (Binyon); "A number of individuals gather together for one purpose, and you get not a number of individuals, but a crowd" (R. Macaulay). Throng varies so little in meaning from crowd that the two words are often used interchangeably without loss. Throng sometimes carries the stronger implication of movement and of pushing and the weaker implication of density; as, a crowd jammed the hall; throngs circulating through the streets. "So they went northward. . . past droves and droves of camels, armies of camp followers, and legions of laden mules, the throngs thickening day by day" (Kipling). Press (which is now an archaic term) differs from throng in being more often applied to a concentrated mass in which movement is difficult because of the numbers, but otherwise it also suggests pushing or pressing forward; as, "They could not come nigh unto him for the press" (Mark ii. 4). Crush carries a stronger implication than either crowd or throng of compactness of the group, of offering difficulty to one who wishes to make his way through it, or of causing discomfort to one who is part of it. "The crush was terrific for that time of day. . . for the street was blocked" (V. Woolf). Specifically, crush applies to an overcrowded reception; as, "Two months ago I went to a crush at Lady Brandon's" (Wilde). Mob strictly applies to a crowd or throng made up of the rabble and bent on the accomplishment of riotous or destructive acts; as, the citizens were terrorized for weeks by mobs; "A mob. . . which pulled down all our prisons" (Burke). In extended use, especially in the United States and in Australia, mob is employed as an intensive of crowd, sometimes implying more disorganization (as, it is the tendency of a large crowd to become a mob), sometimes denoting merely an extremely large crowd (as, you could scarcely call it a crowd; it was a mob). In theatrical and cinematic use, mob applies to any large and manifestly agitated crowd of persons that has to be directed as a unit to achieve the proper or the intended effects. Rout (originally, a great company) applies to an especially disorderly or tumultuous mob, particularly to one made up of the lowest, the most disreputable, or the most lawless classes; as, "a hireling rout scraped together from the dregs of the people" (Milton). "The world should soon have clearance. . . from such a rout as now so vilely Handles you. . . Wait until the mob, now masters, willy-nilly are Servants as they should be" (Browning). Horde as here compared (see also TRIBE) usually, though not necessarily, applies to an assemblage or to a multitude massed together. It is sometimes preferred to crowd, throng, mob, or rout when a contemptuous term is desired, especially one that suggests the rude, rough, savage character of the individuals who constitute the multitude or mass; as, hordes of small boys roving through the streets; the horde of excursionists took possession of the beach.

cry, v. Cry, weep, wail, keen, whimper, blubber agree in meaning to show one's grief, pain, or distress by tears and utterances, usually inarticulate utterances. Cry and weep (the first the homelier, the second the more formal, term) are frequently interchanged. Cry is more apt to stress the audible lamentation, weep, the shedding of tears; as, "If you hear a child cry in the night, you must call to the nurse" (Shak.); "Weep not, sweet queen; for trickling tears are vain" (Shak.); "Wept unseen, unheeded cried" (Millay). Wail usually implies a giving vent to one's grief without restraint, in mournful and often long-drawn-out cries, moans, and lamentations; as, "Where is my father, and my mother, nurse?" "Weeping and wailing over Tybalt's corse" (Shak.); "Hear him, o'erwhelmed with sorrow, yet rejoice; No womanish or wailing grief has part" (Cowper); "Soon as she . . . saw the life-blood flow . . . wailing loud She clasped him" (Shelley). Keen (an Irish term) implies the wailing lamentations or dirges of a professional mourner. "Keen [means] Hideous, dismal wailing or howling practised in Ireland among the humbler classes in token of grief, at funerals, and on hearing news of a death or other calamity" (H. C. Wyld). Whimper implies low, whining, broken cries such as those made by a baby or puppy; as, whimpering in fright. Blubber implies scalding, disfiguring tears and noisy, broken utterances, such as those of a child who cannot have his way; as, he always blubbers until those who oppose him give in to him.

Ana. *Develop, mature, ripen: raise, rear (see LIFT): educate, train, instruct, *teach: *improve, better, ameliorate.

Con. *Stunt, stultify, atrophy: *neglect, ignore, disregard, slight.

cultivation. Breeding, *culture, refinement.

culture, n. 1 Culture, cultivation, breeding, refinement come into comparison only when they denote a quality of a person or group of persons which distinguishes him (or them) as superior even in polite society. Culture is probably the vaguest of these terms, but in general it implies a high degree of enlightenment that has been acquired by intercourse with what is best in the civilized life of many ages and lands; in addition, it usually suggests fineness of taste, delicacy of perception, and gracious urbanity of manners; as, a man of culture. "Culture, the acquainting ourselves with the best that has been known and said in the world" (Arnold). Cultivation is often preferred to culture by discriminating writers and speakers because it suggests the continuous pursuit of culture, and the self-discipline which accompanies such pursuit, rather than its achievement, and is therefore more modest and often more appropriate; as, he has found many persons of cultivation in the city to which he has recently moved. "Gratitude is a fruit of great cultivation; you do not find it among gross people" (Johnson). Breeding implies such training or lifelong experience in courtesy and the amenities of gracious living that one is never at a loss how to act or what to say; moreover, the word often suggests poise, tact, an ability to come forward or to retire at will or at need, and other social qualities which mark one out even among one's social equals. "I am a gentleman of blood and breeding" (Shak.). "As men of breeding, sometimes men of wit, T'avoid great errors, must the less commit" (Pope). "Politely learned, and of a gentle race, Good breeding and good sense gave all a grace" (Cowper). Refinement implies not only the absence (often the eradication) of all that is gross, vulgar, or merely common, but also the presence of fineness of feeling, delicacy of perception or understanding, and fastidiousness. "That marvellous bold touch of his, that had the true refinement and perfect delicacy that in art, at any rate, comes only from strength" (Wilde). "He had true refinement; he couldn't help thinking of others, whatever he did" (Galsworthy).

2 *Civilization.

cumbersome, cumbrous. Ponderous, *heavy, weighty, hefty.

Ana. Burdensome, *onerous: *awkward, clumsy: *irksome, wearisome, tiresome.

Con. Compact, *close: *easy, light, facile.

cumulative. Cumulative, accumulative, additive, summative are synonymous only when used in the meaning increasing or produced by the addition of like or assimilable things. But they carry common implications, even when they differ in denotation. That is cumulative which is constantly increasing or is capable of constant increase in size, amount, power, severity, or the like, by successive additions, successive accretions, or successive repetitions, as of an experience; thus, the cumulative effect of a drug may be harmful even though the immediate effect of each dose has, apparently, been beneficial; terror is cumulative because one fear tends to inspire another. That is accumulative which is constantly increasing in amount or bulk through successive additions or which has reached its sum total or magnitude through many such additions. "The art of nations is to be accumulative...the work of living men not superseding, but building itself upon the work of the past" (Rushin). "Such persons cannot understand the force of accumulative proof" (Whately). Cumulative is now used more often than accumulative, especially where increasing severity, enhancement in influence or power, and the like, are to be suggested. That is additive which is of such a nature that it is capable either of assimilation to or incorporation in something else or of growth by additions. An additive detail, element, factor, or the like, is one that has such affinity for another thing that it becomes a constituent part of that thing; thus, red, green, and blue-violet are the additive colors and are used in color photography because they blend to form any color. "This new hypothesis assigns to the atom properties which are in no way inconsistent with the inverse-square attraction of its electrons and protons; rather they are additive to it" (Jeans). An additive whole is not an organism complete in itself but an aggregate or extensible magnitude. "This pluralistic view, of a world of additive constitution, is one that pragmatism is unable to rule out from serious consideration" (W. James). That is summative (a relatively uncommon word), which is capable of association or combination with other things so as to produce a sum total, such as an additive whole or a cumulative effect; as, the summative action of bacteria. "If the student could not add up his achievements, if there was nothing summative in his education" (Educational Review).

Ana. Accumulated, amassed (see ACCUMULATE): multiplying, increasing, augmenting (see INCREASE).

Con. Dissipated, dispersed, scattered (see SCATTER).

cunning, adj. 1 Ingenious, *clever, adroit.

Ana. Skillful, skilled, adept, *proficient, expert.

2 Crafty, tricky, artful, *sly, foxy, wily.

Ana. Devious, oblique, *crooked: *sharp, acute, keen: *shrewd, astute: knowing, smart (see INTELLIGENT).

Ant. Ingenuous. — Con. Artless, unsophisticated, naïve (see NATURAL).

cunning, n. 1 Skill, *art, craft, artifice.

Ana. Dexterousness or dexterity, adroitness, deftness, featness (see corresponding adjectives at DEXTEROUS): proficiency, adeptness, expertness (see corresponding adjectives at PROFICIENT): ingeniousness or ingenuity, cleverness (see corresponding adjectives at CLEVER).

2 Guile, *deceit, duplicity, dissimulation.

Ana. Craftiness, wiliness, trickiness or trickery, artfulness, slyness (see corresponding adjectives at SLY): stratagem, ruse, maneuver, feint, *trick, wile.

Ant. Ingenuousness.

cupidity. Cupidity, greed, rapacity, avarice come into comparison as meaning inordinate desire for wealth or possessions. Cupidity stresses the intensity and compelling nature of the desire, and often suggests covetousness as well; as, the sight of so much wealth aroused his cupidity. "[Horace]...sings the praises...of Rome—Rome destined to unite the severed countries of the world, provided...she...curbed her own cupidity: 'Riches the hardy soldiers must despise, And look on gold with undesiring eyes' " (A. Repplier). Greed, more than cupidity, implies a controlling passion; it suggests not strong but inordinate desire and it commonly connotes meanness as well as covetousness. "Decent, honest, fawsont [seemly] folk, Are risen out balh root an' branch, Some rascal's prideful' greed to quench" (Burns). Rapacity implies actual seizing or snatching not only of that which excites cupidity but of anything that will satisfy one's greed for money or property; hence, it often suggests extortion, plunder, or oppressive exactions of any kind; as, the rapacity of the conquerors knew no bounds; "the woman's greed and rapacity... disgusted me" (Thackeray). Avarice, although it involves the idea of cupidity and often carries a strong suggestion of rapacity, stresses that of miserliness, and implies both an unwillingness to let go whatever wealth or property one has acquired and an insatiable greed for more. "Such A stanchless avarice that, were I king, I should cut off the nobles for their lands, Desire his jewels and this other's house: And my more-having would be as a sauce To make me hunger more" (Shak.).

Ana. Covetousness, avariciousness, greediness, acquisitiveness (see corresponding adjectives at COVETOUS): avidity, eagerness (see corresponding adjectives at EAGER): lust, concupiscence, *desire.

curb, v. Check, bridle, snaffle, *restrain, inhibit.

Ana. Repress, *suppress: shackle, manacle, fetter, *hamper, hog-tie: thwart, foil, balk, *frustrate.

Ant. Spur. — Con. *Indulge, pamper, humor.

cure, n. *Remedy, medicine, medicament, specific, physick.

cure, v. Cure, heal, remedy agree in meaning to rectify a morbid or unhealthy condition, especially by or as if by medication or other treatment. Cure and heal, in their literal senses, apply to both wounds and diseases, and are frequently interchanged; as, "Pierced to the soul with slander's venom'd spear, The which no balm can cure" (Shak.). "Physician, heal thyself" (Luke iv. 23). In current usage, however, they tend to be differentiated in such applications, cure more frequently implying restoration to health after disease, heal implying restoration to soundness of an affected part after a wound or lesion; as, the treatment failed to cure him (or to cure his eczema); the salve will heal slight burns; "His fever... might cure him of his tendency to epilepsy" (Byron); "Where I will heal me of my grievous wound" (Tennyson). Figuratively, a similar distinction often holds; as, to cure (not heal) mistrust; to heal (not cure) a breach between friends. "If you can compass it, do cure the younger girls of running after the officers" (Austen). "We are denied the one thing that might heal us... that might bring balm to the bruised heart, and peace to the soul in pain" (Wilde). Remedy, in its now comparatively rare literal use, implies reference to a morbid condition of body or mind, whether it affects one's physical or mental health or causes local or occasional discomfort, and suggests the use of any means of correction or relief, such as medication, surgery, rest, exercise, or the like; as, a prolonged stay in a dry climate and much rest remedied his tubercular condition; "Who... may likeliest remedy The stricken mind" (Southey). Figuratively (see also CORRECT, v., 1), remedy is often used in reference to evil conditions corrected, relieved, or counteracted by any means; as, to remedy an abuse; "[This mockery] 'tis partly my own fault, Which death or absence soon shall remedy" (Shak.).

curious. 1 Curious, inquisitive, prying, snoopy, nosy (or nosey) are here compared as meaning interested in finding out, or in a search for, facts that are not one's personal concern. Curious may or may not imply objectionable qualities such as intrusiveness or impertinence, but it always suggests an eager desire to learn, especially to learn how or why things have happened or are happening; as, children are naturally curious about almost everything; curious onlookers were held back by the police; she did not wish to seem curious about her neighbor's affairs; "a Latin poet whose reputation [for bombast] would deter any reader but the most curious" (T. S. Eliot); "Edgar was a rationalist, who was curious, and had a sort of scientific interest in life" (D. H. Lawrence). Inquisitive implies habitual and impertinent curiosity and, usually, suggests the asking of many questions regarding something secret or unrevealed; as, "In me [Delilah], but incident to all our sex, Curiosity, inquisitive, importune Of secrets" (Milton); "They grew inquisitive after my name and character" (Spectator). Prying adds to curious and inquisitive the implications of busy meddling and of officiousness; as, "a prying old woman" (J. Hawthorne); "the world might guess it; and I will not bare my soul to their shallow prying eyes" (Wilde). Snoopy and nosy are somewhat vulgar colloquialisms, highly expressive of contempt. Snoopy adds to prying suggestions of slyness or sneaking; as, a snoopy legal investigator; everyone felt that she was snoopy and soon refused to welcome her as a visitor. Nosy suggests the methods of a dog pursuing a scent, and implies a desire to discover the ins and outs of every situation that arouses one's curiosity; as, a nosy, disagreeable child. In British use, a nosy person is often called a "nosy Parker."

Ana. Meddling, intermeddling, interfering, tampering (see MEDDLER): scrutinizing, inspecting, examining (see SCRUTINIZE): intrusive, meddlesome, *impertinent.

Ant. Incurious: uninterested. — Con. *Indifferent, aloof, detached, unconcerned: apathetic, stolid, *impassive, phlegmatic.

2 Singular, *strange, peculiar, unique, odd, queer, quaint, outlandish, eccentric, erratic.

curmudgeonly. Miserly, *stingy, close, closefisted, tight, tightfisted, niggardly, parsimonious, penurious, cheescparing, penny-pinching.

Ana. *Mean, ignoble: surly, crabbed (see SULLEN).

Con. Generous, *liberal, handsome, bountiful.

currency. Cash, *money, legal tender, specie, coin, coinage.

current, adj. *Prevailing, prevalent, rife.

Ana. General, *universal, common: popular, ordinary, familiar, *common: *usual, customary.

Ant. Antique, antiquated (of fashions, etc.): obsolete (of words, expressions, etc.).

current, n. 1 Stream, *flow, flood, tide, flux.

Ana. Movement, *motion: course, route, *way: progress, advance (see under ADVANCE, v.): progression, *progress.

curse, n. Curse, imprecation, malediction, malison, anathema come into comparison when they denote a denunciation that conveys a wish or threat of evil. Curse (opposed to blessing) usually implies a call upon God or a supernatural power to visit punishment or disaster upon a person; in dignified use, it commonly presupposes a profound sense of injury and a plea to a divine avenger for justice. No other word in this group suggested so strongly, in earlier times, the certainty of the threatened evil. "The untented woundings of a father's curse Pierce every sense about thee!" (Shak.). "An orphan's curse would drag to Hell A spirit from on high" (Coleridge). Imprecation also implies an invocation of evil or calamity, but it often suggests wrath rather than a sense of injury, and a desire for revenge rather than for justice, as its provocations. "With imprecations thus he fill'd the air, And angry Neptune heard the unrighteous prayer" (Pope). Both curse and imprecation, in current use, are applied to profane swearing involving blasphemy, but, again, the latter is weaker in its implications than the former. Malediction (opposed to benediction) and its archaic form malison are applied chiefly to bitter reproaches or denunciations publicly proclaimed and bringing disgrace or ignominy to their object. "My name... To all posterity may stand defamed, with malediction mentioned" (Milton). "Cleopatra has long ago passed beyond the libels with which her reputation was blackened by a terrified Rome—even the maledictions of great poets" (Buchan). "My malison light... On them that drink and dinna pay" (A. Ramsay). Anathema, as here compared, denotes a solemn, authoritative (especially, in older use, ecclesiastical), and usually, by implication, violent denunciation invoking a curse upon a person or thing. "The Pope... has condemned the slave trade—but no more heed is paid to his anathema than to the passing wind" (Gladstone). "The robust anathemas of Ritson, Percy, and Warton" (Lowes). Though often employed in this sense as though it were a technical ecclesiastical term (as, the pope hurled anathemas at Luther), the word acquired the denotation of curse only in post-Reformation times; in ecclesiastical use, the word is found (1) in the dogmatic canons of various councils, where the formula regarding the ipso facto excommunication of heretics is commonly phrased: "If anyone says [the heretical proposition follows], let him be anathema" (that is, excluded from communion with the Church; see ABOMINATION); (2) as the designation of the severest form of excommunication (see EXCOMMUNICATION).

curve, n. Curve, arc, bow, arch agree in meaning a line or something which follows a line that is neither straight nor angular, but rounded. Curve is the general term and the most widely applicable. It may be used in reference to any line, edge, outline, turn, formation that describes a part of a circle, ellipse, or the like (or a combination of parts of different circles); as, the curve of a ship's side; the deep curve of the back of a wing chair; a serpentine curve. "The curve of the greyhound is not only the line of beauty, but a line which suggests motion" (Jefferies). Arc is used chiefly in geometry to denote any part or section of the circumference of a circle; it is applied concretely only to a limited number of things, such as, formerly, to the rainbow, and now chiefly, to the luminous glow which under some conditions spans a break in an electric circuit; as, an arc lamp. Bow, unlike the preceding words, has never been in geometrical use: it has always designated concrete things that are curved, and, especially in modern use, it has drawn its implications from its reference to the archer's bow with its long, gradually curving strip of wood that may be bent almost into a U. Hence, many things which resemble an archer's bent bow are figuratively described by that term or are so designated; as, the bows of spectacles; an ox bow; bowlegs. "The moon, like to a silver bow, New-bent in heaven" (Shak.). Arch, which was originally equivalent to arc in denotation (though not in etymology), is now chiefly applied to a supporting structure built up of wedge-shaped pieces of stone or other substance in such a way that they form a round arch (typically a semi-circular curve with a keystone at the apex) or a pointed arch (typically two opposite curves with a joint at the apex), and provide an opening underneath as for a window, a door, or a passageway. Hence, arch is applied to any similarly curved structures; as, the arch of the eyebrow; the arch of the foot; an arch formed by meeting tree tops.

Ana. Circuit, compass, ambit, *circumference.

curve, v. Curve, bend, turn, twist come into comparison when they mean to swerve or cause to swerve (sometimes figuratively) from a straight line or a normal direction. Curve is the word of widest application, its single restricting implication being that the line followed is, at least approximately, an arc of a circle or an ellipse; as, to curve the top of an arch; to curve a road; to curve a ball in pitching it. Bend usually implies reference to something normally straight that is neither completely rigid nor completely flexible but that yields to force or efforts to curve; as, to bend a lead pipe; to bend a strip of wood to form a bow; to bend one's knee; to bend one's back over one's work; to bend one's mind to the accomplishment of a task; "He bends figures and cycles so readily to his will that he finds no difficulty in proving that when there is a marked increase in sunspots there is a rise in the temperature in Southern France" (W. Kaempffer). In reference to material things, turn is much less often used than bend: in only a few instances are the terms interchangeable (as, to turn a lead pipe) but idiomatically one turns (not bends) the edge of a razor; one turns (not bends) one's ankle when one's foot is caught by an obstruction. Turn may be employed, as bend may not, in reference to materials that can be folded together (as, to turn the top of a sheet over the blanket) or to materials that are curved in the process of construction (as, to turn the heel of a stocking; to turn a new road to the right). Twist carries a stronger implication than bend of the influence of an irresistible force and often, though not always, suggests a wrenching out of shape rather than a giving of a desired shape; as, the shaft was twisted beyond the point of safety; he twisted her wrist until she could have screamed with pain; hands twisted by hard work and old age.

cut, v. Cut, hew, chop, carve, slit, slash agree in meaning to penetrate so as to divide something by means of a tool or instrument with a sharp blade, such as a knife, ax, or sword. Cut is by far the most comprehensive term, for it is not only interchangeable with any other word in the group but also with any of a large number of verbs that suggest use of a specific instrument (as, knife, shear, reap, mow), or dividing in a certain way (as, mince, shred), or an operation having a definite end (as, prune, lop, amputate), or the like. Often it requires an adverb to describe the process or purpose more clearly; as, to cut down a tree; to cut off dead branches; to cut up a carcass of beef; to cut out a paper doll. Its figurative uses are many: usually it implies a result similar to one produced by cutting, such as separation or isolation (as, to cut off a member of the family; she is cut off from all her friends) or stabbing or hurting (as, the remark cut her to the heart). Hew is not only more restricted in its application than cut but it carries far more explicit implications both in literal and figurative use. It usually suggests the use of a tool such as an ax or a sword which must be swung with great force, though it may imply the use of a sharp tool, like a chisel in the cutting and shaping of stone or rock; as, "Hew them to pieces, hack their bones asunder" (Shak.); rough-hewn stones; "And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: every tree...which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire" (Luke iii. 9); "There's a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will" (Shak.). Chop implies a cleaving or dividing by a quick, heavy blow or blows of an ax, a cleaver, a hatchet, or similar tool or, more often, a dividing into pieces by repeated blows of this character; as, to chop off branches of a tree; to chop wood (i.e., to divide the trunk or branches of a tree into pieces suitable for firewood); to chop meat (i.e., to divide a piece of meat into small pieces by means of a butcher's cleaver or other tool). Carve was in earliest use almost as comprehensive a term as cut now is, but in the course of its development it has come to be restricted to two types of cutting: one which requires the use of a sharp knife or chisel and has for its end the artistic shaping, fashioning, or adornment of a material such as stone, ivory, or wood (as, a sculptor carves a statue out of marble; the back and legs of the chair were elaborately carved; an exquisite ivory box carved with figures); the other which requires a sharp knife and has for its end the cutting up, often the slicing, of meat at table in pieces suitable for serving (as, to carve a roast of beef; the head of the family carves the turkey). Slit implies the making of a lengthwise cut: except that it suggests the use of a sharp clean-cutting instrument such as scissors, a scalpel, a sword, knife, or the like, it carries no clear connotations as to the extent of the cut in depth or in length; as, the surgeon slit the abdominal wall in front of the appendix; the long skirt was slit to the knee; to slit a sealed envelope. Slash also implies a lengthwise cut, but usually suggests a sweeping, random stroke with a sharp sword, knife, tomahawk, or the like, that inflicts a deep and very long cut or wound: very frequently it connotes repeated cuts and, often, furious or rough-and-tumble fighting; as, few emerged alive from that battle who were not slashed; the trunk of nearly every tree was slashed by the rowdies. Ana. Split, cleave, rive (see TEAR): sever, sunder (see SEPARATE, v.): curtail (see SHORTEN).

Cyclopean. Gigantic, giant, gigantean, colossal, herculean, *enormous, immense, huge, vast, mammoth, elephantine, titanic, Antaeon, Gargantuan, Brobdingnagian.

cynical. Cynical, misanthropic (or misanthropical), pessimistic, misogynic (or misogynical), misogynous come into comparison only as meaning deeply, often contemptuously, distrustful. Cynical implies a sneering disbelief in sincerity and rectitude. "The ease with which she [Queen Elizabeth] asserted or denied whatever suited her purpose was only equalled by the cynical indifference with which she met the exposure of her lies" (J. R. Green). "But people are nowadays so cynical- they sneer at everything that makes life worth living" (L. P. Smith). Misanthropic implies a rooted dislike and distrust of one's fellow men and aversion to their society; as, Swift was a man of an unhappy, misanthropic state of mind; "He...view'd them not with misanthropic hate" (Byron). Pessimistic suggests a distrustful and gloomy view of things in general; as, the pessimistic philosophy of Schopenhauer. "Our doctor...was...of kindly heart, though of violent speech...and of pessimistic temperament" (H. Ellis). Misogynic (or the rarer misogynous) implies a deep-seated aversion to, and a profound distrust of, women; as, "his misogynic soul" (Meredith); a misogynic old bachelor.

daily. Daily, diurnal, quotidian agree in meaning of each or every day. Daily is used with reference to the ordinary concerns of life; as, daily wants, cares; the daily newspaper. Sometimes, however, it implies an opposition to nightly; as, "the daily anodyne, and nightly draught" (Pope). Diurnal is commonly either astronomical (with special reference to the movements of the heavenly bodies) or poetic in its use; as, the diurnal revolution of the earth; "Rolled round in earth's diurnal course" (Wordsworth). Diurnal also implies opposition to nocturnal; as, the diurnal and nocturnal offices of the monks. Quotidian adds to daily the implication of recurrence each day (as, a quotidian fever). In current usage, it often also suggests a commonplace, routine, or everyday character or quality; as, "That quality of strangeness which puts a new light on all quotidian occupations" (Bennett); "he [Mark Twain] has found in quotidian interests and affections and appetites so complete an escape from the labors and the struggles of the creative spirit" (Van W. Brooks).

danger, n. Danger, peril, jeopardy, hazard, risk agree in meaning either the state or fact of being threatened with loss of life or property, or with serious injury to one's health, morals, or the like, or the cause or source of such a threat. Danger is the general term, and implies contingent evil in prospect, but not necessarily impending or inescapable; as, "To win renown Even in the jaws of danger and of death" (Shak.); "Where one danger's near, The more remote, tho' greater, disappear" (Cowley); "A frame of adamant, a soul of fire, No dangers fright him" (Johnson). Peril usually carries a stronger implication of imminence than danger and suggests even greater cause for fear and a much higher degree of probability of loss or injury; as "In perils of waters, in perils of robbers... in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea" (2 Corinthians xi. 26); "He [Augustus] lived in constant peril" (Buchan); "the perils which threaten civilisation" (H. Ellis). Jeopardy implies exposure to extreme or dangerous chances; as, "Why stand we in jeopardy every hour?" (1 Corinthians xv. 30). The term is much used in law in reference to persons accused of serious offenses, being tried in court, and therefore exposed to the danger of conviction and punishment. "Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb" (U. S. Constitution). "It seems to me that logically and rationally a man cannot be said to be more than once in jeopardy in the same cause, however often he may be tried" (Justice Holmes). Hazard implies danger from something fortuitous or beyond one's control; it is not so strong a term as jeopardy; as, "The amusements... of most of us are full of hazard and precariousness" (Froude); "There would have been no triumph in success, had there been no hazard of failure" (J. H. Newman); "Travel on the thoroughfares of Manila was not without its hazards" (V. Heiser). Risk, more frequently than hazard, implies a voluntary taking of doubtful or adverse chances; as, "No chance of opulence," he said, "is worth the risk of a competence" (Scott); "No adventure daunted her and risks stimulated her" (H. Ellis).

Ana. Threatening or threat, menacing or menace (see corresponding verbs at THREATEN): precariousness (see corresponding adjective at DANGEROUS): emergency, exigency, pass (see JUNCTURE).

Ant. Security. — Con. Safety (see corresponding adjective SAFE): immunity, *exemption: safeguarding or safeguard, guarding or guard, protection, defending or defense, shielding or shield (see corresponding verbs at DEFEND).

dangerous. Dangerous, hazardous, precarious, perilous, jeopardous, risky are here compared more because they are often used interchangeably without warrant than because they are close synonyms. However, some are actually synonyms and all carry the meaning attended by or involving the possibility of loss, evil, injury, harm, or the like. Dangerous applies to persons or to things that should be or are avoided or that should be or are treated with exceeding care because contact with them or use of them is unsafe and exposes one at least to danger; as, a dangerous weapon; a dangerous occupation; a dangerous practice; a dangerous doctrine; conditions dangerous to health; a dangerous person; "The child discovers that grown-ups lie to him, and that it is dangerous to tell them the truth" (B. Russell). Hazardous carries a far stronger implication of dependence on chance than dangerous carries: it is often the preferred term when the chances of loss, death, severe injury, or the like, are comparatively great; thus, a hazardous occupation (especially in insurance) is one in which the worker must run very great risks of accident or loss of life; a hazardous enterprise is one which has as many (if not more) chances of failing as of succeeding. "No one should be deluded into believing that we can ever have completely assured lives. Living is a hazardous business at the best" (C. C. Furnas). Precarious is often used incorrectly where dangerous or even hazardous would be the far better word. The basic meaning of this word is uncertain or insecure: therefore, it may be used without any implication of threatened danger or of possible hazards; thus, in strict use, a precarious tenure of office is one that is not fixed but is dependent on the will or pleasure of one's superiors; precarious health is uncertain health, rather than a physical condition threatening death; a precarious occupation is one that may be neither dangerous nor hazardous, but that is uncertain as in its tenure or in its remunerativeness; so, "Whoever supposes that Lady Austen's fortune is precarious is mistaken. . . It is . . . perfectly safe" (Cowper); "A National Church in the early Caroline sense depended upon the precarious harmony of the King, a strong Archbishop, and a strong First Minister" (T. S. Eliot). Nevertheless, especially in current use, the term often carries also an implication of attendance by danger or hazards: this use is by many regarded as questionable unless the stress is on insecurity or uncertainty; thus, a precarious hold or footing is one that is so insecure that it involves danger; so, "the precarious track through the morass" (Scott); "keeping a precarious and vital balance, like a man walking on high on a tight rope" (C. E. Montague); "We had to scramble precariously on the slopes of crumbling banks" (A. Huxley). Perilous carries a stronger implication of the immediacy of a threatened evil than dangerous; as, "After all their intolerable toils, the sounding tumult of battle, and perilous sea-paths, resting there. . . amid the epitaphs and allegorical figures of their tombs" (L. P. Smith); "We all know how perilous it is to suggest to the modern woman that she has any 'sphere'" (Babbitt). Jeopardous applies strictly to that in which the chances of great evil, such as of loss, serious injury, death, or the like, are about equal to the chances of good, such as success, profits, safety, or the like: the term, therefore, usually connotes exposure to the worst as well as the possibility of the best; as, it is a jeopardous venture to start a new business in these times; he felt that he was in a jeopardous situation, but hoped that all would turn out well. Risky comes close to perilous in suggesting high possibility of harm, but it is usually, though far from invariably, applied to that which a person does, or accepts, or carries on voluntarily and often with knowledge of the perils or risks to which it exposes him; as, to undertake a risky job; to make a risky investment; that was a risky stroke in tennis.

Con. *Timid, timorous: *cowardly, pusillanimous, craven: *cautious, wary, circumspect, chary: prudent, sensible, sane, *wise, judicious.

dark, adj. 1 Dark, dim, dusky, dusk, darkling, obscure, murky, opaque, gloomy come into comparison when they mean partly or wholly destitute of light. Dark, the ordinary word and the most general of these terms, implies a lack of the illumination necessary to enable one to see or to identify what is before him. It may imply lack of natural illumination, as by the sun or moon (as, a dark forest; a dark night), or of artificial illumination as by gas or electricity (as, a dark room), or a lack of immaterial light, such as cheerfulness (as, a dark mood; a dark countenance), moral or spiritual light (as, a dark deed), or lack of brilliance—that is, the quality of lightness in color (as, a dark blue). Dim suggests just so much darkness that the things before one cannot be seen clearly or in their distinct or characteristic outlines: the term, therefore, so often suggests a degree of luminosity that it is even more often applied to the source of illumination (as, the light has grown dim; dim stars), or to a thing seen indistinctly (as, he could just make out dim figures in the distance; "Even to himself that past experience had become dim"—G. Eliot), or to a usually bright thing that is dulled or softened ("a . . . dim and tender red"—Hudson; "a dim image of their glorious vitality"—J. W. Krulch), than it is to a place or time that is nearly dark ("scrambled over to join the other ghosts out on the dim common"—Galsworthy; "the hazy light . . . reminded him of the dim distances of his own . . . country"—S. Anderson). Dim is also applied to eyes, sight, etc., to suggest a loss of keenness of vision; as, eyes dim with tears; dim eyesight. Dusky and the now far less common dusk suggest the halfway state between light and dark characteristic of twilight: like dim they imply faintness of light, but unlike that word, they definitely connote grayness and an approach to darkness; as, dusky winter evenings; the dusky windowless loft; dusky clouds; "rich as moths from dusk cocoons" (Tennyson). Darkling, originally and still often an adverb, is a literary term, close to dark in its implications, but carrying a stronger suggestion of blackness, mysteriousness, or uncanniness; as, "He wars with darkling Powers (I war with a darkling sea)" (Kipling); "the dock like a sheet of darkling glass" (Conrad); "under the shadow of the darkling cloud the house seemed bare and cold" (M. Austin). Obscure is now more often used in its extended senses (see OBSCURE) than in its literal sense, but it is still employed when there is a suggestion of darkening by covering, concealment, overshadowing, or the like, that deprives a thing of its lightness, brightness, or luster; as, "Obscurest night involved the sky" (Cowper); obscure stars; an obscure corner of the attic; obscure men and women. Murky originally implied and still sometimes implies intense darkness, or a darkness in which things are not even faintly visible; as, "Hell is murky" (Shak.). In current use, the term more often suggests a thick, heavy darkness suggestive of smoke-laden fogs or of air filled with mist and dust; as, "an atmosphere murky with sand" (Cather); "as if its [London's] low sky were the roof of a cave, and its murky day a light such as one reads of in countries beneath the earth" (L. P. Smith). In some use, murky implies an opposition to transparent and translucent, but commonly the specific term in this sense is opaque; thus, an opaque liquid is one through which rays of light do not pass; a murky liquid is so muddy or turbid that it is opaque. Gloomy (as here considered: see also SULLEN) implies imperfect illumination owing to causes that interfere seriously with the radiation of light, such as dense clouds, or the heavy shade of many closely set trees: in addition, it often connotes pervading cheerlessness; as, the day was especially gloomy for June; the gloomiest part of the forest; the room was gloomy and depressing with only a dim light from a small candle.

deacon, v. Doctor, *adulterate, sophisticate, load, weight.

Ana. Tamper, *meddle: alter, vary, modify, *change.

dead, adj. Dead, defunct, deceased, departed, late, lifeless, inanimate come into comparison especially in their literal senses since all mean devoid of life. Dead applies strictly to anyone or to anything that has been deprived of life, and has therefore ceased to grow or to function; as, a dead person; a dead animal; a dead tree; every plant in the garden is dead as a result of the intensely severe winter. But dead is also applicable to things which have not had life in the literal sense of that word, but have existed for a time and have been used or accepted or have proved effective, influential, or the like; thus, a dead language is no longer in use by any people; a dead belief no longer has any acceptance; a dead journal no longer is printed and circulated; a dead issue or question no longer arouses interest or debate. Figuratively, the term implies lack or loss of sensation, consciousness, feeling, activity, energy, or any of the qualities associated with life; as, dead fingers; a dead engine; a dead cigar; the dead season in a business. "Breathes there the man, with soul so dead, Who never to himself hath said, This is my own, my native land?" (Scott). Defunct differs little in its literal sense from dead, except in the fact that it is somewhat bookish, and, therefore, used chiefly in grandiose or humorous speech or writing. "Charlotte had entered society in her mother's turned garments, and shod with satin sandals handed down from a defunct aunt" (E. Wharton). The term is more often applied to a thing that by failure, dissolution, or the like, has ceased to function or to operate; as, a defunct newspaper; a defunct corporation. Deceased, except in rare humorous use, applies only to a person, and especially to one who has died comparatively recently or who, though dead, is at the moment under consideration: the use, however, is largely legal or euphemistic; as, laws prohibiting the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister; the legal heirs of the deceased millionaire were never found. Departed is even more euphemistic or formal (especially in religious use) than deceased; as, to pray for the souls of departed relatives and friends. Late is often used in place of deceased or departed when there is a strong implication of a recent death or of one affecting the relations or status of a living person, a going institution, or the like. Ordinarily, it is applied only to a person who was the one preceding the present in the same relationship or status; as, John Harrison, son of Mrs. J. G. Brown and the late Mr. Harrison; the late chairman of the board of directors; the late master of the house. Lifeless, unlike the preceding words, does not necessarily imply deprivation of life for it is applicable not only to that which is literally dead or defunct but also to that which never had life or is incapable of life. In comparison with dead, however, lifeless stresses the absence (sometimes, when loss of consciousness is implied, the apparent absence) of life; thus, a dead person; a lifeless body; when the day of his expected return came, he was dead; "There in the twilight cold and grey, Lifeless, but beautiful, he lay" (Longfellow). In its extended use, lifeless is especially applicable to things (far less often to persons) that have not or never have had vitality, power, or spirit; as, a lifeless color; a lifeless poem; she has been lifeless since her recovery from a prolonged illness; "dull lifeless mechanical systems that treat people as if they were things" (Wilde). "Monochrome is a starved and lifeless term to express the marvellous range and subtlety of tones of which...the preparation...known as Chinese ink is capable" (Binyon). Inanimate is more consistently used than lifeless in describing that which never had life; it is the preferred term when a contrast between that which is devoid of life and that which possesses life is expressed or implied; as, "objects which consist of inanimate matter" (Jeans); "a transition...from the inorganic to the organic, from the inanimate to the living" (Inge); "harnessing inanimate power to carry us and our burdens" (C. C. Furnas). But inanimate is also applicable in extended use to that which is spiritless, inactive, or not lively, and therefore dull; as, an inanimate style or sermon; an inanimate stock market.

Ant. Alive. — Con. *Living, quick.

deadly, adj. 1 Deadly, mortal, fatal, lethal come into comparison when they mean causing or causative of death. Deadly does not in current usage always imply certainty of death, but an extremely high degree of probability; the term therefore applies to anything that is bound or extremely likely to cause death; thus, a deadly disease is one that usually destroys life (as, tuberculosis is no longer a deadly disease); a deadly weapon is one that is almost certain to inflict death when used with skill or precision; the seven deadly sins in theology are those sins which must be avoided because when committed they are certain to be the source of other sins and therefore are destructive of spiritual life and progress. "Two brave vessels matched in deadly fight, And fighting to the death" (Wordsworth). "Poisons more deadly than a mad dog's tooth" (Shak.). Mortal, as here compared, implies that death has occurred; the term therefore is applicable only to that which actually, and often immediately, has caused death; thus, a mortal disease is one that causes a person or many persons to die (as, in his case, tuberculosis was a mortal disease); his wound was mortal (that is, he died as a result of it); a mortal sin (in contrast with a deadly sin) is a grievous sin deliberately committed and actually inflicting spiritual death. Deadly applies to the instrument that deals the wound, blow, or the like, that proves mortal; as, a deadly lance; a mortal stab. Fatal stresses inevitability, and applies to that which will result in, or has actually resulted in, death, destruction, or disaster. The term is often used in place of mortal as applied to wounds, blows, illnesses, and the like, especially when some time has intervened between the wounding or sickening and the dying. Fatal rather than mortal is used in predictions; as, to remove him to the hospital would be fatal; "at her age... it [diabetes] was not speedily or necessarily fatal" (H. Ellis); "I will not repeat your words... because the consequences to you would certainly be fatal" (H. Adams). Lethal applies only to that which by its very nature is bound to cause death or which exists for the purpose of destroying life; as, a lethal dose of morphine; a lethal poison (or gas); a lethal chamber (that is, a room for the execution of those condemned to death); a lethal weapon. All of these terms except lethal may be used in a lighter sense not implying physical or spiritual death, but something dreaded or greatly feared; thus, a deadly shaft of irony causes complete discomfiture; mortal terror always suggests extreme terror, but only occasionally the terror of losing one's life; a fatal error or a fatal slip may imply the destruction of one's plans or hopes, rather than of one's life.

Ana. Destroying or destructive (see DESTROY): killing, slaying (see KILL, v.): malignant, malign (see MALICIOUS): baneful, *pernicious: toxic, virulent, *poisonous, pestilential, pestilent: ruinous (see corresponding verb RUIN). 2 Deadly, deathly are no longer synonyms but they are frequently confused. In strict use, deadly applies to that which is bound or extremely likely to cause death (see DEADLY, 1); in one of its extended senses, it applies to that which is so implacable or virulent, or so relentless, that it can result only in death, destruction, ruin, or the like; as, a deadly enmity existed between them; the two railroads are engaged in a deadly conflict over rates. In loose use, deadly often implies an extreme of something (as, deadly monotony; why are you in such deadly haste?), often a disgusting extreme of some depressing or spirit-destroying quality; as, the city is deadly in summer. Deathly applies only to that which suggests the appearance or the presence of death; as, his deathly pallor; the deathly stillness of the place.

deal, v. *Distribute, divide, dispense, dole.

Ana. Apportion, *allot, assign, allocate: *share, participate, partake.

Con. Collect, *gather, assemble: *receive, take: *keep, retain, withhold, hold back, detain, reserve.

dealings. *Intercourse, commerce, traffic, communication, communion, commune, conversation, converse, correspondence.

dear. Expensive, *costly, precious, valuable, invaluable, priceless.

Ana. Exorbitant, *excessive, extravagant, inordinate.

Ant. Cheap.

death. Death, decease, demise, passing agree in denoting the end or the ending of life. Death is the general word for the termination of every form of existence, of plants and animals as well as of men; decease and demise apply only to human beings, except in figurative use. Decease is the legal term or, in ordinary use, a slightly euphemistic or rhetorical term for death. Demise in common usage is a grandiloquent term for death. "Considered as a demise, old Featherstone's death assumed a merely legal aspect" (G. Eliot). Passing is a euphemism for the death of a person.

Ant. Life.

deathless. *Immortal, undying, unfading, fadeless, amaranthine.

Ana. *Everlasting, endless, never-ending: eternal (see INFINITE): enduring, abiding, persisting (see CONTINUE).

Con. Ephemeral, *transient, transitory, evanescent, passing.

deathly. *Deadly.

Ana. *Ghastly, macabre, gruesome, grisly.

Ant. Lifelike.

debar. *Exclude, blackball, disbar, suspend, shut out, eliminate, rule out.

Ana. Preclude, obviate, *prevent: *forbid, prohibit, ban, interdict.

Con. *Invite, court, woo, solicit, bid: permit, allow *let.

debase. 1 Debase, vitiate, deprave, corrupt, debauch, pervert come into comparison as meaning to cause a person or thing to become impaired and lowered in quality or character, especially in moral character or influence. The same distinctions in implications and connotations are also evident in the adjectives (usually participial adjectives) corresponding to the verbs, debased, vitiated, depraved, corrupted (but more often, corrupt), debauched, perverted. Debase (as here considered: see also ABASE) and debase imply a loss of worth, value, or dignity and are applicable, therefore, to a great number of things; as, plays that debase the taste of the people; a debased coinage. "The life-and-death struggle with Hannibal... had permanently debased the Roman temper and left in it a core of hard inhumanity" (Buchan). "Success permits him to see how those he has converted distort and debase... his teaching" (A. Huxley). "The fine old [English] language which has been slowly perfected for centuries, and which is now being... debased by the rubbishy newspapers which form almost the sole reading of the majority" (Inge). Vitiate and vitiated imply impairment through the introduction of a fault, a defect, or anything that destroys the purity, validity, or effectiveness of a thing; as, a style vitiated by exaggeration; "inappropriate and badly chosen words vitiates thought" (A. Huxley); "Alceste's [one of Moliere's characters] sincerity is vitiated by its unreasonableness" (S. Alexander); the vitiated air of a crowded hall; "Party jealousies vitiated the whole [Spanish loyalist] military organization" (Times Lit. Sup.); "a final decree... vitiated [i.e., invalidated] by the judge's assumption that he was bound by the master's findings of fact" (Justice Holmes). Deprave and depraved now usually imply pronounced moral deterioration; thus, a person who has a

debased literary taste cannot enjoy that which is really good or beautiful if it lacks external qualities to which he is accustomed; a person with a depraved literary taste finds satisfaction only in that which is wholly or partly obscene or prurient; "The belief that a witch was a person who leagued herself with the Devil to defy God and deprave man" (The Spectator, 1890). Corrupt (both verb and adjective: for the latter see also VICIOUS) and corrupted imply a loss of soundness, purity, integrity, or the like, through forces or influences that break down, pollute, or destroy: the terms are applicable to things which are subject to decay, disintegration, or irreparable contamination of any sort; as, "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt" (Matthew vi. 19); "we must not so stain our judgement, or corrupt our hope" (Shak.); "the idea of beauty has been corrupted by those who would make it purely impressionistic or expressive" (Babbitt); "Our schools teach the morality of feudalism corrupted by commercialism" (Shaw). Often also, the terms imply seduction, bribery, or the like, as leading to a moral breakdown or to an immoral act; as, men who make a business of corrupting young girls; they were not able to corrupt the new legislators; corrupted courts. Debauch and debauched imply a demoralizing and depraving through corrupting influences such as a life of pleasure, ease, or sensual indulgence: they suggest the weakening, more often than the loss, of such qualities as loyalty to one's allegiance or duties, fitness for responsibility or high endeavor, and moral purity or integrity, and they often also connote dissoluteness or profligacy; as, "To betray their master and debauch his army" (James Mill); to debauch a woman; "the Duke of Anjou... was thrust forward to be the figurehead of it [a plot against Richelieu] and the gay, debauched, quite inconsequent lad was managed like a puppet" (Belloc). Pervert and perverted imply a twisting or distorting of something (sometimes someone) from what it is in fact or in its true nature, so as to debase it completely or make it incapable of proper or correct application; thus, to pervert the meaning of a text is to twist that meaning in interpreting it so that it will serve one's own ends or seem to prove one's thesis; to pervert the facts in a case is to give a distorted and, usually, personally advantageous view of them; to pervert the ends of nature is to use one's appetites or natural desires for other ends than those which are normal and in accordance with nature; so, "subjugation of the eternal to the temporal in a perverted set of values" (Times Lit. Sup.); "these nothings which... people are so prone to start a row about, and nurse into hatred from an idle sense of wrong, from perverted ambition" (Conrad); "The truth to him... is not only not to be spoken at all times, but it is now and then to be perverted" (Brownell).

Ana. Defile, pollute, taint, *contaminate: *adulterate, sophisticate, load, weight, doctor, deacon: impair, spoil, mar, damage, harm, *injure.

Ant. Elevate (taste, character, etc.): amend (morals, way of life, etc.). — Con. Enhance, heighten (see INTENSIFY): raise, *lift: *improve, better, ameliorate.

2 Degrade, demean, *abase, humble, humiliate.

Ana. *Weaken, undermine, sap, enfeeble, debilitate, cripple, disable.

Con. *Vitalize, energize, activate: vivify, enliven, *quicken: *renew, restore, refresh, rejuvenate.

debased. Vitiated, depraved, corrupted, debauched, perverted. See under DEBASE, 1.

Ana. Deteriorated, degenerated or degenerate, decadent (see corresponding nouns at DETERIORATION).

Con. Improved, bettered, ameliorated (see IMPROVE): raised, elevated, lifted (see LIFT, *).

debate, v. Dispute, argue, *discuss, agitate.

Ana. *Contend, fight, battle, war: wrangle, altercation, quarrel (see under QUARREL, *): controvert, refute, confute, rebut, *disprove: *prove, demonstrate.

Con. *Grant, allow, concede.

debate, n. Disputation, forensic, *argumentation, dialectic.

Ana. Controversy, *argument, dispute: contention, dissension (see DISCORD).

debauch. Corrupt, deprave, pervert, *debase, vitiate.

Ana. *Injure, harm, damage, spoil, mar: seduce, inveigle, decoy, tempt, *lure: pollute, defile, taint (see CONTAMINATE).

debauched. Corrupted, depraved, perverted, debased, vitiated. See under DEBASE.

Ana. Dissolute, reprobate, *abandoned, profligate: *licentious, libertine, lascivious, libidinous, lecherous, lewd, wanton.

debilitate. Enfeeble, *weaken, undermine, sap, cripple, disable.

Ana. Impair, *injure, damage, harm, hurt, mar, spoil.

Ant. Invigorate. — Con. Energize, *vitalize: *renew, restore, rejuvenate, refresh.

debt. Indebtedness, liability, *debt, obligation, arrear, arrearage.

Ant. Credit.

debonair. Debonair (or, rarely, debonaire), jaunty, perky, cocky, chipper are not close synonyms, but they come into comparison in their basic meaning, that is, distinguished by a gay, sprightly manner and well-set-up appearance. Debonair still carries implications derived from its earliest sense of gentle or gracious, of a manner or bearing characteristic of persons of high birth and fine breeding: it carries not the slightest suggestion of priggishness, affectation, or of coxcombry, but rather connotes an easy graciousness, a lightness of heart, a distinguished but not obtrusive grace of bearing, that are inherent rather than acquired; as, "In spite of his gay and debonair manner, he looked old" (Edgeworth); "his frank debonair manner, his charming boyish smile, and the infinite grace of that wonderful youth that seemed never to leave him" (Wilde); "Bodies trained and tuned to the perfect pitch, Eager, blithe, debonair, from head to heel Aglow and alive in every pulse" (W. W. Gibson).

Jaunty suggests the manner or bearing of one who has consciously acquired sprightliness, ease, spruceness, dignity of bearing, or the like. It may suggest long training and discipline (as, "He had the spare, alert, and jaunty figure that one often finds in army men, an almost professional military quality that somehow seemed to set his figure upon a horse as if he had grown there"—T. Wolfe), or complacent airiness or affectation (as, "an indescribable air of jaunty impudence"—Dickens; "The ladies have a jaunty walk"—Livingstone). Perky and cocky suggest a ridiculous jauntness or a preposterous affectation of debonairness considering one's stature, station in life, or the like. Perky usually stresses self-assertiveness or a bold putting forward of oneself or of one's charms, opinions, good points, or the like, so as to attract attention (as, "the perky Roman patrician, strutting the Forum ere manhood scarce attained, spouting the stale wisdom of middle age"—Harper's Mag.); cocky emphasizes an assumed arrogance or dash that attracts unfavorable attention (as, "This might have been all very well... if the cocky major had had plenty of money"—Surtees; "The little old man was so cocky. He went along up the cobblestone street like a banty rooster"—S. Anderson). Chipper, a colloquialism apparently of British origin, but now chiefly used in the United States, carries implications of jauntness, nimbleness, sprightliness, and good health: it often suggests the lightness and ease of movement of a small bird such as the wren or lark; as, "As bloom'n' as a rose, and as chipper as a canary bird" (T. C. Haliburton); "Sim's ben to college, and he's pretty smart and chipper" (H. B. Stowe); "I, a woman of seventy, and only a trifle gray,— I, who am smart and chipper, for all the years I've told" (W. Carleton).

Ana. *Gentle, genteel: *gracious, affable, genial, cordial: elegant, graceful, dignified (see corresponding nouns at ELEGANCE): sprightly, gay, *lively: lithe, lithesome, lissome (see SUPPLE).

Con. *Awkward, clumsy, gauche, maladroit, inept: stolid, *impassive, phlegmatic.

debt. Debt, indebtedness, obligation, liability, debit, arrear (or arrears), arrearage come into comparison when they mean something, most often a sum of money, that is owed another. Debt usually implies that the amount is owed in return for goods, property, services, or the like, and can be definitely computed, or if something other than money is owed, that it equals in value if not in kind the thing sold, the service given, or the like; as, to incur a heavy debt for services; to pay one's social debts; this debt is now due; an action (a legal action) in debt; the firm has no debts at present. Indebtedness is applied either to the total amount owed one's creditors or a single creditor; as, the indebtedness of the city exceeds the legal limit; his indebtedness to his father fell just short of a thousand dollars. Obligation, which is chiefly a legal term in this sense, implies a formal agreement to pay a certain amount or to do something, or an acknowledgment of such a promise, such as a contract or a bond; thus, a contractor's obligations may be less than his debts. Liability is an accountant's term used chiefly in reference to general balance sheets of a company or corporation and is the opposite of asset. It is also used of individuals in bankruptcy actions. Technically, it applies to any amount (or what purports to be its equivalent) which constitutes an item of indebtedness. Liabilities include accounts payable, accrued interest, taxes, obligations such as notes, bonds, and debentures, and even capital stock. Debit is also a term in accounting for any item shown on the left side of an account; it usually designates a purchase and its price, and is opposed to credit, or any entry on the right side (that is, for an article returned or an amount paid on account). Arrear, or its more common plural arrears, and the less frequent arrearage, usually imply that some of a debt, but not all, has been paid, but they always imply that the amount owed is overdue; as, to pay off the arrears (or arrearage) of one's rent; the servants found it difficult to obtain the arrears (or arrearage) of their wages.

decadence. Decline, declension, *deterioration, degeneration, devolution.

Ana. Retrogressiveness or retrogression, regressiveness or regression or regress, retrograding or retrogradation (see corresponding adjectives at BACKWARD).

Ant. Rise: flourishing. — Con. Advance, progress (see under ADVANCE, v.): *progress, progression.

decamp. *Escape, flee, fly, abscond.

Ana. Depart, clear out, scam, quit, leave, *go: elude, evade, *escape, shun, avoid.

decay, v. Decay, decompose, rot, putrefy, spoil, disintegrate, crumble come into comparison as meaning to undergo or, in some cases, to cause something to undergo destructive dissolution. Decay implies change, commonly a natural and gradual change, from a state of soundness or perfection; it may or may not suggest the certainty of complete destruction; as, too many sweets cause the teeth to decay; "Infirmity, that decays the wise" (Shak.); "As winter fruits grow mild ere they decay" (Pope). "Nor shall I discuss the causes why science decayed and died under the Roman Empire" (Inge). Decompose stresses the idea of breaking down, either by separation into constituent parts or elements or, more or less euphemistically, of animal and vegetable matter, by corruption; as, "whenever molecules combine or decompose or atoms change partners, it is chemistry" (C. C. Furnas); "The action of bacteria in decomposing the organic products contained and forming gases useful for power and heat" (A. C. Morrison); the odor of decomposing meats. Rot implies decay and corruption, usually of or as if of animal or vegetable matter; the term may or may not imply offensiveness or foulness; figuratively, it differs from decay in stressing stagnation or corruption rather than decline; as, "The... little pitted speck in garner'd fruit, That rotting inward slowly moulders all" (Tennyson); "Blossoms... which fall before they wither rather than cling rotting to the stalk" (Binyon); "There shall they rot, Ambition's honour'd fools!" (Byron). Putrefy not only suggests the rotting of or as if of animal matter, but also suggests and even stresses its extreme offensiveness to sight and smell; as, corpses putrefying on the sun-drenched battlefields; putrefying carcasses. Spoil (see also INJURE) is often used in place of decay, rot, or putrefy when foodstuffs, especially in the home or the market, are referred to; as, roasted pork spoils quickly if not kept in a refrigerator. Disintegrate implies either a breaking down or a breaking apart so that the wholeness or integrity of the thing or the cohesiveness of its particles is destroyed or is in process of destruction; as, the London atmosphere tends to disintegrate bricks. "Rutherford and Soddy found that radio-active substances disintegrate in a way they described as 'spontaneous'—the rate of decay cannot be expedited or retarded by any known physical process" (J. Jeans). "The other great civilisations with which it was once contemporary have passed away or been disintegrated and transformed" (H. Ellis). Crumble implies disintegration of (or, in figurative use, as if of) a substance that breaks into fine particles; as, to crumble a piece of bread with one's fingers. "Winter rains had washed and washed against its... old bricks until the plaster between them had crumbled" (Deland). "Great periods of human culture which flourished at their height just as the sub-structure crumbled" (J. W. Krutch).

Ana. *Weaken, undermine, sap, debilitate, enfeeble: taint, *contaminate, defile, pollute: dilapidate, *ruin, wreck: dissolve, deliquesce (see LIQUEFY).

decease. *Death, demise, passing.

deceased. Departed, late, *dead, defunct, lifeless, inanimate.

deceit. 1 Deceit, duplicity, dissimulation, cunning, guile come into comparison when they mean the quality, the habit, the act, or the practice of imposing upon the credulity of others by dishonesty, fraud, or trickery. Deceit usually implies the intent to mislead or delude; otherwise, it is the most comprehensive of these terms, for it may imply deliberate misrepresentation or falsification, the assumption of a false appearance, the use of fraud or trickery or craft, or the like; as, addicted to deceit; "The fox barks not when he would steal the lamb No, no, my sovereign; Gloucester is a man Unsounded yet and full of deep deceit" (Shak.); "Not There my husband never used deceit" (Browning). Duplicity commonly implies double-dealing or bad faith; usually it suggests a pretense of feeling one way and an acting under the influence of another and opposite feeling. "I should disdain myself as much as I do him, were I capable of such duplicity as to flatter a man whom I scorn and despise" (Burney). Occasionally, however, the word does not imply intentional deceit, but the appearance of it arising out of a complexity of motives or a lack of singlemindedness. "It was chiefly that the simplicity and openness of their lives brought out for him the duplicity that lay at the bottom of ours" (M. Austin). Dissimulation implies deceit by concealing what one truly is, or what one actually feels, and therefore often, but not invariably, suggests duplicity. "Archer looked at her perplexedly, wondering if it were lightness or dissimulation that enabled her to touch so easily on the past at the very moment when she was risking her reputation in order to break with it" (E. Wharton). "The levity of Hamlet, his repetition of phrase, his puns, are not part of a deliberate plan of dissimulation, but a form of emotional relief" (T. S. Eliot). Cunning, as here compared, implies deceit by the use of trickery, wiles, or stratagems; it often connotes a perverted intelligence and almost vicious shrewdness in attaining one's end. "Surely the continual habit of dissimulation is but a weak and sluggish cunning, and not greatly politic" (Bacon). "He . . . had come to the belief that I was incapable of the cunning and duplicity they practised . . . to deceive with lies and false seeming was their faculty and not mine" (Hudson). Guilt carries an even stronger implication of lack of obviousness in the arts practiced or tricks used than does cunning; in very strict use, it carries a strong implication of insidiousness or treacherousness. "We now return To claim our just inheritance of old . . . by what best way, Whether of open war or covert guile, We now debate" (Milton). "But Father Vaillant had been plunged into the midst of a great industrial expansion, where guile and trickery and honorable ambition all struggled together" (Cather). The word has, however, so long been used in phrases such as "without guile," "devoid of guile," and the like, that it now often is used in a very much weaker sense than cunning, sometimes implying little more than artfulness or the use of wiles. "Her heart innocent of the most pardonable guile" (Conrad). "There is a note of unconscious guile, the guile of the peasant, of the sophisticated small boy, in the letter he [Mark Twain] wrote to Andrew Lang" (Van W. Brooks).

Ana. *Deception, fraud, trickery, double-dealing, chicanery, subterfuge: craft, artifice (see ART): cheating, cozening, defrauding, overreaching (see CHEAT, v.).

Con. Honesty, uprightness, scrupulousness (see corresponding adjectives at UPRIGHT): openness, candor, frankness (see corresponding adjectives at FRANK): straightforwardness, forthrightness (see corresponding adjectives at STRAIGHTFORWARD).

2 *Imposture, cheat, fraud, sham, fake, deception, counterfeit, humbug, simulacrum.

Ana. Ruse, wile, *trick, feint, stratagem, maneuver, artifice.

deceitful. *Dishonest, mendacious, lying, untruthful.

Ana. Crafty, tricky, wily, foxy, cunning, *sly, artful: underhand, underhanded, stealthy, furtive, clandestine (see SECRET): *crooked, devious, oblique: delusory, deceptive, delusive, *misleading.

Ant. Trustworthy. — Con. *Reliable, dependable, trusty.

deceive. Deceive, mislead, delude, beguile, betray, double-cross come into comparison when they mean to lead astray or into evil or to frustrate by underhandedness or craft. A person or thing deceives one when he or it leads one to take something false as true, something nonexistent as real, something counterfeit as genuine, something injurious as helpful, or the like: the term usually implies either an imposing upon a person an idea or belief that contributes to his ignorance, bewilderment, or helplessness, or a deliberate ensnaring or entrapping for the agent's own, and usually evil, ends; as, "'No woman's safe with him.' 'Ah, but he hasn't deceived me, Mrs. Berry. He has not pretended he was good'" (Meredith); "A person who first sub-consciously deceives himself and then imagines that he is being virtuous and truthful" (B. Russell). A person or thing misleads one when he, often by intention, or it, by the mistake of the person misled, causes one to follow a wrong path, way, or course, or to fall into error; as, to be misled by a confusing traffic signal; "We never find them misled into the conception that such gifts [of fortune] are an end in themselves" (G. L. Dickinson); "Nor is there any safeguard against the nations being misled and deceived by their governments into sanctioning another great war" (Inge). A person or thing deludes one when he or it deceives or misleads so completely that one is made a fool of or becomes incapable of distinguishing the false from the true; as, "I began to wonder whether I, like the spider that chased the shadow, had been deluded, and had seemed to hear a sound that was not a sound" (Hudson); "Did he, did all the people who said they didn't mind things, know that they really did? Or were they indeed deluded?" (R. Macaulay). A person or, less often, a thing, beguiles one when by some subtle and, usually, agreeable or alluring devices he (or it) misleads, deceives, or deludes one; as, "the male propensity to be beguiled" (M. Austin); "I recalled some of the Indian beliefs, especially that of the . . . man-devouring monster who is said to beguile his victims into the dark forest by mimicking the human voice" (Hudson). A person or thing betrays one when he or it by deception or by treachery delivers one into the hands of his enemy or puts him in a dangerous or false position; as, "Verily I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me" (Matthew xxvi. 21); "Knowing that nature never did betray The heart that loved her" (Wordsworth); "So, times past all number deceived by false shows, Deceiving we cumber the road of our foes, For this is our virtue: to track and betray" (Kipling). A person double-crosses another when, by double-dealing or duplicity, he deceives him or, more often, betrays him; as, it takes a friend to double-cross a friend; Blank said he had been double-crossed by his partner.

Ana. *Cheat, cozen, defraud, overreach: outwit, circumvent (see FRUSTRATE): *dupe, gull, befool, trick, hoax, hoodwink, bamboozle.

Ant. Undeceive: enlighten.

decency. *Decorum, propriety, dignity, etiquette.

Ana. Seemliness, decorousness (see corresponding adjectives at DECOROUS): fitness, suitability, fittingness, appropriateness (see corresponding adjectives at FIT).

decent. 1 *Decorous, seemly, proper, comme il faut, nice, demure.

Ana. Fitting, *fit, appropriate, suitable, meet: conventional, formal, ceremonious (see CEREMONIAL).

Con. *Awkward, gauche, inept, maladroït, clumsy: crude, rough, *rude.

2 Modest, pure, *chaste.

Ana. Virtuous, *moral, ethical, noble: pleasing, grateful, welcome, agreeable, *pleasant.

Ant. Indecent: obscene. — Con. Lewd, lascivious, wanton, libertine, *licentious: ribald, gross, *coarse, vulgar: dissolute, profligate, reprobate, *abandoned.

deception. 1 Deception, fraud, double-dealing, subterfuge, trickery, chicanery come into comparison as meaning the act or practice of, or the means used by, one who deliberately deceives in order to accomplish his ends. Deception may or may not imply blameworthiness, for it may be used not only of cheating, swindling, tricking, and the like, but also of many arts or games in which the object is illusion or mystification; as, to be given to deception; he is incapable of deception; "There is, as the conjurers say, no deception about this tale" (Kipling); magicians are adepts in deception. Deception also may be used in the passive sense for the state of being deceived; as, to fall into deception; "Hee is surely greedy of delusion, and will hardly avoide deception" (Browne). Fraud, on the other hand, except in humorous use, always implies guilt, often criminality, in act or practice. Distinctively, it usually suggests the perversion of the truth for the sake of persuading someone to surrender some valuable possession, a legal right, or the like; as, the elder brother gained control of the property by fraud; he will never stoop to fraud, no matter how much he desires to enrich himself. The term, however, may suggest any act or practice involving concealment of truth, the violation of trust and confidence, or the nonperformance of contracted acts, by which one (such as an agent, an attorney, an executor, an employer, or an employee) gains against conscience an advantage over the other party to the injury of the latter; as, according to one legal decision "silence where necessity requires speech may sometimes constitute fraud." "I think that obtaining money by fraud may be made a crime as well as murder or theft; that a false representation, expressed or implied at the time of making a contract of labor, that one intends to perform it and thereby obtaining an advance, may be declared a case of fraudulently obtaining money" (Justice Holmes). Double-dealing usually implies duplicity in character and in actions, for it frequently suggests an act that in its essence is contrary to one's professed attitude. "In Berlin our fanatical anti-monarchist [Mark Twain]...having been...invited to dine at the Kaiser's right hand...proceeds to tell the world...how incomparable the German Empire is.... Yet it was not hypocrisy, this...double-dealing" (Van W. Brooks). However, the term often implies secret treating with each of two opposed persons or groups as though one were friendly to that person or group and inimical to the other. "Saville...by his double-dealing with the King and the Scots, proved himself a political traitor" (I. D'Israeli). Subterfuge usually applies to an act or a practice which is the means by which one deceives others and accomplishes an end, in precise use always a cowardly end such as escaping censure or attack, evading performance of a duty or a provision of the law, or avoiding the force of an argument or meeting a difficulty. "By a miserable subterfuge, they hope to render this proposition safe by rendering it nugatory" (Burke). "Frauds By forgery, by subterfuge of law" (Cowper). In looser use, the term applies to any deceptive artifice by which one gains an end. "Men resorted to various subterfuges to get a satisfactory look without rudely betraying their intention" (Shaw). Trickery, usually a collective term, implies acts or practices that are intended to dupe or befool others; it often, but far from always, implies moral turpitude and then connotes fraud, double-dealing, and the like. "We rely not upon management or trickery, but upon our own hearts and hands" (Jowell). "I swear I have no heart To be your Queen. To reign is restless fence, Tierce, quart, and trickery" (Tennyson). Chicane and chicanery imply petty or paltry trickery and often subterfuge, especially, but not exclusively, in legal proceedings; as, "To wrest from them by force, or shuffle from them by chicane" (Burke); "Many scenes of London intrigues and complex chicanery" (De Quincey); "Making a tremendous fight [to maintain his hold on the presidency], chiefly by chicane—whooping for peace while preparing for war, playing mob fear against mob fear" (Mencken).

Ana. *Deceit, duplicity, dissimulation, cunning, guile: cheating, cozening, defrauding, overreaching (see CHEAT): duping, gulling, hoaxing, hoodwinking, bamboozling, befooling (see DUPE).

2 *Imposture, cheat, fraud, sham, fake, humbug, counterfeit, deceit, simulacrum.

Ana. Illusion, *delusion, hallucination, mirage.

deceptive. *Misleading, delusory, delusive.

Ana. Specious, *plausible, colorable: *false, wrong.

Con. Genuine, *authentic, veritable, bona fide: true, *real, actual.

decide. Decide, determine, settle, rule, resolve come into comparison when they mean to come, or, less often, to force to come, to a conclusion. Decide (etymologically, to cut off) presupposes previous consideration of a matter causing doubt, wavering, debate, or controversy and implies the arriving at a more or less logical conclusion that brings doubt, debate, etc., to an end: the word may take as its subject the person or persons arriving at such a conclusion or the thing or things that bring them to the conclusion; as, "The time for deliberation has then passed. He has decided" (Ch. Just. Marshall); "This exordium, and Miss Pross's two hands in quite agonised entreaty clasping his, decided Mr. Cruncher" (Dickens); "the...mistress of the household referred to her whether we should have another round or go in to supper. Of course, she always decided as she supposed the hostess wished" (Jeffries); "It was Sophia's list slippers which had finally decided Amy to drop the mask of deference" (Bennett). Determine (as here considered: see also DISCOVER, 2) originally meant to set limits or bounds to: when, in more recent use, the term means basically to decide, this implication of fixing definitely something or other so that its identity, its character, its scope, its direction, or the like, is clear and beyond doubt, distinguishes it from decide; thus, one decides to give a dinner party but determines the guests to be invited; a legislature decides that the state constitution should be revised and appoints a committee with power to determine what changes shall be made; a snub decides a person never again to recognize the offender when he meets him; but the way in which a newly introduced person greets a sensitive man determines the extent to which the latter will make advances when he again meets that person. Also, in a slightly different sense, determine implies the arrival at a conclusion that either is a fixed and unalterable purpose or intention (as, "Can you weep [i.e., move by weeping] Fate from its determined purpose?"—Middleton; "She was... obviously tormented by shyness, but as obviously determined to conquer it"—C. Mackenzie), or is the inevitable result, outcome, or end of what precedes (as, "What we notice determines what we do; what we do again determines what we experience"—W. James; "Their civilization was one of 'city-states,' not of kingdoms and empires; and their whole political outlook was necessarily determined by this condition"—G. L. Dickinson). Settle implies the arrival at a conclusion, often a mental or logical conclusion, but sometimes a termination for which no individual is responsible, that brings to an end all doubt, all wavering, all dispute, and the like; as, the Supreme Court of the United States has power to settle all questions of law; "Time has settled few or none of the essential points of dispute" (H. Adams); death settled all their problems. Rule (as here considered: see also GOVERN) implies a decision or determination by authority, especially by the authority of the court; as, the judge ruled that the question was inadmissible. Resolve implies an expressed or clear decision or determination to do or refrain from doing something; as, to resolve to get up earlier in the mornings; to resolve to give up smoking. "He was resolved to win through to fortune, but he must first discover his tools" (Buchan).

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ana. Conclude, judge, gather (see INFER): *judge, adjudge, adjudicate.

Con. Vacillate, waver, *hesitate, falter.

decided. Decided, decisive are often confused, especially when they mean positive and leaving no room for doubt, uncertainty, or further discussion. In this sense, the words are applied chiefly, but not exclusively, to persons, their natures, their utterances or manner of utterance, their opinions, choices, and the like. Decided implies an opposition to that which is undetermined, indefinite, and neither this nor that; thus, a decided blue raises no question of its greenness, blackness, or the like; a decided success so far overpasses the line between success and failure that no one can question its favorable termination; a decided answer leaves no doubt of a person's wishes, intentions, or the like. When applied to a person's character, expression, movements, and the like, decided suggests qualities (often outward signs of qualities) such as determination, resolution, lack of all hesitation or vacillation, and the like; as, the mother was a decided person to whom will everyone in the family submitted; he has very decided opinions; "I see too many ways of saying things; a more decided mind hits on the right way at once" (Mrs. H. Ward); "Then with a decided step she turned toward home" (E. Wharton). Decisive, on the other hand, implies an opposition to that which is unsettled, uncertain, or wavering between this and that (for this sense as applied to things see CONCLUSIVE). When used in reference to persons it implies one's ability or one's intent to settle, or success in settling, a controverted matter once and for all; as, "This was enough to determine Sir Thomas, and a decisive 'Then so it shall be' closed that stage of the business" (Austen); "She stood up and surveyed herself in the pier-glass. The decisive expression of her great florid face satisfied her" (Joyce).

Ana. *Definite, definitive: determined, resolved (see DECIDE): positive, cocksure, certain, *sure: categorical, *explicit, express.

Con. Dubious, *doubtful, questionable, problematic.

decision. Decision, determination are here compared as denoting strength of mind or character that reveals itself in a power to get or have one's way. Decision often implies both decidedness and decisiveness (see DECIDED) but it usually stresses a power or habit of promptly and definitely making up one's mind when circumstances demand it: it is often imputed as a quality to those who have long and ably exercised authority, but it is also ascribable to one who has great force of personality; as, "You find the decision of the great soldier perpetually appearing in the career of this sickly indomitable man [Richelieu]" (Belloc); "There was...in the personality of that little old lady the tremendous force of accumulated decision—the inherited assurance of one whose prestige had never been questioned" (Galsworthy); "Within his face Courage and power had their place, Rough energy, decision, force" (Masefield). Determination often implies dogged adherence to a settled purpose, but as here especially considered, it emphasizes force of will great enough to carry one through difficulties and hardships without weakening and to impress others with its power or irresistibility. "Into his handsome face, the bitter waters of captivity had worn; but, he covered up their tracks with a determination so strong, that he held the mastery of them, even in his sleep" (Dickens). "His will, so long lying fallow, was overborne by her determination" (Conrad).

Ana. Certitude, assurance, conviction, *certainty: self-confidence, self-assurance, self-possession, *confidence, aplomb: imperiousness, imperativeness, masterfulness (see corresponding adjectives at MASTERFUL).

Ant. Indecision. — Con. *Uncertainty, dubiety, dubiousity, doubt, skepticism.

decisive. 1 *Conclusive, determinative, definitive.

Ana. Critical, crucial, *acute: momentous, significant, consequential, important (see corresponding nouns at IMPORTANCE).

Ant. Indecisive.

2 *Decided.

Ana. Peremptory, imperative, *masterful, imperious: certain, *sure, positive, cocksure: resolute, steadfast (see FAITHFUL).

Ant. Irresolute. — Con. Wavering, fluctuating (see SWING): hesitant, reluctant (see DISINCLINED).

deck, v. Bedeck. *adorn, decorate, ornament, garnish, embellish, beautify.

Ana. Array, apparel, attire, dress, *clothe: primp, prank, *preen, prune, doll up, perk up.

declaration. Announcement, publication, advertisement, proclamation, promulgation, broadcasting. See under DECLARE, 1.

declare. 1 Declare, announce, publish, advertise, proclaim, promulgate, broadcast (and their corresponding nouns declaration, announcement, publication, advertisement, proclamation, promulgation, broadcasting) agree in denoting to make known (or, a making known) openly or publicly. To declare is to make known explicitly or plainly, and usually, in a formal manner. "If Lord Wolsley should declare his preference for a republic..." (Brownell). "The law...declares all such marriages absolutely null and void" (Ch. Just. Taney). To announce is to declare, esp. for the first time, something presumed to be of interest or intended to satisfy curiosity; as, to announce a discovery, one's candidacy for office, the winners in a contest, a forthcoming book. To publish is to make public, now commonly through the medium of print. "He was...exercising great self denial, for he was longing to publish his prosperous love" (Austen). "There were no newspapers to publish every mystery" (C. G. Leland). To advertise is to call public attention to by repeated or widely circulated statements. In its general sense, it often connotes unpleasant publicity or extravagance in statement. "An issue which advertised me...throughout the Church as a supporter of heresy" (W. Lawrence). "[Baudelaire] had...the misfortune to be...extravagantly advertised by Swinburne" (T. S. Eliot). In its specific sense, as implying publicity for the sake of gaining patronage or support for an article of merchandise, it implies the use of the press, the radio, handbills, or the like; so used, it is devoid of unfavorable connotation; as, to advertise a particular make of automobile or brand of cigarettes. To proclaim is to announce orally (sometimes by means of other sound, as that of a trumpet) and loudly in a public place; by extension, to give wide publicity to, often insistently, proudly, boldly, defiantly, or the like. "A lie is as much a lie, when it is whispered, as when it is proclaimed at the market-cross" (Wollaston). "You proclaim in the face of Hellas that you are a Sophist" (Jowett [Plato]). To promulgate is to make known to all concerned something that has binding force (as a law of the realm or a dogma of the church) or something for which adherents are sought (as a theory or doctrine). "The Doctrine of the Immaculate Conception was promulgated in December 1854" (A. Robertson). "That for the training of the young one subject is just as good as another... is surely... an amazing doctrine to promulgate" (Grandgent). To broadcast is to make known in all directions over a large area, now commonly by means of radio. "The doctrine of missionary zeal... has been broad-cast over Christendom" (I. Taylor, 1829). "The largest... wireless station that can broadcast to the world" (Daily Mail).

Ana. *Inform, apprise, acquaint, advise, notify; impart, *communicate: *reveal, disclose, discover, divulge.

2 *Assert, affirm, aver, avouch, avow, protest, predicate, warrant.

Ana. *Express, voice, utter, vent, broach, air, ventilate.

Con. *Suppress, repress: *hide, conceal.

declension. Decline, decadence, *deterioration, degeneration, devolution.

Ana. Decaying or decay, disintegration, crumbling (see corresponding verbs at DECAY): retrogressiveness or retrogression, regressiveness or regression (see corresponding adjectives at BACKWARD).

Con. Ascent, *ascension: rising or rise (see corresponding verb RISE): advance, progress (see under ADVANCE, v.): *progress, progression.

decline, v. Decline, refuse, reject, repudiate, spurn are comparable when they mean to turn away something or someone by not consenting to accept, receive, or consider it or him. Decline is the most courteous of these terms; it is therefore used chiefly in respect to invitations, offers as of help, services, or the like; as, to decline an invitation to dinner; "she declined the chair the Judge pushed toward her" (Cather). "I am very sensible of the honour of your proposals, but it is impossible for me to do otherwise than decline them" (Austen). Refuse is more positive, often implying decisiveness, even ungraciousness; as, "Meats by the law unclean... young Daniel could refuse" (Milton); "The employers refused to 'recognize' the unions" (Shaw). Refuse, however, may imply, as decline does not, the denial of something expected or asked for; as, to refuse one permission or help. "Mark knew that Mrs. Pluepott only lived to receive visitors, and he had not the heart to refuse her the pleasure of a few minutes" (C. Mackenzie). Reject stresses a throwing away, a discarding, or abandoning; it implies a refusal to have anything to do with a person or thing; as, "those who accepted the offer and those who rejected it" (C. E. Montague); "Plotinus definitely rejects the notion that beauty is only symmetry" (H. Ellis); "common sense, rejecting with scorn all that can be called mysticism" (Inge). Repudiate etymologically implies a casting off, originally and still sometimes of a wife whom one refuses any longer to recognize or accept; it now usually connotes either a disowning or a rejection with scorn as untrue, unauthorized, unworthy of acceptance, or the like; as, to repudiate a son; the state has repudiated its debts; to repudiate a religious doctrine or a scientific theory. "I do not see how the United States could accept the contract and repudiate the consequence" (Justice Holmes). "It is the law of nature that the strong shall rule; a law which everyone recognizes in fact, though everyone repudiates it in theory" (G. L. Dickinson). Spurn (etymologically, to kick against; hence, to kick out) carries even a stronger implication of disdain or contempt in rejection than repudiate; as, "the proposals which she had proudly spurned only four months ago" (Austen). "He would be spurned out of doors with a kick" (J. C. Snaith). "Must spurn all ease, all hindering love, All which could hold or bind" (Amy Lowell).

Ana. *Demur, balk, shy, boggle, jib, stick, stickle, scruple.

Ant. Accept. — Con. Take, *receive: consent, *assent, acquiesce, accede.

decline, n. Declension, decadence, *deterioration, degeneration, devolution.

Ana. & Con. See those at DECLENSION.

declivity. Slope, incline, inclination, *slant, grade, gradient.

Ant. Acclivity.

decolorize, decolorate. Blanch, bleach, etiolate, *whiten.

decompose. *Decay, rot, putrefy, spoil, disintegrate, crumble.

Ana. Dissolve, deliquesce, *liquefy, melt.

decorate. Ornament, embellish, beautify, *adorn, deck, bedeck, garnish.

Ana. Enhance, heighten, *intensify: prank, prink, primp, doll up (see PREEN).

decorous. Decorous, decent, seemly, proper, nice, comme il faut, demure come into comparison when applied to persons, their utterances, and their behavior, and mean conforming to or being in accordance with the accepted standard of what is right or fitting or is regarded as good form. That is decorous which is marked by decorum, or the observance of the proprieties; the term usually implies a dignified, sometimes ceremonious, sometimes prim, formality; as, "the decorous platitudes of the last century" (J. R. Lowell); "done something strange and extravagant and broken the monotony of a decorous age" (Emerson); "On Sunday mornings the whole school went to church; in the afternoon it had a decorous walk" (H. G. Wells). That is decent (in its now somewhat archaic sense; for other sense, see CHASTE), which keeps within the bounds of what is appropriate or fitting to its kind or class, not only from the points of view of morality or social propriety but also from those of good taste or the exigencies of a situation. "To praise a man's self [oneself], cannot be decent, except it be in rare cases" (Bacon). "Expression is the dress of thought, and still Appears more decent, as more suitable" (Pope). "He cast only one glance at the dead face on the pillow, which Dolly had smoothed with decent care" (G. Eliot). That is seemly which is not only decorous or decent, but also pleasing to the eye, ear, or mind of the observer; as, "To make a seemly answer" (Shak.); a seemly display of enthusiasm. "It was not seemly that one so old should go out of his way to see beauty, especially in a woman" (Galsworthy). That is proper which is exactly what it should be according to the ethical or social standards or conventions of any class. "Henchard's creed was that proper young girls wrote ladies'-hand—nay, he believed that bristling characters were as innate and inseparable a part of refined womanhood as sex itself" (Hardy). "A few pages back I was expressing a proper diffidence about any conclusions in view, and here I am, almost shouting in favour of one" (C. E. Montague). That is nice (see also NICE, 1; CORRECT) which satisfies a more or less fastidious taste in behavior, manners, speech, or the like; as, his conduct is not always so nice; "It is not enough for the knight of romance that you agree that his lady is a very nice girl" (Justice Holmes). "The undergraduate literary club, whose membership included all nice boys with literary pretensions" (J. P. Marquand). That is comme il faut (a French phrase, much used in English, meaning "as it ought to be") which is proper from the point of view of polite society or of well-bred persons. "But it never can have been comme il faut in any age or nation for a man of note... to be constantly asking for money" (Macaulay). Demure, in current English, no longer stresses decorousness and staidness of demeanor or behavior. This, however, is the sense carried by the word as used by many of the classic English writers; as, "Comely, pensive Nun, devout and pure, Sober, steadfast, and demure" (Milton). In present-day use, demure usually suggests a decorously modest appearance, and often connotes the assumption or the more or less deliberate acquirement of that appearance; as, "received by bustling male assistants... instead of by demure anaemic virgins" (Bennett); "lowering her glance unexpectedly till her dark eyelashes seemed to rest against her white cheeks she presented a perfectly demure aspect" (Conrad). Ana. Formal, conventional, ceremonious, *ceremonial; dignified, elegant (see corresponding nouns at ELEGANCE).

Ant. Indecorous; blatant.

decorticate. *Skin, peel, pare, flay.

decorum. Decorum, decency, propriety, dignity, etiquette come into comparison either when they mean a code (in some cases, an article of a code) of rules respecting what is right, fitting, or honorable, especially in conduct or behavior or, more often, when they mean the quality or character of rightness, fitness, or honorableness in conduct, behavior, and the like, resulting from the observance of such a code. The first three words, though still often used in the senses here considered, have a slightly literary or archaic flavor: the last two are the most common in current speech. Both decorum and decency imply that the code is based upon the nature of things or the circumstances which attend them, and therefore the rules which it embodies have their basis in nature or sound reason. In current use, decorum especially suggests a code of rigid rules or laws governing the conduct or behavior of civilized men under given or understood conditions; as, "If gentlemen of that profession [the army] were at least obliged to some external decorum in their conduct" (Swift); "that continual breach of... decorum which, in exposing his wife to the contempt of her own children, was so highly reprehensible" (Austen); "he enjoyed a distinguished reputation for the excellence of his sermons, for the conduct of his diocese... and for the decorum and devotion of his private life" (T. S. Eliot). The term may, however, suggest (as it did from the mid-sixteenth to the mid-eighteenth century, when the terms denoted a code of laws founded on nature, reason, and the practice of the ancients, and declaring what is seemly and becoming in dramatic, poetic, and other art) a literary or artistic beauty based on order, moderation, and a high degree of intelligibility; as, "that decorum and orderliness without which all written speech must be ineffective and obscure" (H. Ellis). Decency in current colloquial use often stresses a freedom from immodesty or obscenity (as, decency in dress; decency in conduct), but in the earlier sense of the word still followed by discriminating writers it implies a seemliness or appropriateness that is based upon the right relation of one thing to another, such as that of a person to his profession, or rank, or condition in life, or of a thing with reference to its use or end; as, decency of worship; "for himself, Father Joseph was scarcely acquisitive to the point of decency. He owned nothing in the world but his mule, Contento" (Cather); "There are those... for whom St. Paul's [in London], in comparison with St. Peter's [in Rome], is not lacking in decency" (T. S. Eliot); "And there were May [his wife], and habit, and honour, and all the old decencies that he and his people had always believed in" (E. Wharton). Propriety stresses conformity to a standard of what is proper or correct. When used in reference to language, it implies a regard for the established meanings of words, and a refusal to accept what is novel, or not in accordance with a word's etymology or historical development in senses, or not countenanced by good usage; as, the severe propriety of his diction. More often, however, the word implies a rigid code of rules respecting conduct or manners, laid down as correct, proper, and essential by the class (or a class) that regards itself as having the right or the privilege of dictating such rules and of enforcing them, especially in society; as, "My whole life has been at variance with propriety, not to say decency" (Byron); "In the reign of James I the conduct of ladies and gentlemen was not marked by the same prim propriety as in the reign of the highly respectable Victoria" (H. Ellis); "With characteristic independence she had made her reception rooms upstairs and established herself (in flagrant violation of all the New York proprieties) on the ground floor of her house" (E. Wharton). Although in this sense propriety is often used ironically or humorously, the word is sometimes preferred to decency when merely seemly or fitting correctness (and not conformity to convention) is implied; as, "the propriety and necessity of preventing interference with the course of justice" (Justice Holmes). Dignity (as here compared: see also ELEGANCE) seldom, if ever, applies directly to a code or a rule but it does often apply to a state of being that arises from obedience to what one, or one's class, or one's profession, regards as elevated, noble, or in full accordance with one's rank, status, or position: in the senses here considered, it implies governance by a code or by forces which often correspond to the decencies or proprieties; as, to keep one's dignity; to lose one's dignity; not in accord with the dignity of man as a son of God; "I had half a mind to save my dignity by telling him that..." (Conrad). "It is of the essence of real dignity to be self-sustained, and no man's dignity can be asserted without being impaired" (H. Taylor). Etiquette is now the usual term (in place of "the proprieties") for the code of manners and behavior governing one's conduct in society or in a particular milieu, such as a court or legislature, or, often in place of propriety, for the conventional observance of these rules; as, trained in the etiquette of a formal presentation at court; unaware of the etiquette governing the setting of a table for a formal dinner; "The pompous etiquette of the court" (Prescott). "Augustus had kept to the strict constitutional etiquette, indicating his preference but leaving the choice of his successor to the Senate" (Buchan).

Ana. Formality, conventionality, ceremoniousness, solemnity (see corresponding adjectives at CEREMONIAL):

*form, convention, convenience, usage.

Ant. Indecorous; license.

decoy, n. *Lure, bait, snare, trap.

decoy, v. *Lure, entice, inveigle, tempt, seduce.

Ana. Snare, ensnare, trap, entrap, capture, *catch, cop, nab, bag; beguile, delude, *deceive, mislead.

decrease, v. Decrease, lessen, diminish, reduce, abate, dwindle agree in denoting to make or grow less, but they are not always interchangeable. Dwindle is almost never used transitively; diminish is used as an intransitive verb less frequently than dwindle; reduce is used intransitively only in specialized senses; as, the doctor ordered him to reduce. Decrease and lessen, the most general of these words, are often employed in place of any of the others. Nevertheless, decrease is precisely and felicitously used only when it retains, even in the transitive, its etymological implication of the process of growing less, and suggests progressive decline; as, forces that decrease the population (that is, cause it to grow less); his temperature decreases; his fears decreased as dawn approached. Diminish is the more precise word when the ideas of taking away (or subtraction) by an agent and of resultant perceptible loss are to be emphasized; as, their funds were greatly diminished by their extravagance. "His sense of personal initiative is cultivated instead of being diminished" (B. Russell). Reduce adds to diminish the implication of bringing down, or lowering; it suggests more than any of the others the operation of a personal agent; as, to reduce the time needed for an operation; prices were reduced to below cost; to reduce budget estimates drastically. Reduce also is applicable to lowering in rank, status, or condition; as, to reduce a lieutenant to the ranks; "... suddenly reduced from riches to absolute penury" (Conrad). Abate differs from diminish and reduce in its presupposition of something excessive, as in force, intensity, or amount, and in its strong implication of moderation or, especially, when referred to taxes or imposts, of deduction. "Unconsciously the boy abated his stride so that the old man could keep up with him" (M. Austin). Dwindle, like decrease, implies progressive lessening, but is more often applied to things capable of growing visibly smaller. It specifically connotes approach to a vanishing point. "Hull down—hull down and under—she dwindles to a speck" (Kipling).

Ana. Curtail, *shorten, retrench, abridge, abbreviate: *contract, shrink.

Ant. Increase. — Con. Augment, multiply, enlarge (see INCREASE): *extend, protract, prolong, lengthen, elongate: *expand, amplify, swell, dilate, distend.

decrepit. Infirm, feeble, *weak, frail, fragile.

Ana. Worn, wasted, *haggard: *aged, superannuated, old: tottering, quavering, shaking (see SHAKE).

Ant. Sturdy. — Con. *Strong, stalwart, stout, tough, tenacious: *vigorous, lusty, energetic.

decry. Decry, depreciate, disparage, derogate from, detract from, belittle, minimize agree in meaning to write, speak, or otherwise indicate one's feeling in regard to something in such a way as to reveal one's low opinion of it. Decry implies open or public condemnation or censure with the intent to discredit or run down someone or something. "There seems almost a general wish of decrying the capacity and undervaluing the labor of the novelist" (Austen). "You've had a Western education... but you're decrying everything Western science has contributed to the world" (V. Heiser). Depricate implies a representation of a person or thing as of smaller worth than that usually ascribed to it. "To prove that the Americans ought not to be free, we are obliged to depreciate the value of freedom itself" (Burke). "He seems to me to depreciate Shakespeare for the wrong reasons" (T. S. Eliot). Disparage implies depreciation by more subtle methods, such as slighting or invidious reference or faint praise; as, "The critic... is generally disparaged as an artist who has failed" (L. P. Smith); "cities [such as Boston, Philadelphia]... which they [Americans] sometimes pretended to disparage, but of which they were secretly and inordinately proud" (A. Repplier). Derogate from and detract from stress the idea of taking away, positively and injuriously, especially from reputation or merit; derogate from may be used with an impersonal subject only, detract from with either a personal or an impersonal subject. "A few instances of inaccuracy or mediocrity can never derogate from the superlative merit of Homer and Vergil" (Goldsmith). "Far am I from detracting from the merit of some gentlemen... on that occasion" (Burke). "The advocates of pure poetry are apt to take the line that any admixture of logical, of 'prose' meaning detracts from the value of a poem" (Day Lewis). Belittle and minimize both imply depreciation, but belittle suggests an effort to make a thing contemptibly small, and minimize to reduce it to a minimum or to make it seem, sometimes disparagingly, as small as possible; as, he was inclined to belittle the assistance he had received from others; he minimized the dangers of the task. "Let there be no belittling of such qualities as Archer's—his coherent thinking, his sense of the worth of order and workmanship" (C. E. Montague). "'Don't think that I am trying to minimize your excellent work among the hop pickers this year,' he told his curate" (C. Mackenzie).

Ana. *Disapprove, deprecate: *criticize, denounce, reprehend, censure, reprobate, condemn.

Ant. Extol. — Con. Acclaim, laud, eulogize, *praise: *exalt, magnify.

dedicate. Consecrate, hallow, *devote.

Ana. Devote, *direct, address, apply.

deduce. *Infer, gather, conclude, judge.

Ana. Reason, cogitate, *think, speculate.

deduction. 1 Deduction, abatement, rebate, discount are comparable when they mean an amount subtracted from a gross sum. Deduction, the most general term, is interchangeable with any of the others, but not without loss in precision. Abatement is a deduction from a levied tax or impost; as, an abatement of the duties levied at the customhouse; rebate is an amount deducted and returned after payment, either in adjustment of an overcharge or to gain a competitive advantage; as, a rebate on an income tax; a rebate on an insurance premium. Discount is a deduction from an amount owed or price asked in consideration of a cash or prompt payment; as, this bill is subject to 2 per cent discount if paid within thirty days; also, it is an advance deduction of the amount of interest payable on a loan or note from the time the loan is made or the note purchased until the due date; as, the bank credited his account with the proceeds of the note less the discount.

2 Inference, conclusion, judgment. See under INFER.

3 Deduction, induction and their corresponding adjectives deductive, inductive are here compared only as used in logic as meaning (or in the case of the adjectives, as designating) forms of reasoning. Deduction and deductive imply reasoning from premises, or propositions antecedently proved or assumed as true or certain, and procedure from the general or universal to a particular conclusion; thus, the conclusion that one must die someday is based on the premises that all men are mortal and that one is a man; therefore one infers by deduction, or deductive reasoning, that one must necessarily be mortal. Induction and inductive imply reasoning from particular facts to a conclusion that is general or universal in its nature. In its simplest form, induction implies a knowledge of every particular and a generalization from these; thus, the conclusion that all of a certain man's books have red bindings is reached by induction, or inductive reasoning, when one has surveyed his library and has found no exception to this rule. In its more complicated forms, since knowledge of every particular is usually impossible, induction often implies the use of postulates or assumptions which are generally accepted (such as the uniformity of nature), more or less tentative conclusions, and constant observation and experiment and re-examination of the evidence. In this sense, many of the laws of nature stated in the various sciences are derived by induction, but when these laws are used as premises and become the bases for further inferences, the reasoning becomes deductive.

deductive. Inductive (see under DEDUCTION, 3).

Ana. Inferential, ratiocinative, illative (see under INFERENCE).

deed, n. *Action, act.

Ana. Exploit, *feat, achievement.

deed, v. *Transfer, convey, alienate, alien.

deem. *Consider, regard, account, reckon.

deep. 1 Deep, profound, abysmal. Deep and profound in their literal senses denote extended either downward from a surface (actual or assumed) or, less often, backward or inward from the front or outer part. Deep is the most general term; as, a deep pond, ravine, well. Figuratively, as applied to persons or to mental states or processes, deep implies the presence, or a necessity for the exercise, of penetration or subtlety, sometimes of craft; as, a deep politician; deep plots. "A little knowledge often estranges men from religion, a deeper knowledge brings them back to it" (Inge). Profound in its literal sense connotes exceedingly great depth, but is now rare in this use. "A gulf profound as that Serbonian bog... where armies whole have sunk" (Milton). "Canyons more profound than our deepest mountain gorges" (Cather). Figuratively, profound implies the presence or need of thoroughness; as, a profound thinker; a profound treatise. As expressing intensity, profound is commonly stronger than deep. "Motherhood, this queer, sensuous, cherishing love... an emotion more profound than most" (R. Macaulay). Abysmal in its literal sense carries over the idea of abyss, infinite depth, and implies fathomless distance downward, backward, or inward from a surface (real or assumed). "Not much happens to starlight in its long passage through the abysmal depths of interstellar space" (P. W. Merrill). Figuratively, abysmal implies measureless degree and is used only with words denoting a lack or want of something; as, abysmal ignorance; abysmal darkness. "Plays of an abysmal foolishness" (Van W. Brooks).

Con. Shallow, *superficial: flat, plane, plain, *level.

2 *Broad, wide.

deep-rooted. Deep-seated, chronic, confirmed, *inveterate.

Ana. Established, fixed, set, settled. See SET, v.

Con. Eradicated, extirpated, uprooted, wiped out. See EXTERMINATE.

deep-seated. Chronic, deep-rooted, confirmed, *inveterate.

Ana. Ingrained, constitutional, *inherent: profound, *deep.

deface. Deface, disfigure, disfigure, defeature come into comparison as meaning to mar the appearance of a thing. Deface usually suggests a marring (literally or figuratively) of the face or external appearance of anything: it frequently implies the effacement, obliteration, or removal of some part or detail; as, "Earth has yet a little gilding left, not quite rubbed off, dishonored, and defaced" (Hawthorne); "a door defaced by innumerable incised inscriptions" (Shaw); "Bad poets deface what they take [from others], and good poets make it into something better" (T. S. Eliot). Disfigure, as applied to a surface, implies deeper or more permanent injury than deface: as applied to figure or conformation, it frequently suggests such impairing of beauty or attractiveness as results from other than structural injury; as, a book disfigured by many serious faults; "The smallpox... fell foul of poor little Oliver's face... and left him scarred and disfigured for his life" (Thackeray); "where trees, disfigured by no gaudy lanterns, offered the refreshment of their darkness and serenity" (Galsworthy). Disfigure and the rarer defeature suggest the marring, as by distortion, deformation, or eradication, not only of features of the human face but of those of a landscape, a view, a formation, or the like, that depends for its effectiveness on outlines, contours, or diversity of elevations; as, grief disfigured her usually beautiful face; a hillside disfigured by great gashes in its surface, from quarrying operations; "Ruined defeatured shapes of beauty" (Lytton);

"The prey of pale disfiguring death" (John Todhunter).

Ana. *Injure, damage, mar: *deform, distort, contort: mutilate, batter, mangle (see MAIM).

defalcate. Defalcate, peculate, embezzle come into comparison as meaning to steal or purloin money or valuables committed to one's care or custody. The same distinctions in implications and connotations are apparent in the corresponding nouns defalcation, peculation, embezzlement. Defalcate (usually an intransitive verb), and the far more common defalcation, in the narrow senses in which they are here considered, usually but not invariably imply a breach of trust: they always suggest a shortage in one's accounts or a failure to turn over money or property to those to whom it belongs. The term may or may not connote the misappropriation of the funds or property involved in such a shortage or failure, or its diversion to one's own use; as, under the present management, three of the bank's tellers have defalcated; owing to the defalcation of the treasurer of the company, the business passes temporarily into the hands of a receiver. Defalcation less often denotes the act or fact of defalcating than the amount of shortage in one's accounts; as, they estimate the cashier's defalcations as $50,000. Peculate (either transitive or intransitive) and peculation, especially in later and modern use, definitely imply a stealing of money or property that belongs to another and is under one's control for a longer or shorter time. In current English, the term commonly suggests graft, or the use for his own purposes of public money by an official who has access to it; as, "The people... accused them of having peculated the public money" (Southey); "Marlborough was dismissed from his command, charged with peculation, and condemned" (J. R. Green). Embezzle (a transitive verb which may be used absolutely) and embezzlement may imply either defalcation or peculation; however, they carry a far stronger suggestion of the fraudulent misuse, through misappropriation or careless dissipation, of funds definitely entrusted to one's care and not merely passing through one's hands; thus, in very strict legal use, the treasurer of a corporation may be said to embezzle funds when he diverts corporation funds to his own use; an executor of an estate may be said to be guilty of embezzlement when he uses trust funds for his own ends rather than for those dictated by the testator of the will. Embezzle and embezzlement distinctively imply that the money or property has been consigned to one in trust at the wish or with the consent of the owner; therefore, they suggest criminality not in the acquisition but in the use for oneself of what belongs to another.

Ana. *Steal, purloin, pilfer, filch: *rob, loot, rifle, plunder: abscond, decamp (see ESCAPE).

defalcation. Peculation, embezzlement. See under DEFALCATE.

Ana. *Theft, larceny, robbery.

defame. Vilify, calumniate, *malign, traduce, aspersé, slander, libel.

Ana. Vituperate, revile (see SCOLD): *decry, disparage, detract from, derogate from.

Con. *Praise, laud, eulogize, extol, acclaim.

defeat, v. Beat, *conquer, vanquish, lick, subdue, subjugate, reduce, overcome, surmount, overthrow, rout.

Ana. *Frustrate, thwart, foil, baffle, balk, circumvent, outwit.

Con. *Yield, submit, capitulate, succumb, cave in, bow, defer.

defeature. Variant of DISFEATURE.

defect. 1 Want, *lack, absence, privation.

2 Flaw, *blemish.

Ana. *Fault, failing, frailty, foible.

Con. *Excellence, perfection, virtue, merit.

defection. Defection, desertion, apostasy agree in meaning an abandonment that involves the breaking of a moral or legal bond or tie and that is highly culpable from the point of view of the person, cause, or party abandoned. Defection emphasizes both the fact of one's falling away and the loss that is sustained by one's failure to adhere to one's allegiance; in itself as apart from the context it commonly gives no certain indication of motive, though at times disaffection or loss of confidence is connoted; as, the defections from the majority party were so numerous as to cause the first defeat in generations; "the higher we stand, the baser our defection" (Bridges). "The news of the defection of Lepidus caused the Senate to declare him a public enemy" (Buchan). Desertion, in the specific sense here considered, presupposes an oath of allegiance or a duty or an obligation to guard, protect, or support, the violation of which constitutes a crime or a distinctly blameworthy act. It also suggests a base motive, such as cowardly fear or a desire to shirk; as, the penalty for desertion from an army in time of war is usually death; many persons considered Wordsworth's defection from the liberal cause a desertion. Apostasy implies a repudiation of something one has formerly and voluntarily professed; it connotes therefore a retreat, as in weakness, from a position or stand one has taken. The term is used chiefly with reference to a repudiation of religious beliefs, but it is employed with equal correctness when moral, philosophical, or other principles are involved. "When Raphael ... had forewarned Adam, by dire example, to beware Apostasy" (Milton). "Marriage is to me apostasy... sale of my birthright, shameful surrender" (Shaw). "But my political apostasy [from the Republican party after the Civil War]... was attended with no diminution of reverence for that great citizen army that defended and saved the Union" (M. Nicholson).

Ana. Disaffection, alienation, estrangement (see corresponding verbs at ESTRANGE): abandonment, forsaking (see corresponding verbs at ABANDON).

Con. Faithfulness, loyalty, constancy (see corresponding adjectives at FAITHFUL): allegiance, *fidelity, fealty.

defective. *Deficient.

Ana. Impaired, damaged, injured, marred (see INJURE): vitiated, corrupted, debased (see under DEBASE): deranged, disordered (see DISORDER).

Ant. Intact. — Con. *Perfect, entire, whole: complete, *full, plenary: sound, *healthy.

defend. 1 Defend, protect, shield, guard, safeguard come into comparison when they mean to keep secure from danger or against attack. Defend implies the use of means to ward off that which actually threatens or to repel that which actually attacks; as, to raise a large army to defend the country from aggression; guns used in defending the explorers against hostile incursions of the natives. Protect etymologically implies a covering, especially a frontal, but sometimes an overhead, covering, that serves as a bar to the admission or impact of that which may injure or destroy; as, to protect one's estate from intruders by a high wall; to protect one's eyes from the sun by dark glasses; to protect one's family by ample insurance; to protect tobacco plants by a tentlike cheesecloth screen. Shield differs from protect sometimes in its figurative suggestion of the use of something like the medieval warrior's shield, but more often in much more strongly connoting imminent danger or actual attack or protective intervention; as, "Heavens shield Lysander, if they mean a fray!" (Shak.); "I... That shielded all her life from harm" (Tennyson). "I could scarcely believe that she would wish to shield her husband's murderer, if he were that" (R. Macaulay). Guard implies a standing watch over for the sake of defense, as at an entrance or exit or as in a circle or ring around a person or place; it usually connotes vigilance; as, the entrances to the palace are well guarded; the president is always guarded by secret service men; the inmates of a fortress are defended by its guns, protected by its walls, and guarded by sentries against surprise. Safeguard, much more strongly than any of the preceding words, implies use of protective measures where merely potential danger exists; as, to safeguard children who play on the streets; to safeguard our shores from attack. "In all this he was more than worldly-wise. He was safeguarding his own self-respect" (A. Repplier).

Ana. Ward off, avert, *prevent: *oppose, resist, withstand: fight, battle, war, *contend, cope.

Ant. Combat: attack. — Con. Assault, assail, bombard, storm (see ATTACK): submit, cave in, *yield, capitulate.

2 Assert, *maintain, justify, vindicate.

Ana. Voice, vent, utter, *express, air: *explain, account for, justify, rationalize: *support, champion, uphold, back.

defer.¹ Defer, postpone, intermit, suspend, stay agree in meaning to cause a delay in an action, activity, or proceeding. Defer suggests little more than a putting off till a later time: ordinarily it implies an intentional delaying (as, to defer a discussion of a proposal until more members are present; to defer payment on a note; he deferred giving his son needed advice until he found the boy in a less refractory mood) but it may imply a delay in fulfillment, attainment, fruition, etc., that is occasioned by conditions beyond one's control (as, "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick"—Proverbs xiii. 12). Postpone implies an intentional deferring, commonly until a definite time (except in the euphemistic to postpone indefinitely, which often actually implies the calling off of an event); as, to postpone a meeting for a week; her dentist was willing to postpone her appointment until Saturday; "I think that we had better postpone our look round the church until after lunch" (C. Mackenzie). Intermit implies a stopping for a time, usually as a measure of relief, but sometimes merely as a break in a course or proceeding; as, "Pray to the gods to intermit the plague" (Shak.); "When seriously urged to intermit his application [to study], and allow himself a holiday" (M. Pattison). Suspend also implies a stopping for a time, but for any one of various reasons, such as diversion of one's interest (as, "Eleanor's work was suspended while she gazed with increasing astonishment"—Austen), an order or a condition prohibiting continuation or demanding an intermitting (as, to suspend publication; to suspend trolley service during the parade; "Henchard gave orders that the proceedings were to be suspended"—Hardy), or a legislative, executive, or judicial decision (as, "Congress has authorized the President to suspend the operation of a statute"—Justice Holmes; to suspend the sentence of a convicted person), or a desire to wait for more evidence or information (as, to suspend one's judgment of a person charged with a crime). Stay implies the interposition of an obstacle to something that is in progress: it may suggest bringing it to a complete stop, but more often it suggests an intermitting or suspending or a slackening of pace; as, "two spectators started forward, but she stayed them with a motion of her hand" (Dickens); "they couldn't stay the flow of her ideas by reminding her how much the alteration would cost" (M. Austin); "When his [man's] mind fails to stay the pace set by its inventions, madness must ensue" (Day Lewis).

Ana. *Delay, retard, slow: *adjourn.

Con. Hasten, hurry, *speed, accelerate.

defer.¹ Bow, *yield, submit, cave in, capitulate, succumb, relent.

Ana. Accede, acquiesce, *assent, agree: conform, accommodate, *adapt, adjust: truckle, *fawn, cringe.

deference. Reverence, homage, *honor, obeisance.

Ana. Veneration, worship, adoration (see under REVERE): respect, esteem, admiration, *regard.

Ant. Disrespect. — Con. Disdain, scorn, contempt, despite (see under DESPISE).

deficient, adj. Deficient, defective agree in meaning showing lack of something necessary. The words are still sometimes used interchangeably even though in current good usage they tend to diverge in their meanings. Deficient is the preferred term when there is an intent to imply a falling short in the amount, quantity, force, or the like, considered essential to adequacy or sufficiency; defective is the preferred term when there is the intent to imply some definite fault, injury, flaw, or the like, that impairs the completeness or efficiency of a thing; thus, a person is said to be deficient in courage when he has not sufficient courage to meet his difficulties; he is said to be mentally deficient when he has not sufficient intelligence to enable him to take care of himself; he is said to be mentally defective (or a mental defective) when some fault or defect in his nervous or cerebral organism is apparent and he lacks the ability to think coherently, to speak intelligibly, or to co-ordinate his muscles; he suffers from defective hearing when by disease or injury the organ of hearing is impaired; so, deficient sympathies; a deficient supply of food; a defective crystal; a defective mechanism.

Ana. *Meager, scanty, scant, sparse, exiguous: scarce, rare, *infrequent, uncommon.

Ant. Sufficient, adequate: excessive. — Con. Competent, enough (see SUFFICIENT): *plentiful, plenteous, ample, abundant: *excessive, inordinate, immoderate, extravagant.

defile. Pollute, taint, *contaminate, taint.

Ana. *Debase, vitiate, deprave, corrupt, pervert, debauch: profane, desecrate (see corresponding nouns at PROFANATION).

Ant. Cleanse: purify. — Con. Hallow, consecrate (see DEVOTE).

define, v. *Prescribe, assign.

Ana. *Limit, circumscribe: fix, *set, establish.

Con. *Mix, merge, mingle: *mistake, confuse, confound.

definite. 1 Definite, definitive are sometimes confused. That is definite (see also EXPLICIT) which has limits so clearly fixed or defined or so unambiguously stated that there can be no doubt concerning the scope or the meaning of that which is so qualified; as, he has very definite opinions on the matter; definite accomplishments; appointments are made for definite periods of time. That is definitive (for fuller treatment see CONCLUSIVE) which fixes or settles something else and therefore is final or decisive; as, a definitive statement of a doctrine; a definitive judicial decision by the highest court of the land. "This joint effort of church and crown indeed is definitely traceable from the time of Charlemagne... and it found its culmination under Louis XIV., when the nobles were definitively conquered by the crown and the Reformation by the church" (Brownell).

Ana. Defined, prescribed, assigned (see PRESCRIBE):

limited, restricted, circumscribed (see LIMIT, v.): determined, settled, decided (see DECIDE).

Ant. Vague: loose. — Con. *Obscure, ambiguous, equivocal.

2 *Explicit, express, specific, categorical.

Ana. Clear, plain, distinct (see EVIDENT): *full, complete: downright, *forthright: precise, exact (see CORRECT, adj.): concrete (see SPECIAL): clear-cut, *incisive.

Ant. Indefinite: equivocal. — Con. *Doubtful, dubious, questionable.

definitive. 1 Determinative, decisive, *conclusive.

Ana. Settling, deciding, determining (see DECIDE): final, concluding, *last, terminal, ultimate.

Ant. Tentative, provisional. — Con. *Temporary, temporal: experimental (see corresponding noun at EXPERIENCE).

2 *Definite.

Ana., Ant., & Con. See those at DEFINITIVE, 1.

deflate. Compress, shrink, *contract, condense, constrict.

Ana. Reduce, *decrease, lessen: exhaust, *deplete, drain: puncture, prick (see PERFORATE): attenuate, extenuate (see THIN).

Ant. Inflate. — Con. Distend, *expand, dilate, swell.

deflect. *Turn, divert, avert, sheer.

Ana. Deviate, depart, diverge, *swerve, veer, digress: bend, *curve, twist.

deflection or deflexion. *Deviation, aberration, divergence.

Ana. Bending, curving, turning, twisting (see CURVE): swerving or swerve, veering or veer, departing or departure (see corresponding verbs at SWERVE).

deform. Deform, distort, contort, warp, gnarl come into comparison when they mean to mar or spoil a person's or thing's appearance, character, true nature, development, or the like, by or as if by twisting. Deform is the least specific of these terms in its implications: sometimes, it carries no significance other than that expressed in the first sentence above; sometimes, however, it suggests a loss of some particular excellence or essential such as comeliness, perfection of line, attractiveness, or the like; as, "Soul-killing witches that deform the body" (Shak.); "To deform thy gentle brow with frowns" (Roue); "I suspect Mr. Babbitt at times of an instinctive dread of organized religion, a dread that it should cramp and deform the free operations of his own mind" (T. S. Eliot); "with the best intentions in the world, Mr. Imam is incessantly at work to deform and degrade the content of poetry" (Times Lit. Sup.). Distort usually carries a clear implication of twisting or wresting away from or out of the natural, regular, or true shape, posture, or direction: the term, however, is used not only in reference to physical or material things, but also in reference to minds, judgments, facts, statements, etc., that may be twisted by conditions, circumstances, or, when a personal agent is involved, by a dominating purpose or intent; as, "Distorted as a living thing by pain" (Wilde); "the upward slant of the candle-light distorted Mary Adeline's mild features, twisting them into a frightened grin" (E. Wharton); "there is an element of truth in what you say, grossly as you may distort it to gratify your malicious humor" (Shaw); "some accident of immediate overwhelming interest which appeals to the feelings and distorts the judgment" (Justice Holmes). Contort implies a more involved or continuous twisting together or upon itself: it, therefore, both in literal and figurative use, differs from distort in suggesting a grotesque or a painful effect rather than a departure from the natural, the true, or the normal; as, "That most perverse of scowls contorting her brow" (N. Hawthorne); "the baby's face muscles contorted in a manner that only Mammy Clo could have interpreted as an expression of merriment" (R. Bradford); "One generation of fearless women could transform the world, by bringing into it a generation of fearless children, not contorted into unnatural shapes, but straight and candid, generous, affectionate, and free" (B. Russell). Warp literally implies a twisting, or bending, or drawing out of a flat plane, by some force such as drying and shrinking (as, the covers of the book are warped; the back of the chair is warped), but in its common extended use the term implies the operation of any force that twists or wrests a thing so as to give it a bias, a wrong slant, an abnormal direction, a distorted significance, or the like; as, cares have warped her mind; warped views or opinions; "So they [trees] slowly come to full growth, until warped, stunted, or risen to fair and gracious height, they stand open to all the winds" (Galsworthy). "To cut me off from all natural and unconstrained relations with the rest of my fellow creatures would narrow and warp me if I submitted to it" (Shaw). "I'm sure you are disinterested . . . but, frankly, I think your judgment has been warped by events" (Cather). Gnarl in literal use chiefly refers to the roots or trunk of an old tree, sometimes twisted and contorted or, in the case of the trunk, covered with large knots or protuberances. In application to things such as human hands, human bodies, and the like, the term suggests the contortions and deformations characteristic of old age or a rheumatic condition but sometimes produced by heavy work or constant exposure to winds and sun (as, gnarled and weather-beaten sailors; "his drawn bayonet in his large gnarled hand"—H. T. Cockburn); in reference to minds, souls, dispositions, and the like, it suggests extreme or settled contrariness, ingrained unreasonable prejudices, or intense acerbity (as, "Even the shrewd and bitter, Gnarled by the old world's greed"—V. Lindsay).

Ana. *Maim, cripple, mutilate, mangle, batter: disfigure, *deface: *injure, mar, damage, impair.

Ana. Despondency, hopelessness, forlornness, despair, desperation (see under DESPONDENT).

Ant. Exhilaration.

delay, v. 1 Delay, retard, slow, slacken, detain are not always close synonyms but they carry the same basic meaning: to make someone or something behind in his or its schedule or usual rate of movement or progress. Delay implies the operation, usually the interference, of something that keeps back or impedes, especially from completion or arrival at a set or given time; as, a train is delayed; "A plague upon that villain Somerset, That thus delays my promised supply" (Shak.). Retard applies especially to motion, movement, or progress, and implies something which causes it to reduce its speed; as, to retard the swing of a pendulum, the revolution of a wheel; the snow retards our progress; children retarded in development. "Mental evolution has perhaps retarded the progress of physical changes" (Inge). "The rate of decay [of radioactive substances] cannot be expedited or retarded by any known physical process" (Jeanes). Slow (usually followed by up or down) and slacken also imply a reduction in speed or rate of progress, but slow often specifically implies deliberation or intention; slacken, an easing, or letting up, or a relaxation of some sort; as, the engineer slowed down the train as he approached the city; the doctor administered digitalis to slow up his pulse; he slackened his pace to a walk; "having never slackened her . . . search for your father" (Dickens). Detain (see also ARREST, 2) implies a being held back beyond an appointed time, often with resulting delay in arrival or departure or in accomplishment of what one has in mind; as, "I had been detained by unexpected business in the neighborhood" (Conrad); "Tell him that as I have a headache I won't detain him today" (Hardy). "You will not thank me for detaining you from the bewitching converse of that young lady" (Austen).

Ana. Impede, obstruct, *hinder, block: *defer, postpone, stay, suspend, intermit.

Ant. Expedite: hasten. — Con. *Speed, hasten, hurry, accelerate, quicken, precipitate.

2 Delay, procrastinate, lag, loiter, dawdle, dally, dillydally agree in meaning to move or act slowly so that progress is hindered or work remains undone or unfinished. Delay (for transitive sense see DELAY, 1) usually carries an implication of putting off, as one's departure, one's initiation of an action or activity, one's accomplishment of necessary work, or the like; as, when he had his instructions, he did not delay an instant. "Wind of the sunny south! oh still delay, In the gay woods and in the golden air" (Bryant). "Time and again were we warned of the dykes, time and again we delayed" (Kipling). Procrastinate implies blameworthy or inexcusable delay, such as that caused through laziness, indifference, hesitation, or the habit of putting off until tomorrow what should be done today. "The less one has to do, the less time one finds to do it in. One yawns, one procrastinates, one can do it when one will, and therefore one seldom does it at all" (Chesterfield). "A timid, unsystematic, procrastinating ministry" (Burke). Lag implies a failure to maintain a speed or pace, either as set by and therefore in comparison with that of another (as, after an hour's brisk walk, two of the hikers lagged behind the rest; "It was a time of great men, but our learning and scholarship lagged far behind those of Germany"—Inge) or as necessary to the accomplishment of an end or the attainment of a goal (as, "military preparation does lag at a shameful rate"—Carlyle; the production of certain parts necessary for airplanes is lagging). Loiter implies delay while in progress, commonly while one is walking but sometimes while one is trying to accomplish a piece of work: it also suggests lingering or aimless sauntering, lagging, or the like. "Very little remained to be done. Catherine had not loitered; she was almost dressed, and her packing almost finished" (Austen). "The caravan has to go on; to loiter at any distance behind is to court extinction" (C. E. Montague). "The children sauntered down Sloane Street, loitering at the closed shop windows, clinking their shillings in their pockets" (R. Macaulay). Dawdle carries a slighter implication of delay in progress (especially in walking) than loiter but an even stronger connotation of idleness, aimlessness, or of a wandering mind; consequently, it usually implies a wasting of time or a taking of more time than is warranted; as, to dawdle through four years of college; the new servant dawdles over her work; "I did not hurry the rest of the way home; but neither did I dawdle" (V. Heiser). Dally and, now more often, dillydally imply dawdling, but they often also suggest wasting time in trifling, pottering, or foolish employments, or in hesitation or vacillation; as, "[He postponed] his return till the next day. Lucy was his. It was . . . sweet to dally with the delight of seeing her" (Meredith); "lest when he find me dallying along . . . he may hurry ahead" (Irving); "What you do, sir, do; don't stand dilly-dallying" (Richardson); "There is no time to dilly-dally in our work" (Stevenson).

Ana. Linger, tarry, wait (see STAY): *hesitate, falter, vacillate, waver.

Ant. Hasten, hurry.

dele. Delete, cancel, efface, obliterate, blot out, expunge, *erase.

Ana. See those at DELETE.

delectable. *Delightful, delicious, luscious.

Ana. Gratifying, grateful, agreeable, pleasing, welcome, *pleasant: exquisite, rare, delicate, dainty, *choice: *palatable, savory, sapid, saporous, toothsome.

Con. *Offensive, repulsive, revolting, loathsome: repellent, *repugnant, distasteful, abhorrent, obnoxious.

delectation. Enjoyment, delight, *pleasure, joy, fruition.

Ana. Amusement, diversion, entertainment (see under AMUSE): gratifying or gratification, regaling or regalement (see corresponding verbs at PLEASE).

delete. Dele, cancel, efface, obliterate, blot out, expunge, *erase.

Ana. Eliminate, *exclude, rule out: omit (see NEGLECT, v.).

deleterious. Detrimental, *pernicious, baneful, noxious. Ana. Injuring or injurious, harming or harmful, hurting or hurtful (see corresponding verbs at INJURE): destroying or destructive (see corresponding verb DESTROY): ruining or ruinous (see corresponding verb RUIN).

Ant. Salutory. — Con. *Beneficial, advantageous, profitable: wholesome, *healthful, healthy.

deliberate, adj. 1 Willful, intentional, *voluntary, willing.

Ana. Purposed, intended (see INTEND): conscious, cognizant, *aware: mortal, *deadly.

Ant. Impulsive. — Con. Inadvertent, *careless, heedless, thoughtless.

2 Deliberate, considered, advised, premeditated, designed, studied come into comparison when applied to a person's acts, words, or accomplishments and agree in meaning thought out in advance. Deliberate implies full awareness of the nature of what one says or does, and, in very precise use, a careful and unhurried calculation of the intended effect or of the probable consequences; as, a deliberate lie; a deliberate snub. "Poe's consummate and deliberate technique" (Lowes). "The deliberate insertion into a lyrical context of pieces of slang and 'prosaic' words" (Day Lewis). "The tone of most comment, whether casual or deliberate, implies that ineptitude and inadequacy are the chief characteristics of government" (Frankfurter). Considered, unlike deliberate, which it closely resembles in meaning, is seldom applied to questionable acts or practices; it suggests careful study from all angles rather than calculation, and often, therefore, connotes soundness or maturity of judgment; as, there was no time for a considered reply; the committee had before it many half-baked and a few considered proposals.

Advised is seldom used in its adjectival form (except in combination, as ill-advised), but its adverbial derivative advisedly is commonly selected by those who wish a word to carry the implications of considered (which has no adverb). Derived from an obsolete meaning of the verb advise, "to think through" (found also in advisement, which is equivalent to consideration), both adjective and adverb sometimes distinctively suggest an awareness of objections; as, he told them he used the offending word advisedly; everything in this difficult situation has been done advisedly. Premeditated emphasizes forethought and planning but often falls far short of deliberate in implying careful calculation and awareness of consequences. It is applied chiefly, but not exclusively, to offenses which are heinous if not the result of impulse or passion; as, a premeditated murder; a premeditated insult. Designed and its adverb designedly are often applied to that which has the appearance of being accidental, spontaneous, or natural, but which is actually the result of intention; as, the designed failure of a project. "Useless to seek to know whether he has been for years overlooked, or always designedly held prisoner" (Dickens). Studied is applied chiefly to effects gained or qualities achieved as a result of painstaking effort or careful attention to detail; it connotes absence of spontaneity; as, a studied performance of a Beethoven symphony. "The studied dignity and anxious courtesy of the actor-manager" (Shaw). It is also applied to offensive acts, committed with cool deliberation and with attention to its probable effect; as, to treat the opposition with studied discourtesy.

Ana. Planned, schemed, projected (see corresponding verbs under PLAN, n.): calculated (see CALCULATE): *careful, meticulous, scrupulous.

Ant. Casual. — Con. Haphazard, *random, hit-or-miss, desultory, happy-go-lucky, chance, chancy.

3 Leisurely, *slow, dilatory, laggard.

Ana. *Cautious, circumspect, wary, chary, calculating: *cool, collected, composed, imperturbable.

Ant. Precipitate, abrupt. — Con. Impetuous, headlong, sudden, hasty (see PRECIPITATE).

deliberate, v. Reflect, cogitate, *think, reason, speculate.

Ana. *Ponder, meditate, ruminate, muse.

delicate. Exquisite, dainty, rare, *choice, recherché, elegant.

Ana. Delectable, *delightful, delicious: *soft, gentle, mild, lenient, balmy: ethereal, *airy, aerial.

Ant. Gross. — Con. *Coarse, vulgar: rank, rancid, *malodorous.

delicious. Delectable, luscious, *delightful.

Ana. *Palatable, sapid, saporous, savory, toothsome, appetizing: delicate, dainty, exquisite, *choice, rare.

Ant. Bitter. — Con. Distasteful, obnoxious, *repugnant, repellent: *insipid, vapid, flat, wishy-washy, inane, jejune, banal.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

delight, n. *Pleasure, delectation, enjoyment, joy, fruition.

Ana. Glee, *mirth, jollity, hilarity: rapture, transport, *ecstasy: satisfaction, contentment (see corresponding verbs at SATISFY).

Ant. Disappointment: discontent.

delight, v. Gratify, *please, rejoice, gladden, tickle, amuse, regale.

Ana. *Satisfy, content: divert, *amuse, entertain: charm, enchant, fascinate, allure, *attract, take.

Ant. Distress: bore. — Con. *Trouble: *afflict, try: *grieve: *annoy, vex, irk, bother.

delightful. Delightful, delicious, delectable, luscious agree in meaning extremely pleasing or gratifying to one's senses or aesthetic taste. Delightful, the least restricted in its application of these words, is referable to anything that affords keen, lively pleasure and stirs the emotions agreeably, whether the direct appeal is to the mind, the heart, or the senses; as, a delightful prospect; a delightful talk; a delightful companion. "My ears were never better fed With such delightful pleasing harmony" (Shak.). "The experience of overcoming fear is extraordinarily delightful" (B. Russell). Delicious, in current colloquial usage, commonly refers to sensuous pleasures, especially those of taste and smell (as, delicious food, fragrance, sense of warmth), but in literary usage the term is applicable to anything which is so delightful that one dwells upon it with sensuous gratification; as, "her gestures delicious in their modest and sensitive grace" (Bennett); "I am not staying here, but with the Blenkins, in their delicious solitude at Portsmouth" (E. Wharton); "There are people whose society I find delicious" (L. P. Smith). Delectable is used chiefly in poetry or elevated prose; in its implications it is often indistinguishable from delightful, and especially from delicious, though it often suggests more refined or discriminating enjoyment; as, "The trees of God, Delectable both to behold and taste" (Milton); a delectable tale; the delectable fragrance of freesia. The term is more often used than either delightful or delicious with a humorous or ironical connotation; as, "the spoken word of some delectable Sarah Gamp" (C. E. Montague). Luscious adds to delicious an implication of richness as of flavor, of fragrance, of coloring, of sound, and the like; specifically, as applied to fruits, it suggests flavor and juiciness; as, luscious peaches; luscious roses; luscious music. Like delectable it is often used humorously or ironically, but it then in addition commonly implies extravagance, exaggeration, or more specifically, voluptuousness; as, luscious passages of description; "those Don Juans, those melting beauties... those luscious adventuresses" (A. Huxley).

Ana. Enchanting, charming, fascinating, taking, alluring, attractive (see under ATTRACT): lovely, fair, *beautiful: ineffable (see UNUTTERABLE).

Ant. Distressing: boring: horrid. — Con. *Miserable, wretched: distasteful, obnoxious, repellent, *repugnant.

delineate. Trace, outline, *sketch, diagram, draft, plot, blueprint.

Ana. Describe, *relate: design, plan (see under PLAN, n.). delineation. Tracing, outline, sketch, diagram, plot, blueprint. See under SKETCH, v.

Ana. Map, *chart, graph: design, *plan.

deliquesce. *Liquefy, melt, dissolve, fuse, thaw.

Ana. *Decay, decompose, disintegrate.

delirium. Frenzy, hysteria, *mania.

deliver. 1 *Free, release, liberate, discharge, emancipate, manumit, enfranchise, enfranchisee.

Ana. *Escape, elude, evade: *extricate, disencumber, disentangle: voice, utter, vent, *express.

Con. Confine, circumscribe, restrict, *limit.

2 *Rescue, redeem, save, ransom, reclaim.

Con. *Imprison, incarcerate, jail, immure, intern: *catch, capture, nab, cop, trap, snare, entrap, ensnare.

deliverance. Deliverance, delivery are distinguished in current good use. Deliverance more commonly refers to the state or fact of being delivered, or of being freed from, restraint, captivity, peril, or the like. "We have... deliverance found Unlooked for, life preserved and peace restored" (Cowper). "It [Independence Day] ought to be commemorated as the day of deliverance" (John Adams). Delivery applies more commonly to the act of delivering from restraint, captivity, peril, or the like; as, the delivery of the prisoners in the Bastille; to effect the delivery of a captive (see also CHILDBIRTH). "He... swore, with sobs, That he would labor my delivery" (Shak.). Delivery, but not deliverance, is used when the transfer or conveyance of something is implied; as, the store promises prompt delivery of purchases; trucks for the delivery of mail; the delivery of a fort to the conquerors. Ana. Freedom, independence, autonomy (see under FREE, adj.): *freedom, liberty, license: redeeming or redemption, rescuing or rescue, reclaiming or reclamation, saving or salvation (see corresponding verbs at RESCUE).

delivery. 1 *Deliverance.

Ana. Releasing or release, liberating or liberation, freeing (see corresponding verbs at FREE): conveying or conveyance, transmitting or transmission, transporting or transportation, carrying or carriage (see corresponding verbs at CARRY): voicing, venting, utterance, expression (see corresponding verbs at EXPRESS).

2 Accouchement, *childbirth, parturition, labor, travail.

delude. Beguile, *deceive, mislead, betray, double-cross. Ana. *Dupe, gull, hoodwink, befool, bamboozle, hoax, trick: *cheat, cozen, overreach.

Ant. Enlighten.

delusion. Delusion, illusion, hallucination, mirage come into comparison when they denote something which is believed to be or is accepted as being true or real, but which is actually false or unreal. Delusion, in general, implies self-deception or deception by others; it may connote a disordered state of mind, extreme gullibility, or merely an inability to distinguish between what only seems to be, and what actually is, true or real; as, to suffer from delusions of persecution. "He recovered consciousness slowly, unwilling to let go of a pleasing delusion that he was in Rome" (Cather). "Old Nuffo, lately so miserable, now happy in his delusions" (Hudson). "She laboured under the delusion that the constitution and social condition of her country were... on the upward plane" (R. Macaulay). Illusion seldom implies mental derangement or even the inability to distinguish between the true and the false; rather it implies an ascription of truth or reality to that which only seems to be true or real, as to the eyes (as, an optical illusion), or to the imagination (as, artistic illusion), or to one's mind as influenced by one's feelings or sentiments (as, a lover's illusions). "During a quake, when I used to... observe the houses swaying toward one another, I would have the illusion that they were actually bumping heads" (V. Heiser). "Nature, we know, first taught the architect to produce by long colonnades the illusion of distance" (Hudson). "If you have built up an immunity against the illusion that you know the whole truth" (Lippmann). Hallucination implies the perception of objects or, less often, of conditions, which have no reality but are merely the product of disordered nerves, of mental derangement, of delirium tremens, or the like; as, the burglar in her room was only a hallucination; to suffer from the hallucination that one is being pursued. Mirage comes into comparison with the preceding terms only in its extended sense. Literally, it denotes an optical illusion whereby, owing to atmospheric conditions, something that is not actually present at the point where it is observed, and often is not even within the range of one's vision, is seen, not in its reality but in its (usually inverted or distorted) reflection; thus, a seeming pool of water on a highway on a hot day is a mirage in which, across a stratum of hot air, the traveler sees a reflection of the sky on the pavement. In its extended sense, mirage usually applies to a vision, dream, hope, or the like, which one takes as a guide, not realizing that it is merely an illusion. "This hope to find your people... is a mirage, a delusion, which will lead to destruction if you will not abandon it" (Hudson).

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ana. *Deception, trickery, chicanery, chicanery, subterfuge: *imposture, simulacrum, counterfeit, cheat, fraud, sham, fake, humbug, deceit: fantasy, vision, dream, daydream, *fancy.

delusive, delusory. Deceptive, *misleading.

Ana. Fantastic, chimerical, visionary, *imaginary, fanciful, quixotic: fallacious, sophistical, casuistical (see under FALLACY): illusory, seeming, ostensible, *apparent. ~~Do not confuse delusive with elusive and illusive, or delusory with illusory.~~ delve. *Dig, spade, grub, excavate, exhume, disinter.

demand, v. Demand, claim, require, exact come into comparison not as close synonyms but as carrying in common the basic meaning to ask or call for something as due or as necessary, or as strongly desired. Demand carries a strong implication of peremptoriness or insistence; if the subject is a person (or sometimes an expression of his will, such as a law), it usually implies that he possesses, or believes he possesses, the right or the authority not only to issue a peremptory request but also to expect its being regarded as a command; as, the physician demanded payment of his bill; the court demands fair treatment of the accused by the prosecutor; the father demanded knowledge of what had occurred during his absence from home. "Can he [the keeper of a public record] refuse a copy thereof to a person demanding it on the terms prescribed by law?" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "Instincts which the conventions of good manners and the imperatives of morality demand that they should repress" (A. Huxley). If the subject of the verb is a thing, the verb implies the call of necessity, of imperative need, or the like; as, "the fire that the cool evenings of early spring demanded" (M. Austin); "The mind and body of a child demand a great deal of play" (B. Russell); "He is best in his plays when dealing with situations which do not demand great emotional concentration" (T. S. Eliot). Claim implies a demanding either the delivery or concession of something due one as one's own, one's right, one's prerogative, or the like, or the admission or recognition of something which one asserts or affirms; thus, one who claims a piece of property demands its delivery to him as his own; one who claims that he has solved a problem demands recognition of the truth of his assertion. "Surely I divide your grief, and may I not claim your confidence?" (Meredith). "There is no right to freedom or life. But each man does claim such freedom" (S. Alexander). "Scientific men, and many others who cannot claim to be men of science" (Inge). "I am not claiming a direct influence of Rousseau upon Wagner" (Babbitt). Require is often used interchangeably with demand, but in precise English it usually distinctively implies imperativeness such as arises from inner necessity (as, "consecutive thinking absolutely requires personal initiative"—C. W. Eliot), or the compulsion of law or regulation (as, to require that every member of the bank's staff be bonded), or the exigencies of the situation (as, "I shall not go away till you have given me the assurance I require"—Austen). Exact implies not only demanding something but getting that which one demands; as, to exact payment of overdue rent; to exact a promise from a friend. "She... kept a keen eye on her Court, and exacted prompt and willing obedience from king and archbishops" (H. Adams). "Some [occupations] exact little of the mind, but much of the eye" (Grandgent).

Ana. Request, *ask, solicit: order, *command, charge enjoin, direct, bid: call, *summon, cite.

Con. Waive, resign, *relinquish: concede, allow, *grant.

Ant. Construct.

demon, n. Demon, daemon, devil, fiend have all been used to designate an evil spirit that leads human beings astray, and have therefore been employed even by good writers without discrimination. Both demon and daemon go back etymologically to a Greek word [daimōn] meaning a spirit or inferior divinity. In some Greek writings the term is used without clear distinction from god. Both Jewish and early Christian writers used this Greek word in the sense of idol, false god, or unclean spirit, and were more or less responsible for its confusion with another Greek word [diabolos, the slanderer] which properly applies to the Devil, or the tempter of man and adversary of God. In good current use, demon consistently applies to an evil spirit (or in extended use, an evil person) that seeks the ruin of men's souls. Daemon has for centuries been used as a variant spelling of demon. During this time, however, it was also employed by learned men in a sense closer to that of the Greek original or to another allied word [daimonion] which means a tutelary spirit, sometimes thought of as attendant upon the individual, sometimes as indwelling in him. In recent precise use, this distinction has been sharpened, so that demon is now employed by careful writers only in its derived sense of an evil spirit, and daemon in one of its historical senses or in the derived sense of genius, or inner controlling spirit supplying driving energy or creative power. "O Antony, stay not by his side: Thy daemon [First Folio spelling], that's thy spirit which keeps thee, is Noble, courageous, high, unmatchable, Where Caesar's is not" (Shak.). "If that same demon [First Folio Daemon] that hath gull'd thee thus Should with his lion gait walk the whole world. He might return... And tell the legions 'I can never win A soul so easy as that Englishman's' " (Shak.). "The Demon of Discord, with her sooty wings, had breathed her influence upon our counsels" (Smollett). "When your Daemon is in charge, do not try to think consciously. Drift, wait, and obey" (Kipling). Devil in earliest usage applied to the spirit of evil or the tempter of men, as conceived in Jewish and Christian theology, and usually called Satan, but sometimes called by any one of a number of names such as Lucifer, Beelzebub, Mephistopheles, the Prince of Darkness, or, colloquially, the Old Boy, the Old One, Old Harry, Old Nick, Old Poker, Old Scratch, and Scottish, Cloutie, or Old Cloutie. Though properly capitalized and applied to one being (as, to sell one's soul to the Devil), the term was used by some Biblical translators (especially those who made the Authorized Version) as the equivalent of the Greek daimon (or the Latin daemon) and so occurs without a capital as an equivalent of demon or in the sense of an unclean indwelling spirit; as, to cast out devils; possessed by a devil; pursued by devils. Fiend (etymologically, an enemy or foe) was in early use applied (as was the word enemy itself) to the Devil, conceived as the archenemy of mankind: it was also applied to any evil spirit, or demon, conceived of as maliciously plotting or bringing about the ruin of men. With this word especially, but far from exclusively, are associated many of the characteristics or outward aspects of the Devil or of devils as conceived by the popular mind; as, "Inflam'd with rage like fiends in hell" (J. Wesley); "a frightful fiend Doth close behind him tread" (Coleridge).

Ant. Angel. — Cor. Archangel, cherub, seraph (see ANGEL).

demoniac, demoniacal, demonic. Diabolic, diabolical, *fiendish, devilish.

Ana. Hellish, *infernal: crazed, crazy, maniac, *insane: inspired, fired (see INFORM).

Cor. *Celestial, heavenly.

demonstrate. 1 Manifest, evince, *show, evidence.

Ana. *Reveal, disclose, discover, betray, bewray: display, exhibit, parade, flaunt, expose, *show.

Cor. *Hide, conceal, secrete: dissemble, cloak, mask, *disguise.

2 *Prove, try, test.

Ana. *Argue, debate (see DISCUSS): substantiate, verify, authenticate, *confirm, corroborate, validate.

demonstration. Proof, trial, test. See under PROVE.

Ana. Substantiation, confirming or confirmation, corroboration, verification (see corresponding verbs at CONFIRM): experiment, *experience.

demulcent. Emollient, *balm, salve.

demur, v. Demur, scruple, balk, jib (or gib), shy, boggle, stick, stickle, strain are comparable when they mean to hesitate or show reluctance because of difficulties in the way. One demurs to (or at, rarely on) something when one raises objections to it, casts doubt upon it, or takes exception to it, thereby interposing obstacles which delay action, procedure, decision, or the like; as, many an opportunity is lost by demurring. In older use, the stress was on delay, as it still is in the term demurrage. "Notwithstanding he hoped that matters would have been long since brought to an issue, the fair one still demurs" (Speculator). In modern use, the emphasis is commonly on objection, as it is also in the legal term demurrer. "Jerry... proposed that... we stretch a point by going to supper at Reeves's. Sarah and I demurred as women will at such a proposal from a man whose family exigencies are known to them" (M. Austin). "It would seem hazardous to demur to a proposition which is so widely accepted" (S. Alexander). One scruples to do something (or, now rarely, at something) when one is reluctant because one's conscience bothers or because one is doubtful of the propriety, expediency, or morality of the action; the word is increasingly common in a negative construction; as, to scruple to accept any gift that might seem a bribe; "he does not scruple to ask the most abominable things of you" (Meredith). "Greece and in particular Athens was overrun by philosophers, who... did not scruple to question the foundations of social and moral obligation" (G. L. Dickinson). One balks (oftentimes at something) when one stops short and obstinately refuses to go further in one's course because one has reached the limit of one's strength, one's courage, one's credulity, one's tolerance, or the like; as, the horse balked at the leap; he never balks at any task no matter how difficult it is. "There is the opposite case of the man who yields his poetic faith too readily, who does not balk at any improbability" (Babbitt). "One rather balks at the idea of synthetic roughage—excelsior, wood chips, or whatever may be at hand" (C. C. Furnas). One jibs, or less often, gibs (oftentimes at something) when one balks like a horse and backs away or out. "I had settled to finish the review, when, behold... I jibbed" (Scott). "When Charnacé spoke of stopping the Polish war, he [Brandenburg] was all in favour, but he jibbed at alliance with the Catholic League" (Belloc). "His soldiers, many of whom had served with Antony, jibbed at the attack on their old leader" (Buchan). One shies at, away from, off from something when, like a suddenly frightened horse, one recoils in alarm, or distaste, or suspicion and is unable to proceed, act, and the like; as, to shy at the sight of blood. "These turns of speech may as yet be called slang; but they have the old virtue in them; you see the old temperament of the race still evincing itself; still shying away from the long abstract word" (C. E. Montague). One boggles at, over, about something from which one by temperament, instinct, or training shies away. In addition, boggle often implies scrupling or fussing. "When a native begins perjury he perjures himself thoroughly. He does not boggle over details" (Kipling). "We [lovers of poetry] do not balk at the sea-wave washing the rim of the sun, which we know it does not do, any more than we boggle at blackberries that are red when they are green" (Lowes). "It [pleasure at election to certain societies at Harvard] was in the essence a snobbish pleasure; why should I boggle at the word?" (L. P. Smith). One sticks at something to which one demurs because of scruples, especially scruples of conscience; the term is used chiefly in the phrase "he sticks at nothing," which is another way of saying he is absolutely unscrupulous. One stickles at, about, over something to which one demurs or raises objections because it is offensive, distasteful, contrary to one's principles, or the like; as, the purist stickles at using clipped words such as gas for gasoline, phone for telephone, exam for examination; there is no time in a serious emergency to stickle over means if they achieve the desired ends. One strains at something (sometimes to do something) when one demurs to it as beyond one's power to believe, accept, understand, do, or the like. This usage is chiefly dependent on the scriptural passage "Ye blind guides, which strain at [D.V. & R.V. strain out] a gnat, and swallow a camel" (Matthew xxiii. 24). In extended use, the object of at or of to do is commonly something which might without real difficulty be believed, accepted, understood, done, or the like; as, persons who strain at the truth yet accept every wild rumor without question. "I do not strain at the position,— It is familiar,—but at the author's drift" (Shak.).

Ana. *Hesitate, falter, vacillate, waver: *oppose, resist, combat: *object, remonstrate: *disapprove, deprecate.
Ant. Accede. — Con. Accept, admit, *receive, take: acquiesce, agree, *assent, consent, subscribe.

demur, n. *Qualm, compunction, scruple.

Ana. *Hesitation, hesitancy: reluctance, loathness, aversion, disinclination (see corresponding adjectives at DISINCLINED): objection, remonstrance (see corresponding verbs at OBJECT).

Con. Readiness, promptness, quickness (see corresponding adjectives at QUICK).

demure. Proper, nice, *decorous, decent, seemly, comme il faut.

Ana. Grave, solemn, *serious, sedate, staid, earnest, sober: modest, coy, diffident, bashful, *shy.

Ant. Jaunty. — Con. Brazen, brash, impudent, *shameless, barefaced: wanton, mischievous, impish, roguish (see PLAYFUL).

denizen. *Inhabitant, resident, citizen.

denomination. 1 *Name, designation, appellation, title, style.

2 Sect, communion, *religion, faith, creed, cult, persuasion, church.

denotation. Connotation (see under DENOTE).

Ana. *Meaning, signification, significance, sense, acceptance, import.

denote. 1 Signify, *mean, import.

Ana. Betoken, bespeak, *indicate, attest, argue, prove: *intend, mean: *suggest, imply, hint, intimate, insinuate.

2 Denote, connote and their corresponding nouns denotation, connotation bear a complementary rather than a synonymous relation to each other. Taken together, the verbs as used in reference to terms equal mean (see MEAN, v., 2). Taken singly, a term denotes that which is expressed in its definition, as in a noun the thing which it names, in a verb the act or state which is affirmed (thus, "plant" denotes a living thing which is rooted, usually, in the earth); a term connotes any or all of the ideas or emotions that are added to it and cling to it, often as a result of experience but sometimes as a result of something extraneous, such as a great poet's effective use of the term, or its constant association with another term or idea, or a connection between it and some historical event; thus, "home" denotes the place where one lives with one's family, but it connotes comforts, intimacy, and privacy. What a term denotes (or the denotation of a term) can be definitely fixed; what a term connotes (or its connotation) often depends upon the background of the person using it. "I have used the term 'post-war poets' to denote those who did not begin to write verse till after the war" (Day Lewis). "There is no word that has more sinister and terrible connotations in our snobbish society than the word promiscuity" (Shaw).

In logic, denote and connote, though still complementary and still predicated of terms, carry very different implications. They are dependent on two highly technical terms, both collective nouns, denotation and connotation. A term denotes (or bears as denotation) the entire number of things or instances covered by it; as, "plant" denotes the aggregate of all things that come under the definition of that word; the denotation of "plant" is far more inclusive than the denotation of "shrub." A term connotes (or bears as connotation) the sum total of the qualities or characteristics that are implied by it and are necessarily or commonly associated with it; as, "plant" connotes (or bears as connotation) life, growth and decay, lack of power of locomotion, and, commonly, roots and cellular structure invested with a cellulose wall.

☞ In this book denote and connote, denotation and connotation, are used with the meanings discussed in the first paragraph above, unless otherwise specified.

denounce. Condemn, censure, reprobate, reprehend, blame, *criticize.

Ana. *Accuse, charge, arraign, impeach, incriminate, criminate, indict: *decry, disparage, depreciate: revile, vituperate (see SCOLD).

Ant. Eulogize. — Con. *Commend, applaud, compliment, recommend: *praise, extol, laud, acclaim.

dense. 1 Compact, *close, thick.

Ana. Consolidated, concentrated, compacted (see COMPACT, v.): compressed, condensed (see CONTRACT, v.): massed, heaped, piled, stacked (see HEAP, v.).

Ant. Sparse (of population, forests, etc.): tenuous (of clouds, air, masses, etc.). — Con. Scattered, dispersed, dissipated (see SCATTER): *thin, rare: *meager, scanty, scant, exiguous.

2 Crass, *stupid, dull, dumb.

Ana. Obtuse, *dull: stolid, phlegmatic, *impassive.

Ant. Subtle: bright. — Con. *Intelligent, brilliant, clever, alert, quick-witted.

dent, n. Dent, dint, indentation, indenture, nick, notch agree in meaning a depression or recess made by or as if by a blow or incision. Dent and dint apply chiefly to surfaces; indentation, nick, and notch more frequently to edges. Dent and dint (the latter now chiefly literary and more expressive of violence in impact) refer to a depression made, especially in metal, by a blow; as, a dent in a teakettle; a dent in an automobile fender; "Every dint a sword had beaten in it [a shield]" (Tennyson). An indentation or, less often, an indenture, is a toothlike or angular recess or incision made by nature or by artifice; as, the indentations of a leaf, of a coastline; through indentations, the beginnings of the paragraphs are indicated; "This noble lake...spreads...around the indentures and promontories of a fair and fertile land" (Scott). Nick and notch carry a stronger implication of the removal of a part than indentation; nick usually suggests a slighter indentation (often the result of accidental chipping or breaking) than notch, which commonly implies deliberate cutting; as, a nick in a teacup, in a knife blade; the notch of an arrow; to cut notches in a stick.

Con. *Projection, protuberance, bulge, protrusion.

denude. Bare, *strip, divest, dismantle.

Ant. Clothe.

deny. Deny, gainsay, contradict, negative, traverse, impugn, contravene come into comparison as meaning, when they refer to an act, to declare something untrue, untenable, or unworthy of consideration or, when they refer to a condition, to go counter to that which is true or to the facts as they are. Deny (etymologically, to say no) commonly implies a refusal, usually an outspoken refusal, to accept as true (as, to deny the report that the British ambassador has resigned; "He is no vulgar and stupid cynic who denies the existence...of any feelings higher than the merely physical"—A. Huxley), or to grant or concede (as, to deny citizenship to certain applicants; to deny a request for more books; "For he's a jolly good fellow, which nobody can deny!"), or to own or acknowledge the existence or the claims of (as, "the necessities of his own life...not any longer to be denied"—M. Austin; "It would seem that I was denying God"—Meredith). In the reflexive form, deny usually implies abstinence or renunciation often, but not necessarily, for religious or moral reasons; as, she denied herself all luxuries; to deny oneself to visitors; he resolved to deny himself the pleasure of smoking (cf. self-denial). Gainsay (etymologically, to say against) is now chiefly a literary term: it implies opposition, usually by way of disputing

the truth of what another has said; as, facts which cannot be gainsaid; "But she's a fine woman—that nobody can gainsay" (Meredith); "His mother, whom he could not gainsay, was unconsciously but inflexibly set against his genius" (Van W. Brooks). Contradict (also, etymologically, to say or speak against) differs from gainsay not only in usually implying a more open or a flatter denial of the truth of an assertion, but also in commonly suggesting that the contrary is true or that the statement is utterly devoid of truth; thus, "to contradict a rumor" is a stronger expression than "to deny a rumor"; one may contradict (never in this sense deny) a person, whereas one may deny or contradict (the stronger term) an assertion of his. "A report which highly incensed Mrs. Bennet, and which she never failed to contradict as a most scandalous falsehood" (Austen). " 'Nobody contradicts me now,' wrote Queen Victoria after her husband's death, 'and the salt has gone out of my life.' " (H. Ellis). Contradict is also used without implication of a spoken or written denial: it then suggests that an assertion, a doctrine, a teaching, or the like, runs counter to something else, and therefore it cannot be true (as, "All the protestations of the employers that they would be ruined by the Factory Acts were contradicted by experience"—Shaw) or if it be true, the other must be false, or vice versa (as, "they insisted on teaching and enforcing an ideal that contradicted the realities"—H. Adams). Negative is usually a much milder term than those which precede: often it implies merely a refusal to assent to a suggestion, a proposition, a nomination, a bill, or the like; as, the senate negatived the proposed taxation; "after a polite request that Elizabeth would lead the way, which the other as politely . . . negatived" (Austen); "Beaufort stood, hat in hand, saying something which his companion seemed to negative" (E. Wharton). When the idea of going counter to is uppermost, negative usually implies disproof; as, "The omission or infrequency of such recitals does not negative the existence of miracles" (W. Paley). Traverse, as here considered, is chiefly a legal term implying a formal denial, especially of the truth of an allegation (as, to traverse a fact as alleged) or of the justice of an indictment (as, to traverse an indictment). Impugn (etymologically, to attack or assail) retains its basic implication so markedly that it carries the strongest suggestion of any of these terms of directly disputing or questioning or of forcefully contradicting (a statement, proposition, etc., or, less often, a person): it sometimes connotes prolonged argument in an attempt to refute or confute; as, "The idealists . . . took up the challenge, but their reply was to disparage the significance, and even to impugn the reality, of the world as known to science" (Inge); " 'The morality of our Restoration drama cannot be impugned. It assumes orthodox Christian morality, and laughs (in its comedy) at human nature for not living up to it' " (T. S. Eliot); "No one cares to impugn a fool; no one dares to impugn a captain of industry" (Van W. Brooks). Contravene (etymologically, to come against), in the sense here considered, carries a weaker implication of intentional opposition or running counter to, but a stronger implication of coming into conflict with, than any of the preceding terms: when it implies what in effect amounts to a denial or a contradiction it often, but not always, suggests an inherent and often unforeseen incompatibility between what is said, taught, or, in law, done, and things as they are; as, "A proposition . . . not likely to be contravened" (Southey); "the public force will be brought to bear upon those who do things said to contravene it [a legal right]" (Justice Holmes); "he [Mark Twain] could not strike out in any direction without wounding his wife or his friends, without contravening some loyalty that had become sacred to him" (Van W. Brooks).

Ana. *Decline, refuse, reject, repudiate: controvert, refute, rebut, confute, *disprove.

Ant. Concede. — Con. Aver, affirm, *assert: *acknowledge.

depart. 1 Leave, withdraw, retire, *go, quit, scam, clear out.

Ant. Arrive: remain, abide. — Con. *Stay, tarry, linger, wait: *come.

2 Digress, deviate, *swerve, diverge, veer.

Ana. Forsake, *abandon, desert: reject, repudiate (see DECLINE, v.): *discard, cast.

departed. Deceased, late, *dead, defunct, lifeless, inanimate.

depend. *Rely, trust, count, reckon, bank.

Ana. Lean, incline (see SLANT, v.).

dependable. *Reliable, trustworthy, trusty, tried.

Ana. Sure, assured, *confident: *responsible: authoritative (see DICTATORIAL): stanch, steadfast, constant, *faithful.

Con. *Doubtful, questionable, dubious: capricious, fickle, unstable, *inconstant, mercurial.

dependence. 1 Reliance, *trust, confidence, faith.

2 *Annex, extension, wing, ell.

dependency. *Possession, colony, protectorate, territory, dominion, mandate.

dependent, adj. 1 Dependent, contingent, conditional, relative, adjective are close synonyms when they mean having its existence or nature determined by something else. All of these terms are used in philosophy, some in law, but only the first four are found (often with a weakening of the sense) in general use. That is dependent which cannot exist or come into existence by itself. In philosophy, and often in ordinary language, nothing escapes this description except that which is, in the strict sense of each of these words, absolute, infinite, or original. "We are all dependent on one another, every soul of us on earth" (Shaw). That is contingent which takes its character from something that already exists or may exist, and which, therefore, is limited or qualified by something extraneous or is incapable of existence apart from it; as, one's conception of love is contingent both on experience and on the nature of the experience. "If propriety should die, there could be no impropriety, inasmuch as the continuance of the latter is wholly contingent on the presence of the former" (Grandgent). That is conditional which depends for its realization, fulfillment, execution, expression, or the like, on what may or may not occur or on the performance or observance of certain terms or conditions. Conditional and contingent are often interchangeable but the former is preferred when eventualities are in the power of the human will; as, the pardon is conditional (better than contingent) on his behavior during probation. "There is not between women that fund of at least conditional loyalty which men may depend on in their dealings with each other" (Conrad). That is relative which cannot be known, considered, or determined apart from its reference to something else and which, therefore, is affected by the limitations, the instability, the imperfections, and the like, of the other thing; as, market values are always relative to the demand. "The idea of civilisation is relative . . . any community and any age has its own civilisation and its own ideals of civilisation" (H. Ellis). That is adjective (chiefly in legal and technical use) which is not self-sufficient or self-contained but depends on something else for its fullness of existence or effectiveness; thus, adjective law (as opposed to substantive law) has nothing to do with the conceptions of justice, rights, and obligations, but only with legal procedure; an adjective color, in dyeing, is one that requires the addition of a substance to fix it. "The women were treated on both sides as adjective beings" (Grote).

Ana. Subject, *liable, open, exposed, susceptible.

Ant. Absolute: infinite: original. — Con. *Ultimate, categorical: uncircumscribed, boundless, eternal, illimitable (see INFINITE): underived (see affirmative verb at SPRING).

2 Subject, tributary, *subordinate, succursal, secondary, collateral.

Ana. Relying (on), depending (on), trusting (in or to), reckoning (on), counting (on) (see RELY): subsidiary, subservient, *auxiliary: abased, humbled, debased (see ABASE).

Ant. Independent. — Con. *Self-reliant, reliant.

deplete, v. Deplete, drain, exhaust, impoverish, bankrupt are comparable especially in their extended senses when they mean to deprive a thing in whole or in part of that which is essential or necessary to its existence or potency. Deplete is often used as though it implied merely a reduction in numbers, in quantity, or the like; discriminating writers and speakers, however, employ it only when they wish to suggest the potential harm of such a reduction or the impossibility of restoring what has been lost before such consequences are evident; thus, bloodletting depletes the system, not only by reducing the quantity of blood but by depriving the system of elements essential to its vitality and vigor; an epidemic may be said to deplete an army when it reduces the army not only in size but in effective strength, especially at a time when that strength is needed. "He would have us fill up our depleted curriculum with subjects whose worth has not even been tried" (Grandgent). Drain is also a word subject to undiscriminating use; when precisely employed it retains its earliest implications of slow withdrawal of liquid as by straining, seepage, suction, or the like, until the substance which is drained becomes dry or the container which holds the liquid is emptied. Hence, in extended use, drain connotes a gradual depletion and ultimate deprivation of that which is figuratively the lifeblood of a thing or the sine qua non of its existence or well-being; as, the Thirty Years' War (1618–1648) nearly drained Germany of men and materials; the writer has treated this theme so many times that he has drained it of all interest to himself or his readers. "Their country's wealth our mighty misers drain" (Pope). Exhaust, as here compared (see also TIRE), is very close to drain in its extended sense but it stresses emptying or evacuation rather than disastrous depletion. That which is exhausted, such as the essential ingredients of a substance, the full possibilities of a subject for treatment, the nutritive elements of a soil, or the contents of a mine, although it deprives the substance, subject, soil, or mine of further value or possible use, is not itself useless but, more often than not, useful in another form; thus, one exhausts a subject who treats it so fully that nothing more can be said about it; one (in humorous use) exhausts the English language when he leaves no word that might express his idea unused; molasses is exhausted when no further sugar can be extracted from it. "The theme of mother and child has proved a theme which no age has ever exhausted or ever will exhaust" (Binyon). Impoverish implies a depletion or a draining of something as essential to a thing as money or its equivalent is to a human being; it stresses the deprivation of qualities essential to a thing's strength, richness, or productiveness; as, to impoverish the blood by too meager a diet; to impoverish the soil by planting year after year crops that are gross feeders; to impoverish one's mind by reading only light books. Bankrupt stresses such impoverishment of a thing that it is destitute of qualities essential to its continued existence or productiveness; it connotes a complete or imminent collapse or breaking down; as, to argue that science by inattention to immaterial phenomena is bankrupting itself. "Dainty bits Make rich the ribs, but bankrupt quite the wits" (Shak.).

Ana. Undermine, sap, debilitate, *weaken, enfeeble, cripple, disable: reduce, diminish, *decrease, lessen.

Con. Augment, *increase, enlarge.

deplore. Deplore, lament, bewail, bemoan agree in meaning to manifest grief or sorrow for something. All carry an implication of weeping or crying, but in modern usage this is more or less figurative. Deplore implies keen and profound regret, especially for that which is regarded as irreparable, calamitous, or destructive of something good or worth keeping; as, "Ev'n rival wits did Voiture's death deplore" (Pope); to deplore a quarrel between friends; "they deplore the divorce between the language as spoken and the language as written" (T. S. Eliot). Lament commonly implies a strong or demonstrative expression of sorrow; it suggests mourning rather than regret but it seldom, in current use, implies actual tears, cries, or wails. It does, however, in contrast to deplore, usually imply utterance, sometimes passionate, sometimes fulsome. "Yet I lament what long has ceased to be" (Shelley). "He made the newly returned actress a tempting offer, instigating some journalist friends of his at the same time to lament over the decay of the grand school of acting" (Shaw). Bewail and bemoan imply poignant sorrow finding an outlet in words or cries, bewail commonly suggesting the louder, bemoan, the more lugubrious, expression of grief or, often in current more or less humorous use, of a grievance or a complaint. "The valet bewailing the loss of his wages" (S. Alexander). "Even at the time when our prose speech was as near to perfection as it is ever likely to be, its critics were bemoaning its corruption" (H. Ellis). "And all wept, and bewailed her" (Luke viii. 52). "The silver swans her hapless fate bemoan, In notes more sad than when they sing their own" (Pope).

Ana. Deprecate, *disapprove: *grieve, mourn, sorrow: weep, wail, *cry.

Con. Vaunt, crow, *boast, brag.

depone. Depose, *swear, affirm, testify, asseverate.

deport. 1 Demean, comport, *behave, conduct, acquit, quit.

Ana. & Ant. See those at DEMEAN.

2 Transport, *banish, exile, expatriate, ostracize, extradite.

deportment. 1 *Behavior, conduct.

Ana. See those at BEHAVIOR.

2 Demeanor, *bearing, mien, carriage, manner, port, presence, front.

Ana. *Form, formality, ceremony, ceremonial, ritual: *culture, cultivation, breeding, refinement: dignity, grace, *elegance.

depose. Depone, testify, *swear, affirm, asseverate.

deposition. Affidavit, testimony, *evidence.

depot. *Station.

depravation. *Depravity.

Ana. Debasing, degrading (see ABASE): corrupting or corruption, vitiating or vitiation, perverting or perversion, debauching (see corresponding verbs at DEBASE): impairing or impairment, injuring, harming (see corresponding verbs at INJURE).

Con. Improvement, betterment, amelioration (see corresponding verbs at IMPROVE).

deprave. *Debase, vitiate, corrupt, debauch, pervert.
Ana. Defile, pollute, taint, *contaminate: *injure, impair, damage, spoil.
Con. *Improve, better, ameliorate: *exalt, magnify. depraved. Debased, vitiated, corrupted, corrupt, debauched, perverted. See under DEBASE.
Ana. Dissolute, *abandoned, reprobate, profligate: degenerate, infamous, villainous, *vicious: degraded, debased (see ABASE).
depravity. Depravity, depravation agree in denoting a depraving, or reducing to a degraded or degenerate state. Depravity commonly applies to the state of being, depravation, to the act or process of making or becoming, depraved or degenerate. Depravity also commonly implies a degraded moral condition; as, "Lamenting the depravity of this degenerate age" (Peacock); "the depravity of the Valois" (H. Adams). Depravation, on the other hand, may imply marked deterioration of any sort; as, depravation of language, of instincts, of the blood. "If this be improvement, truly I know not what can be called a depravation of society" (Burke).
Ana. Degeneration, devolution, *deterioration, decadence, decline, declension: baseness, lowness, vileness (see corresponding adjectives at BASE): *disgrace, shame, infamy, ignominy.
Con. Honor, *honesty, integrity, probity: virtue, rectitude, morality, *goodness.
deprecate. *Disapprove.
Ana. *Deplore, lament, bewail, bemoan: reprobate, reprehend, condemn (see CRITICIZE).
Ant. Endorse. — Con. *Approve, sanction: *commend, applaud.
Do not confuse deprecate with depreciate.
depreciate. *Decry, disparage, derogate from, detract from, belittle, minimize.
Ana. Underestimate, undervalue, underrate (see primitive verbs at ESTIMATE): asperse, *malign.
Ant. Appreciate. — Con. Prize, cherish, treasure, value (see APPRECIATE): *understand, comprehend.
Do not confuse depreciate with deprecate.
depress. Depress, weigh down (or weigh on, or upon), oppress come into comparison as meaning to put such pressure or such a load upon a thing (sometimes, a person) as to cause it (or him) to sink under the weight. Depress, in all its senses, implies a lowering of something by the exertion of pressure or by an overburdening; in current use, however, it most commonly implies either a lowering of spirits as by physical or mental causes (as, "The long dull evenings in these dull lodgings when one is weary with work depress one sadly"—J. R. Green; "The mere volume of work was enough to crush the most diligent of rulers and depress the most vital"—Buchan; "he was depressed by his failure"—S. Anderson) or a lowering of bodily vigor or the power of certain organs to function, as by a drug, a disease, an external condition, or the like (as, the drug aconite depresses heart action). In reference to other things, such as the stock market, the prices asked for a certain commodity, a social or cultural state, depress often, as a result of its more common uses, suggests a lowering in activity, intensity, vigor, or the like; as, the first effect of the World War was greatly to depress the prices of stocks; the wheat market is depressed by the existence of a large surplus. "To depress the culture of the minority below the point at which a full understanding of poetry becomes possible" (Day Lewis). Weigh, with down, on, or upon, carries a weaker implication of the result, or lowering, than depress but a stronger implication of the difficulty or burdens imposed upon a person or thing; as, he is weighed down with cares; the responsibility weighs heavily upon him; "Forget him, my precious. Don't let any prince weigh on your little mind" (R. Macaulay). Like weigh down, etc., oppress stresses the burden which is borne or is imposed and, like depress, the consequent ill effects, such as the lowering of spirits or of power to function, or in its more common sense (see WRONG), a trampling down, a harassing, or a subjection to heavy penalties; as, "The weary world of waters between us oppresses the imagination" (Lamb); "the butler, oppressed by the heat... was in a state of abstraction bordering on slumber" (Shaw); she is so oppressed by fear that she may lose her mind.
Ana. Distress, *trouble, ail: *afflict, try, torment: *tire, weary, fatigue, exhaust, fag, jade, tucker.
Ant. Elate: cheer. — Con. Gladden, rejoice, delight, gratify, *please.

Con. Enhance, heighten, *intensify. descant, n. Observation, comment, *remark, note, commentary, obiter dictum.
descant, v. *Discourse, expatiate, dilate.
descend. Descend, dismount, alight are synonyms only when they mean to get or come down from a height. One descends when one climbs down a slope, as of a hill or mountain, a ladder, a step or a stair, a wall, a tree, or the like; one dismounts, in modern English, only when one gets down from a horse (or, by extension, from a bicycle) or dislodges another person from a horse; one alights (only in intransitive use) when one dismounts with a spring or descends, especially with lightness or grace, from a vehicle, such as a carriage or an airplane.
Ant. Ascend, climb.
describe. *Relate, narrate, state, report, rehearse, recite, recount.
Ana. Delineate, *sketch, outline.
description. Kind, sort, *type, character, nature, stripe, kidney, ilk.

Con. Execution, fulfillment, accomplishment, achievement, performance (see corresponding verbs at PERFORM).

2 *Intention, intent, purpose, aim, end, object, objective, goal.

Ana. *Will, volition, conation: deliberation, reflection, thinking or thought (see corresponding verbs at THINK): intrigue, machination, *plot.

Ant. Accident. — Con. Impulse (see MOTIVE).

3 *Figure, pattern, motif, device.

designate. Designate, name, nominate, elect, appoint are here compared only in the sense to declare a person as one's choice for incumbency of an office, position, benefice, or the like. Designate implies selection by the person or body having the power to choose an incumbent or to detail a person to a certain post; it often connotes selection well in advance of incumbency; as, Harold contended that he had been designated by Edward the Confessor as the latter's successor to the English throne; a clergyman who has been designated by the proper ecclesiastical authority as the incumbent of an episcopacy is usually called bishop-designate until he has been consecrated or has been installed. Name varies little in meaning from designate except that it stresses announcement rather than selection; it is more informal, however, and is usually preferred when the reference is to a political or government office within the gift of an executive or of an executive body; as, the mayor has not yet named the commissioner of public safety; only one member of the incoming president's cabinet remains to be named, the secretary of war. Nominate, though etymologically the equivalent of name, is now rarely used as its equivalent in meaning. "The House of Commons was crowded with members nominated by the Royal Council" (J. R. Green). Commonly, it implies merely the presentation of the name of one's choice for an office for the approval of, or rejection by, others who have the final say; thus, a person from the floor at a convention may nominate his choice for a particular office; a state convention of a political party meets to nominate the party's candidates for governor, lieutenant governor, and the like. Nominate is not always used in place of name (though strictly correct) when the executive's choice must be confirmed by a body having that power; as, the president has not yet decided whom he will nominate to fill the vacancy in the Supreme Court. Elect, as distinguished from nominate, implies a final selection, as by the electorate, from the candidates who have been previously nominated; as, the Democratic candidates for the state offices were all elected; not one person on the nominating committee's slate was elected at today's meeting. Appoint always implies that the selection is determined without a general vote (usually a vote of an electorate) and represents the choice of the person or the body in whom such power is legally vested. Appoint may be used even when confirmation, as by the U. S. Senate, or, as in Massachusetts, by the governor's council, has been necessary to make the designation valid; as, three justices of the Supreme Court have been appointed by the president within twelve months. "He [the president] shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court" (U. S. Const.).

Ana. *Choose, select, single out, opt, pick.

designation. *Name, denomination, appellation, title, style.

Ana. Identification, *recognition: classification, pigeonholing or pigeonhole (see corresponding verbs at ASSORT).

designed. Premeditated, *deliberate, considered, advised, studied.

Ana. Intentional, *voluntary, willful, deliberate, willing; purposed, intended (see INTEND): resolved, determined, decided (see DECIDE).

Ant. Accidental. — Con. Fortuitous, casual (see ACCIDENTAL): *spontaneous, impulsive: natural, normal, *regular, typical.

desire, v. Desire, wish, want, crave, covet agree in meaning to have a longing for something. Desire, in its most effective use, emphasizes strength and ardor of feeling, wish, especially in poetic language, often connotes longing for the unattainable. "Wishing me like to one more rich in hope, Featured like him, like him with friends possess'd, Desiring this man's art and that man's scope" (Shak.). Desire, however, often implies intention or aim more than yearning and often, therefore, connotes striving or the need for striving. "The painter whose predominant aim is moral instruction and edification almost always fails of the effect he desires" (Binyon). "If you desire faith—then you've faith enough" (Browning). Desire is sometimes used in place of wish, but only when greater formality is sought; as, to desire (or wish, or wish for) happiness in one's marriage. Want (see also LACK) was long regarded as colloquial and not to be used in place of wish unless need or lack is implied; as, "Not what we wish, but what we want" (J. Merrick); "Man wants but little here below, Nor wants that little long" (Goldsmith). Now, however, it is frequently used in place of wish, especially when the latter is felt to be slightly more formal than the object or the context requires; as, Senator Smith does not want (or wish) re-nomination; they want (or wish) to leave early; do you want (or wish) tea or coffee? Crave carries a stronger implication of the impulsion of physical or mental appetite or need than the preceding terms; it may definitely imply unsatisfied or ungratified hunger, thirst, love, ambition, or the like; as, to crave fresh fruits; to crave exercise; to crave a college education; to crave peace in one's old age; "for every grief, Each suffering, I craved relief" (Millay). Covet implies inordinate and eager or passionate longing, often, but now far from commonly, for something which belongs to another. In the last case, it often implies envy of the person who possesses that which is longed for. "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife" (Exodus xx. 17). "I have sometimes thought of rechristening our house The Hotel of the Four Seasons, and thereby releasing its true name (The Haven) to a friend who covets it for his own" (Quiller-Couch). "Her invitations came to be coveted by people who were desirous of moving in good society" (Shaw).

Ana. *Long, yearn, hanker, pine, hunger, thirst: aspire, pant, *aim.

Con. Abhor, abominate, loathe, detest, *hate: spurn, repudiate, reject, refuse, *decline.

desire, n. Desire, appetite, appetence (or appetency), concupiscence, lust, passion, urge, yen are here compared primarily as meaning a longing for something regarded as essential to one's well-being or happiness, but most of them are also considered secondarily as meaning an impulse originating in a man's nature and driving him toward the object or the experience which promises him enjoyment or satisfaction in its attainment. Desire is capable of the widest application for it may be used of every conceivable longing that stirs one emotionally, whether that longing originates in man's animal or in his spiritual nature, whether it is natural and normal or unnatural and perverted, whether it is generally regarded as low or high in the scale of moral or spiritual values; as, the desire for food; the desire for an education; a desire for change; the desire for peace; "his physical desire to sit in the sun and do nothing" (S. Anderson); "the keen desire... to pay their debts" (A. Reppier); "nothing dies harder than the desire to think well of oneself" (T. S. Eliot). It is, however, used specifically to denote sexual longing, but it does not always convey derogatory connotations when so restricted in meaning. "Like the flesh of animals distended by fear or desire" (Calher). Desire is often used in contrast (commonly an implicit contrast) to will or volition, for in itself it carries no implication of a determination or effort to possess or attain. "She had the desire to do something which she objected to doing" (Bennett). "Guiltless even of a desire for any private possession or advantage of their own" (G. L. Dickinson). Appetite is almost as extensive in its range of application as desire, and it invariably implies an imperative demand for satisfaction. It is specifically applied to the longings which arise out of man's animal nature: hunger, thirst, and sexual desire, which may be thwarted only by circumstances beyond one's control or by deliberate self-control; as, a slave to his appetite for drink; the child is losing his appetite (that is, for food); to impose restraints upon one's physical appetites. In extended use, the word is applied to equally exacting longings which drive one to their satisfaction, whether they originate in one's nature or are acquired; as, man's distinguishing characteristic is the appetite for happiness; an insatiable appetite for news; "almost pathological in his appetite for activity" (Mencken); the world has no appetite for further fighting. Appetence and appetency are somewhat literary substitutes for appetite; they are sometimes preferred when the stimulation of appetite is connoted. "Bred only and completed to the taste Of lustful appetence, to sing, to dance, To dress, and troll the tongue, and roll the eye" (Milton). "The eyes of drinking men when they smell liquor, bright with appetence" (M. Austin). The next two words (con- piscence and lust) are here considered only in their older and broader senses. Concupiscence, which is now rare in other than philosophic use in this sense, is nearly equivalent to desire in the abstract, except that it stresses delight or pleasure as its end and implies even more strongly a distinction from will. Lust combines the specific denotation of desire as a longing that stirs emotion and that of appetite as a longing that exacts satisfaction; often, but not invariably, it implies domination by the emotion or insatiability of the appetite. "Jansen...utterly condemned, as abominable concupiscence, not only sensuality (the lust of the flesh) but scientific curiosity (the lust of knowing) and ambition (the lust of power)" (Preserved Smith). "Whose ruling passion was the lust of praise" (Pope). Passion is applied to any intense and preoccupying emotion which gives one's mind its particular bent or which serves as an outlet for and gives direction to one's energies. Though it comes close to lust in suggesting the energizing of desire by the vehemence of the emotions, passion is the better choice when personal predilection is implied; as, he, too, knew the lust (better than passion) for power; his work reveals a passion (better than lust) for perfection. "Avarice, he assured them, was the one passion that grew stronger and sweeter in old age. He had the lust for money as Martinez had for women" (Calher). "The dream, the ambition, the passion of Mr. Raycie's life was (as his son knew) to found a Family" (E. Wharton). Urge, which originally meant a force or motive which drives one to action, now often means a strong, persistent, and compelling desire that has its origin in one's physical nature or one's peculiar temperament. The word is sometimes applied to the physical appetites (the sexual appetite is often called "the biological urge"), but it is more often used of a desire so strong and insistent that it must be satisfied or a sense of frustration ensues; as, an urge to travel; an urge to marry. Yen is a slang term for a particularly urgent desire or craving; as, a yen for fresh fruit; a yen for release from routine.

Ana. Longing, yearning, hankering, pining, hungering or hunger, thirsting or thirst (see corresponding verbs at LONG): *cupidity, greed, avarice, rapacity.

Ant. Distaste. — Con. Repugnance, repellency or repulsion, abhorrence (see corresponding adjectives at REPUGNANT).

desist. Discontinue, cease, *stop, quit.

Ana. *Refrain, abstain, forbear: *relinquish, yield, abandon, resign.

Ant. Persist. — Con. *Continue: *persevere.

desolate. Forlorn, lorn, lonesome, lone, solitary, lonely, *alone.

Ana. Deserted, forsaken, abandoned (see ABANDON): *miserable, wretched.

Con. Cheerful, lighthearted, joyful, joyous, happy, *glad.

despair, n. Hopelessness, desperation, despondency, forlornness. See under DESPONDENT, adj.

Ana. Dejection, melancholy, *sadness, gloom, depression.

Ant. Hope: optimism: beatitude. — Con. Exultancy or exultation, elatedness or elation (see corresponding adjectives at ELATED): rapture, transport, *ecstasy.

despairing, adj. Hopeless, desperate, *despondent, forlorn.

Ana. Melancholy, *melancholic, atrabilious: pessimistic, misanthropic, *cynical: depressed, weighed down (see DEPRESS).

Ant. Hopeful. — Con. Optimistic, roseate, rose-colored (see HOPEFUL): *elated, elate, exultant: sanguine, *confident, assured, sure.

A colon (:): groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

despatch. Variant of DISPATCH.

desperado. *Ruffian, thug, gangster, Mohock, apache.

Ana. *Assassin, cutthroat, bravo.

desperate. Hopeless, despairing, *despondent, forlorn. Ana. Reckless, rash, foolhardy, venturesome, venturesome, temerarious (see ADVENTUROUS): *precipitate, headlong: thwarted, foiled, frustrated, outwitted, circumvented, baffled, balked (see FRUSTRATE).

Con. *Cool, collected, composed, nonchalant: sanguine, assured, *confident, sure.

desperation. Hopelessness, despair, despondency, forlornness. See under DESPONDENT, adj.

Ana. Fury, frenzy (see INSPIRATION): grit, pluck, guts, sand, *fortitude: recklessness, rashness, foolhardiness (see corresponding adjectives at ADVENTUROUS): *temerity, audacity.

Con. *Confidence, assurance, aplomb: *equanimity, composure, sang-froid, phlegm.

despicable. *Contemptible, pitiable, sorry, scurvy, cheap, beggarly.

Ana. *Base, low, vile: ignominious, infamous, disgraceful (see corresponding nouns at DISGRACE): ignoble, *mean, abject, sordid.

Ant. Praiseworthy, laudable.

despise. Despise, condemn, scorn, disdain, scout come into comparison as meaning to regard a person or thing as beneath one's notice or as unworthy of one's attention or interest. The same differences in implications and connotations are observable in the corresponding nouns despite, contempt, scorn, disdain when they denote such an attitude toward, or such treatment of, a person or thing. Despise and despite (the latter now literary) may imply any emotional reaction from strong disfavor to loathing, but in precise use it always stresses a looking down upon a thing and its evaluation as mean, petty, weak, worthless, or the like. "He must learn, however, to despise petty adversaries. No good sportsman ought to shoot at crows" (Scott). "Bird and beast despised my snares, which took me so many waking hours at night to invent" (Hudson). "Receive thy friend, who, scorning flight, Goes to meet danger with despite" (Longfellow). Condemn (now bookish) and contempt imply even a harsher judgment than despise or despite, for the latter pair may connote mere derision, whereas the former pair (especially contempt) usually suggest vehement, though not necessarily vocal, condemnation of the person or thing as low, vile, ignominious, or the like; as, "I contemn their low images of love" (Steele); "his own early drawings of moss-roses and picturesque castles—things that he now mercilessly contemned" (Bennett); "I was on fire with the same anger, dislike, and contempt that burned in Hobart towards me" (R. Macaulay); "It was to proclaim their utter contempt for the public and popular conceptions of art, that the Dadaists launched into a series of outrageous practical jokes" (Day Lewis). Scorn implies quick, indignant, or profound contempt; as, "Instructed from her early years to scorn the art of female tears" (Swift); "I knew he'd scorn me. He hates frumps" (Meredith); "Voltaire, with his quick intellectual scorn and eager malice of the brain" (E. Dowden); "Common sense, rejecting with scorn all that can be called mysticism" (Inge). Disdain suggests a visible manifestation of pride and arrogance (sometimes unwarrantable) or aversion to what is base; as, "A great mind disdains to hold anything by courtesy" (Johnson); "His disdain of affectation and prudery was magnificent" (Mencken). Scout stresses not only derision but a refusal to consider the person or thing concerned as of any value, efficacy, or truth. It therefore suggests rejection or dismissal. "Many great philosophers have not only been scouted while they were living, but forgotten as soon as they were dead" (Hazlitt). "Alice would have scouted . . . any suggestion that her parent was more selfish than saintly" (Show).

Ana. Abominate, loathe, abhor, detest, *hate: spurn, repudiate (see DECLINE).

Ant. Appreciate. — Con. Admire, esteem, respect (see under REGARD, n.): value, prize, cherish, treasure (see APPRECIATE).

despite, n. 1 Spite, ill will, malevolence, spleen, grudge, *malice, malignity.

Ana. Contempt, scorn, disdain (see under DESPISE): abhorrence, loathing, detestation, abomination, hatred, hate (see under HATE, v.).

Ant. Appreciation: regard. — Con. Admiration, esteem, respect (see REGARD, n.): *reverence, awe, fear.

2 Contempt, scorn, disdain. See under DESPISE.

despite, prep. In spite of, *notwithstanding.

despiteful. Spiteful, spiteous, malevolent, *malicious, malignant, malign.

Ana. Contemptuous, scornful, disdainful (see corresponding nouns under DESPISE): *envious, jealous: *vindictive, revengeful, vengeful.

Con. Kindly, *kind, benignant, benign.

despiteous or spiteous. Despiteful, spiteful, wanton, *malicious, malevolent, malignant, malign.

Ana. Merciless, implacable, *grim, relentless, unrelenting: pitiless, ruthless (see corresponding nouns at PITY).

Con. Benevolent, humane, *charitable.

despoil. *Ravage, devastate, waste, sack, pillage, spoliage.

Ana. Plunder, *rob, rifle, loot: *strip, bare, denude.

despondency, despond. Despair, desperation, hopelessness, forlornness. See under DESPONDENT, adj.

Ana. Dejection, depression, melancholy, melancholia, *sadness, blues, dumps.

Ant. Lightheartedness. — Con. Elatedness or elation, exultancy or exultation (see corresponding adjectives at ELATED): cheerfulness, gladness, happiness, joyfulness, joyousness (see corresponding adjectives at GLAD).

despondent, adj. Despondent, despairing, desperate, hopeless, forlorn come into comparison as meaning having lost all, or practically all, hope. The same distinctions in implications and connotations are to be found in their corresponding nouns despondency (or despond), despair, desperation, hopelessness, forlornness when they denote the state or feeling of a person who has lost hope. Despondent and despondency (or despond), which occurs rarely, and chiefly in Bunyan's phrase "slough of despond") imply disheartenment or deep dejection arising out of a conviction that there is no longer any justification of hope or that further efforts are useless; as, a despondent youth; a despondent lover. "Whenever . . . the repressed spirit of the artist . . . perceived . . . the full extent of its débâcle, Mark Twain was filled with a despondent desire, a momentary purpose even, to stop writing altogether" (Van W. Brooks). "We Poets in our youth begin in gladness; But thereof come in the end despondency and madness" (Wordsworth). "England, they said, was wont to take her defeats without despondency, and her victories without elation" (A. Repplier). Despairing and despair imply sometimes the passing of hope, sometimes the utter loss of hope and, often, but not necessarily, accompanying despondency. "[Matthew Arnold's] despairing appeal to the democracy when his jeremiads evoked no response from the upper class . . . or from the middle class" (Inge). "To fortify ourselves against the ultimate disaster—which is despair" (Times Lit. Sup.). "A . . . despair of her ever understanding either the terms of a contract or the nature of working conditions" (M. Austin). Desperate and desperation imply despair, but not the cessation of effort: rather, they often suggest violence, recklessness, or the like, as a last resource, especially in the face of defeat or frustration. "The bitter, desperate striving unto death of the oppressed race, the damned desperation of the rebel" (R. Macaulay). "A desperate determination that nothing should interfere with her marriage with Hugh had taken possession of her. 'If necessary I'll ride the man down,' she thought" (S. Anderson). "He was fighting a fight of desperation, and knew it" (Meredith). "Not knowing...how near my pursuer might be, I turned in desperation to meet him" (Hudson). Hopeless and hopelessness imply both the complete loss of hope and the cessation of effort; as, the hopeless look in the faces of the doomed men. The words do not necessarily suggest despondency, dejection, or gloom, for sometimes they imply acceptance or resignation. "Why should you say such desperate things?" "No, they are not desperate. They are only hopeless!" (Hardy). "Not that Dr. Lavendar was hopeless; he was never hopeless of anybody...but he was wise; so he was deeply discouraged" (Deland). Forlorn (see also ALONE, 1) and forlornness stress utter hopelessness: they derive this sense from the phrase forlorn hope (etymologically, a lost band or troop) which in early use denoted a party of soldiers or others sent out to do a piece of work—such as beginning an attack—which, whatever the ultimate result might be, was certain to lead them to death or capture. Consequently, they differ from hopeless and hopelessness in implying hopelessness even in the act of undertaking something because its failure is all but certain; as, "[We] sit down in a forlorn scepticism" (Berkeley); "Poor prince, forlorn he steps... and proud in his despair" (Keats). Desperate, hopeless, and forlorn and their corresponding nouns are applicable not only to men, their moods, words, and the like, but to the things which make men despairing or hopeless; as, desperate straits; the hopeless situation of a beleaguered garrison; "desperate grime and greasiness" (Wm. McFee); "all the high ardour and imaginative force which the Celt has ever thrown into a forlorn and failing cause" (Cyril Robinson); "The leaders of forlorn hopes are never found among men with dismal minds. There must be a natural resiliency of temper which makes them enjoy desperate ventures" (S. M. Crothers).

Ana. Grieving, mourning, sorrowing (see GRIEVE): depressed, dejected, melancholy, sad (see corresponding nouns at SADNESS).

Ant. Lighthearted. — Con. *Elated, elate, exultant: cheerful, joyful, joyous, happy, *glad: buoyant, volatile, resilient, *elastic.

despotic, despotical. Tyrannical, tyrannous, arbitrary, autocratic, *absolute.

Ana. Domineering, imperious, *masterful, imperative: *dictatorial, authoritarian, magisterial.

destined. *Prescribed, appointed.

Ana. Intended, purposed, designed (see INTEND): *inevitable, ineluctable, inescapable, unavoidable.

destiny. *Fate, lot, doom, portion.

Ana. *End, termination, terminus, ending: goal, objective (see INTENTION): *vocation.

destitute. *Devoid, void.

Ana. Lacking, wanting (see LACK, v.): *deficient: *empty: barren, *bare: depleted, drained, exhausted, bankrupted or bankrupt (see corresponding verbs at DEplete).

Con. *Full, replete, complete.

destitution. Want, indigence, *poverty, penury, privation.

Ana. *Need, necessity, exigency: *lack, absence, want, privation: adversity, *misfortune: straits (see JUNCture).

Ant. Opulence.

destroy. Destroy, demolish, raze come into comparison as meaning to pull or tear down. Destroy, which etymologically means to unbuild (the reverse of to construct), is now so general in its application that it may imply the operation of any force that wrecks, kills, annihilates, or the like; as, to destroy a building, a paper, a nest of caterpillars; to destroy life, affection, one's influence. In very precise use, however, its opposition to construct is usually apparent. "It is proverbially easier to destroy than to construct" (T. S. Eliot). "Very few established institutions, governments and constitutions... are ever destroyed by their enemies until they have been corrupted and weakened by their friends" (Lippmann). Demolish implies a pulling or smashing to pieces; when used in reference to buildings or other structures of wood, stone, steel, and the like, it implies complete wreckage and often a heap of ruins; as, houses demolished by a hurricane; the automobile was demolished in a collision with the train. Figuratively, the term implies the destruction of all coherency or integrity in a thing and, consequently, of all its usefulness; as, to demolish an opponent's argument. "People are inclined to believe that what Bradley did was to demolish the logic of Mill and the psychology of Bain" (T. S. Eliot). Raze implies a bringing to the level of the ground; it may or may not imply an orderly process with no destruction of usable parts; thus, several buildings were razed to make room for the new city hall; the village was razed to the ground by a disastrous fire. In extended use, the term implies obliteration or effacement, more, however, with reference to the etymological implication of scraping than the acquired sense of pulling or tearing down. "Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased... Raze out the written troubles of the brain...?" (Shak.).

Ana. *Ruin, wreck, wrack, dilapidate: *abolish, extinguish, annihilate: *ravage, devastate, sack.

Con. *Found, establish, institute, organize: *make, form, shape, fashion, fabricate, forge, manufacture, preserve, conserve, *save.

desultory. Casual, hit-or-miss, haphazard, *random, happy-go-lucky, chance, chancy.

Ana. *Fittul, spasmodic: unsystematic, unmethodical, disorderly (see affirmative adjectives at ORDERLY): capricious, mercurial, *inconstant, fickle.

Ant. Assiduous (study, search, or other activity): methodical (something designed, planned, constructed, etc.).

detach. Detach, disengage, abstract, prescind come into comparison when they mean to remove one thing from another (or others) with which it is in union or association. One detaches something when one breaks (literally or figuratively) a connection, a tie, or a bond and thereby isolates it or makes it independent; as, to detach sheets from a loose-leaf book; to detach a ship from a fleet; to detach oneself from one's prejudices. "It was as if the bonfire-makers [on a distant hill at night] were... detached from and independent of the dark stretches below" (Hardy). One disengages something that is held by or involved with something else and thereby sets it free; as, she disengaged her hand; to disengage gears from each other; it is hard for the mind to disengage itself from depressing thoughts. "I could not rest satisfied until I...had disengaged...[Wordsworth's] good work from the inferior work joined with it, and had placed before the public the body of his good work by itself" (Arnold). One abstracts something by withdrawing it from the place where it belongs or by separating it from a mass of like things so as to put it in another place or another relation; as, to abstract papers from a file; to abstract (in this case often with implications of furtiveness and theft) eggs from a nest or money from a till; to abstract the essential points from an argument (usually with the implication of making an abridgment); to abstract one's attention from one's surroundings (especially so as to concentrate it on something else). Abstract in its intransitive sense means to perform the logical process of abstraction (see ABSTRACT, adj.). Prescind, unlike the other words, is used only of abstractions, and is therefore found chiefly in philosophical writing. One prescinds who by an act of the mind separates one idea or notion from all others with which it is usually involved, so that it can be examined in itself; as, few can consider happiness prescinded from pleasure and self-indulgence; the philosophical notion of force, prescinded from matter and gravity.

Ana. *Separate, part, sever, sunder, divorce: disjoin, disconnect, disunite (see affirmative verbs at JOIN).

Ant. Attach, affix. — Con. *Fasten, fix: *tie, bind: *unite, combine, conjoin.

detached. Aloof, disinterested, *indifferent, unconcerned, incurious.

Ana. Impartial, dispassionate, objective, unbiased, *fair: altruistic (see CHARITABLE).

Ant. Interested: selfish. — Con. *Mercenary: concerned (see under CARE).

detail, n. 1 *Item, particular.

Con. *Structure, framework, anatomy, skeleton: whole, aggregate, total, *sum: mass, *bulk: design, scheme, *plan, plot.

2 *Part, portion, piece, parcel, member, division, segment, sector, fraction, fragment.

detailed. Itemized, particularized, *circumstantial, minute, particular.

Ana. *Full, complete, replete: copious, abundant (see PLENTIFUL): exhausting or exhaustive (see corresponding verb at DEplete).

detain. 1 *Arrest, apprehend, attach.

Ana. *Catch, capture, nab, cop: seize, *take: *imprison, incarcerate, intern, jail.

2 Withhold, hold back, keep back, reserve, *keep.

3 *Delay, retard, slow, slacken.

Ana. Curb, check, *restrain, inhibit: *arrest, interrupt: *defer, suspend, stay.

Con. *Advance, promote, forward, further. *speed, hasten, hurry.

detention. Arrest, apprehension, attachment. See under ARREST, v.

Ana. Imprisonment, internment, incarceration (see corresponding verbs at IMPRISON).

deterioration. Deterioration, degeneration, devolution, decadence, decline, declension are here compared as meaning either the process of falling from a higher to a lower level or the state of a thing when such a falling has occurred. Deterioration is the least specific of these terms and applies to any process or condition in which there are signs of impairment in quality, in character, in value, or the like; as, chemicals that reduce the deterioration of rubber in aging; the deterioration of his memory is marked in recent years. "Man the tool-maker has made 'inanimate instruments' . . . do his manual work for him; he is now trying to make them do his mental work. . . . The price may be the progressive deterioration of our faculties" (Inge). Degeneration usually implies retrogression, or a return to a simpler or more primitive state or condition; when used in reference to plants, animals, or any of their organs, it often suggests physical changes in structure, but it may imply a progressive deterioration owing to a morbid condition; as, the sea squirt in its adult stage evidences degeneration through the loss of the vertebrate characters apparent in its larval stage; fatty degeneration of the heart. When applied to men in groups or as individuals, or to states, empires, and the like, it suggests physical, intellectual, and often moral degradation and a reversion toward (but not necessarily to) barbarism or, in the case of individuals, bestiality; as, the degeneration of the American Indians confined to reservations; the degeneration of the ancient Roman Empire. In scientific language, devolution usually takes the place of degeneration (as, the devolution of the sea squirt) but in general use it carries even a stronger implication of opposition to evolution. "The process of human evolution is nothing more than a process of sifting, and where that sifting ceases evolution ceases, becomes, indeed, devolution" (H. Ellis). Decadence presupposes a previous maturing and usually a high degree of excellence; it implies that the falling takes place after a thing (such as a people, a literature or other form of art, a branch of knowledge) has reached the peak of its development. "There seems to be no more pronounced mark of the decadence of a people and its literature than a servile and rigid subserviency to rule" (H. Ellis). "Hanbridge had already . . . robbed Bursley of two-thirds of its retail trade—as witness the steady decadence of the Square!" (Bennett). Decline is often interchangeable with decadence because it, too, suggests a falling after the peak has been reached in power, prosperity, excellence, or the like. It, however, usually suggests more momentum, more obvious evidences of deterioration, and less hope of a return to the earlier state; as, the rise and decline of the imperial power; he is in the decline of life. "The association so often noted between the flowering of the intellect and the decline of national vigor" (J. W. Krutch). Declension differs from decline only in connoting less precipitancy or a slower or more gradual falling toward extinction or destruction. "The love that cheers life's latest stage . . . Preserved by virtue from declension" (Cowper). "The moral change, the sad declension from the ancient proud spirit. . . was painfully depressing" (Bennett).

Ana. Impairment, spoiling (see corresponding verbs at INJURE): decaying or decay, decomposition, disintegration, rotting, crumbling (see corresponding verbs at DECAY): debasement, degradation (see corresponding verbs at ABASE).

Ant. Improvement, amelioration.

determinant. Antecedent, *cause, reason, occasion.

Ana. Factor (see ELEMENT): *influence, weight, authority.

determination. *Decision.

Ana. Decidedness, decisiveness (see corresponding adjectives at DECIDE): resolution, tenacity, mettle, spirit, *courage: backbone, grit, pluck, guts, sand, *fortitude: doggedness, pertinaciousness or pertinacity, stubbornness (see corresponding adjectives at OBSTINATE).

determinative. *Conclusive, decisive, definitive

Ana. Determining, deciding, settling (see DECIDE): influencing, affecting (see AFFECT): shaping, fashioning, forming or formative (see corresponding verbs at MAKE).

Con. *Ineffective, ineffectual, inefficacious, inefficient.

determine. 1 Settle, rule, *decide, resolve.

Ana. Fix, *set, establish: dispose, predispose, *incline, bias: drive, impel, *move, actuate: *induce, persuade.

2 Ascertain, *discover, unearth, learn.

detest. *Hate, abhor, abominate, loathe.

Ana. *Despise, contemn, scorn, disdain: spurn, repudiate, reject (see DECLINE, v.).

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

Ant. Adore (sense 2). — Con. Love, *like, dote on or upon, fancy, relish: cherish, prize, treasure, value, *appreciate.

detestable. Odious, *hateful, abominable, abhorrent.

Ana. *Contemptible, despicable, sorry, scurvy: atrocious, *outrageous, monstrous, heinous: *execrable, damnable, accursed.

detestation. Hate, hatred, abomination, abhorrence, loathing. See under HATE, v.

Ana. *Antipathy, aversion: despise, contempt, scorn, disdain (see under DESPISE).

Con. Admiration, esteem, respect, *regard: love, affection, *attachment: tolerance, indulgence, forbearance (see under FORBEARING).

detract from. Belittle, minimize, disparage, derogate from, *decry, depreciate.

Ana. Asperse, *malign, traduce, defame, vilify, calumniate, slander, libel: reduce, lessen, diminish, *decrease.

Con. Enhance, heighten, *intensify: magnify, aggrandize, *exalt.

detractation. Detraction, backbiting, calumny, slander, scandal come into comparison when they denote either the offense of one who defames another or casts aspersions upon him, or that which is uttered by way of defamation or aspersion. Detraction stresses the injurious effect of what is said and the loss through it of something precious to the person affected, such as loss of the esteem of others, or loss of his credit, of his deserts, or even of his good name. "Bring candid eyes unto the perusal of men's works, and let not . . . detraction blast well-intended labors" (Broune). "To listen to detraction is as much an act of detraction as to speak it" (Manning). Backbiting imputes both furtiveness and spitefulness to the one who asperses or defames; it suggests an unfair, mean, and cowardly attack when the victim is absent and unable to defend himself. "Refrain your tongue from backbiting: for there is no word so secret, that shall go for nought" (Wisdom of Solomon i. 11). "Face-flatterer and backbiter are the same" (Tennyson). Calumny stresses malicious misrepresentation; it therefore implies that the detractor is a liar and that his intent is to blacken another's name. "Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny" (Shak.). "Calumny differs from most other injuries in this dreadful circumstance: he who commits it can never repair it" (Johnson). "To persevere in one's duty and be silent is the best answer to calumny" (Washington). Slander (for legal use, see TRADUCE) stresses the dissemination of calumnies, especially those of a highly defamatory character; thus, a person who is given to calumny is prone to malicious misrepresentation of the acts, the motives, or the character of others; a person who is given to slander is one who repeats (not necessarily originates) calumnies or defamatory reports without ascertaining, or with complete indifference to, their truth or falsehood; so, a man lays himself open to an action for slander if, however well-founded his suspicions, he calls a man a thief when sufficient evidence is lacking. "Who spake no slander, no, nor listen'd to it" (Tennyson). Scandal, as here compared (see OFFENSE, DISGRACE), usually suggests the activity of a gossip, especially of an idle, irresponsible gossip (a scandal-monger), who gives information of any shocking details, often true, that reflect discredit on another or that tend to tarnish or blacken his reputation; as, it is difficult for a man to remain long in public life untouched by scandal. "Her tea she sweetens, as she sips, with scandal" (S. Rogers).

Ana. *Injury, damage, harm, hurt: *injustice, injury, wrong, tort: defaming or defamation, aspersion, maligning, traducing, slandering or slander, calumniation, vilification, libeling or libel (see corresponding verbs at MALIGN).

detrimental. Deleterious, noxious, *pernicious, baneful. Ana. Harming or harmful, hurting or hurtful, injuring or injurious, damaging, impairing (see corresponding verbs at INJURE).

Ant. Beneficial. — Con. Advantageous, profitable (see BENEFICIAL): helping or helpful, aiding (see corresponding verbs at HELP).

devastate. Waste, *ravage, sack, pillage, despoil, spoliolate.

Ana. *Destroy, demolish, raze: *ruin, wreck: plunder, loot, *rob, rifle.

develop. *Mature, ripen, age.

Ana. *Advance, progress: *expand, dilate.

Con. *Wither, shrivel, rivel, wizen.

development. Development, evolution come into comparison when they mean growth from a lower to a higher state. Development, however, which etymologically implies an unfolding, in all of its senses stresses the bringing out of the hidden or latent possibilities in a thing, chiefly through growth and therefore through a series of natural stages (as, the development of a seed into a plant; the development of a human being from the embryo), but also through the exercise of human energy, ingenuity, art, or the like (as, the development of an industry, of a tract of land, of a photographic negative, of an argument). Evolution, on the other hand, etymologically implies an unrolling, and stresses an orderly succession of events or of living things, each growing out of that which precedes, yet marked by changes which transform it and give it a particular identity and usually (especially in regard to organisms or organs), a more elaborate and more complex character; as, the evolution of species; the evolution of the drama. Consequently, development should be used when the emphasis is on the realization of the full possibilities of a particular thing through natural or artificial means, and evolution when the stress is placed on the transformations which occur in a type, class, or order of things, the individual instances of which retain a likeness to the parent but manifest striking differences, especially in the direction of complexity and progress. "The Aristotelian canon that the 'nature' of a thing must be sought in its completed development, its final form" (Inge). "No, 'revolution' is not the proper word! What is happening in modern physics is a tremendously rapid evolution" (Karl K. Darrow).

Con. Decline, declension, decadence, devolution, *deterioration, degeneration.

deviate. Digress, diverge, *swerve, veer, depart.

Ana. Deflect, *turn, divert, avert, sheer: stray, *wander, rove.

deviation. Deviation, aberration, divergence (or divergency), deflection (or deflexion) in both their literal and their figurative senses agree in denoting departure (or an instance of departure) from a straight course or procedure or from a norm or standard. Deviation, the term of widest application, almost invariably requires qualification or a context to complete its meaning; as, no deviation from traditional methods was permitted; there were many deviations from fact in his account; the road proceeds without deviation for two miles. Aberration adds to deviation definite implications of error, fault, or abnormality, and therefore has highly technical significations in some of the sciences. In general use, it commonly implies transgression of the moral law or the social code, and is often used euphemistically for a reprehensible act or reprehensible behavior; as, the aberrations of his youth had long been forgotten. Divergence is sometimes used interchangeably with deviation, but ordinarily it denotes deviation of two (or more) things which from a common meeting point proceed in different directions; as, an angle is formed by the divergence of two lines; at no point in the discussion was there divergence of opinion on this question. Deflection adds to deviation the implication of bending or curving; as, the deflection of rays of light passing through a prism.

device. 1 Device, contrivance, gadget, contraption come into comparison when they mean something (usually but not always of a mechanical character) which is invented as a means of doing a particular piece of work or of effecting a given end. Device is the most widely applicable of these terms; it may be used of a thing that serves as a tool or instrument or as an effective part of a machine, especially one which shows some ingenuity in invention (as, a device for controlling the speed of a car; he invented various kitchen devices such as one for whipping cream and one for hulling strawberries), of any artifice or stratagem concocted as a means of accomplishing one's end (as, her device for keeping the children quiet; "he will... entrap thee by some treacherous device"—Shak.), and of any pattern or design that shows the play of fancy, especially of one that proves useful to the less inventive (as, a common literary device; "that old stale and dull device [in painting] of a rustic bridge spanning a shallow stream"—Jefferies). Contrivance stresses skill and dexterity in the adaptation of means (especially the means at hand) to an end; it often is used, however, with a suggestion of contempt; as, a contrivance for frightening birds that would eat his corn; "All sorts of contrivances for saving more time and labour" (Shaw); "He would look at none of the contrivances for his comfort" (Conrad). Gadget, originally a slang term, but now more or less accepted as good colloquial English, once denoted any device for which one did not know the name: now it applies to any small and novel device, especially one in the nature of an accessory or of an appliance, which adds to a person's comfort, convenience, or pleasure; as, their new car has all the latest gadgets; the cook refuses to use any of the gadgets we bought for her. Contraption, also a colloquial term, is more depreciative than gadget; also, it usually suggests a clumsy contrivance rather than an ingenious invention; as, he has rigged up a contraption which he calls a radio. Ana. Instrument, tool, *implement, appliance, utensil, apparatus, *machine, engine: expedient, *resource, shift, makeshift, resort: invention, creation (see corresponding verbs at INVENT): artifice, ruse, *trick.

2 *Figure, design, motif, pattern.

Ana. *Symbol, emblem, attribute, type.

devil. *Demon, fiend, daemon.

devilish. Diabolical, diabolic, *fiendish, demoniacal, demoniac, demonic.

Ana. *Infernal, hellish: nefarious, iniquitous, villainous, *vicious.

Ant. Angelic.

devious. *Crooked, oblique.

Ana. Deviating, diverging, digressing (see SWERVE): aberrant, *abnormal: tricky, crafty, artful, cunning, foxy, *sly.

Ant. Straightforward. — Con. Downright, *forthright.

devoid. Devoid, void, destitute come into comparison when they are followed by of and mean showing entire want or lack. Devoid stresses the absence or the nonpossession of a particular quality, character, tendency, or the like; as, "I was not devoid of capacity or application" (Gibbon); "they will steal from you before your very face, so devoid are they of all shame" (Hudson); "a human being devoid of hope is the most terrible object in the world" (V. Heiser). Void (see also EMPTY, 1) usually implies freedom from the slightest trace, vestige, tinge, or taint of something; as, a man void of honor; "A conscience void of offence" (Acts xxiv. 16); "A drama which, with all its preoccupation with sex, is really void of sexual interest" (Shaw). Destitute stresses deprivation or privation; it therefore is seldom used with reference to that which is evil or undesirable; as, "A domestic life destitute of any hallowing charm" (G. Eliot); "Men of genius... wholly destitute of any proper sense of form" (J. R. Lowell); "No woman... so totally destitute of the sentiment of religion" (J. R. Green).

Ana. Barren, *bare: lacking, wanting (see LACK, v): *empty.

devolution. Decadence, decline, declension, *deterioration, degeneration.

Ana. Retrogressiveness or retrogression, regressiveness or regression (see corresponding adjectives at BACKWARD): receding or recession, retrograding or retrogradation (see corresponding verbs at RECEDE).

Ant. Evolution. — Con. *Development: *progress, progression.

devote. 1 Devote, dedicate, consecrate, hallow come into comparison as meaning to set apart something (sometimes some one) for a particular use or end. Devote etymologically implies a vow, but in its present somewhat extended sense it often implies a giving up or setting apart because of motives almost as impelling as those that demand a vow; as, to devote one's full time to the care of the unfortunate; for days a group of men devoted themselves to the search for the lost child. "Eloquence, erudition, and philosophy... were humbly devoted to the service of religion" (Gibbon). Dedicate implies solemn and exclusive devotion and often a ceremonial setting apart for a serious and often a sacred use; as, to dedicate a church; "I will dedicate all the actions of my life to that one end" (Bello). "I had devoted the labour of my whole life, and had dedicated my intellect... to the slow and elaborate toil of constructing one single work" (De Quincey). Consecrate etymologically implies the giving of a sacred or exalted character; in strictest use, it implies rites, such as those by which a building is set apart (often in perpetuity, especially in distinction from dedicate) for the service or worship of God (as, to consecrate a church), or by which a bishop or king is elevated to his throne (as, kings of England are consecrated in Westminster Abbey), or by which ground is set apart as a burial place of the dead (as, to consecrate a cemetery). In an extended sense, however, consecrate does not imply such rites, but it carries a stronger connotation of almost religious devotion than dedicate. "A night of memories and of sighs I consecrate to thee" (Landor). Hallow is the stronger term, partly because of its use in the Lord's Prayer ("Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name"—Matthew vi. 9) and because it often implies an ascription of intrinsic sanctity. "But in a larger sense we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground" (Lincoln).

Ana. *Commit, consign, confide, entrust: assign, *allot: *sentence, doom.

2 Apply, *direct, address.

Ana. Endeavor, strive, struggle, try, *attempt.

devoted. *Loving, affectionate, fond, doting.

Ana. *Faithful, loyal, leal, true, constant: attentive, considerate, *thoughtful.

devotee. Votary, *addict, habitu , fiend, fan.

Ana. *Enthusiast, zealot, fanatic.

devotion. Loyalty, fealty, *fidelity, piety, allegiance.

Ana. Fervor, ardor, zeal, enthusiasm, *passion: love, affection, *attachment: dedication, consecration (see corresponding verbs at DEVOTE).

devout. Devout, pious, religious, pietistic, sanctimonious are here compared as applying mainly to persons, their acts, and their words, and as meaning showing fervor and reverence in the practice of religion. Devout stresses an attitude of mind or a feeling that leads one to frequent, though not necessarily outwardly evident, prayer, to solemn and reverent attention in public worship, and to strong attachment to the exercises and observances of religion; as, "A devout man, and one that feared God" (Acts x. 2); "All those various 'offices' which, in Pontifical, Missal, and Breviary, devout imagination had elaborated from age to age" (Pater). Pious emphasizes rather the faithful and dutiful performance of one's religious obligations; although often used interchangeably with devout it tends, even in nonderogatory use, to suggest outward acts which imply faithfulness and fervor rather than, as does devout, an attitude or feeling which can only be inferred; as, pious churchmen; pious regularity in church attendance. "Our whole duty is made up of but three things: that a man live soberly with respect to himself; righteously with respect to his neighbor; and piously with respect to God" (J. Sharp). The term often, however, carries a hint of depreciation, sometimes of hypocrisy. "The saying that we are members one of another is not a mere pious formula to be repeated in church without any meaning" (Shaw). Cf. pious fraud under IMPOSTURE. Religious may, and usually does, imply both devoutness and piety, but it stresses faith in a God or gods, and adherence to a way of life believed in consonance with that faith. "A man may be moral without being religious, but he cannot be religious without being moral" (F. W. H. Myers). "He [the Roman general who carried images of his gods] did it because... he was religious, and his gods must go with him" (Quiller-Couch). Pietistic is commonly more derogatory than pious; historically, it implies an insistence on the emotional aspects rather than on the intellectual aspects of religion; as, "An emotional person with pietistic inclinations that nearly carried him over at different times to the Plymouth Brethren" (H. G. Wells). In current use, the historical association is largely forgotten and the term is applied to that which the speaker or writer regards as sentimentally or affectedly pious; as, pietistic practices; a pietistic discourse. Sanctimonious has in current use entirely lost its original implication of a holy or sacred character; now it implies a pretension to or appearance of holiness or piety; as, a sanctimonious hypocrite like Mr. Pecksniff; sanctimonious phrases. Often, it connotes a hypocritical aloofness or superiority of manner. "If it only takes Some of the sanctimonious conceit Out of one of those pious scallawags" (Frost).

Ana. Fervent, fervid, ardent (see IMPASSIONED): worshiping, adoring, venerating (see REVERE).

dexterity. Facility, ease, *readiness.

Ana. Dexterousness, adroitness, deftness, featness (see corresponding adjectives at DEXTEROUS): expertness, adeptness, skillfulness, proficiency (see corresponding adjectives at PROFICIENT).

Ant. Clumsiness. — Con. Awkwardness, ineptness or ineptitude, maladroitness (see corresponding adjectives at AWKWARD).

dexterous. Dexterous (or dextrous), adroit, deft, feat, handy agree in meaning having or showing readiness and skill in the use of one's hands, limbs, or body. By extension, the first three may also imply physical or mental readiness or skill. Dexterous implies expertness with consequent facility and agility in manipulation or movement. "With a couple of dexterous turns of the wrist, [he] pegged the bird on its back with outstretched wings" (Kipling). Adroit is gradually being displaced by dexter- ous in its physical sense. It is still occasionally used, however, with reference to feats of manual skill requiring resourcefulness or artfulness; thus, an adroit fencer or an adroit magician is, by implication, not only dexterous in his manipulations, but able to cope quickly and without bungling with every situation that arises. "A daring but consummately adroit transference of conventions" (Loves). Deft stresses lightness, neatness, and sureness of touch or handling; as, a deft watch repairer. "When he was about to salt his tea, she deftly substituted the sugar bowl" (Atlantic Monthly). "The delicacy... and the definess, and the crystalline quality of the verse of China and Japan" (Loves). Feat, now a bookish word, comes close to deft; in very precise use, however, it adds the connotation of grace, or beauty in movement. "She dances feally." "So she does any thing" (Shak.). Handy usually implies lack of training but a degree of skill in doing small jobs of carpentry, plumbing, repairing, etc.; it is sometimes applied to a jack-of-all-trades; as, a handy man.

Ana. Nimble, *agile: skilled, skillful, expert, adept. *proficient: *easy, effortless, smooth, facile.

Ant. Clumsy. — Con. *Awkward, maladroitness, inept, gauche.

diabolical, diabolic. Devilish, *fiendish, demoniacal, demoniac, demonic.

Ana. & Ant. See those at DEVILISH.

diagram, v. Outline, plot, blueprint, draft, trace, *sketch, delineate.

Ana. Design, *plan, plot, scheme.

dialect, n. 1 Dialect, vernacular, patois, lingo, jargon, cant, argot, patter, slang are here compared as denoting a form of language or a style of speech which varies from that accepted as the literary standard. Dialect, as here compared (see also LANGUAGE, 1), is applied ordinarily to a form of a language that is confined to a locality or to a group, that differs from the standard form of the same language in peculiarities of vocabulary, pronunciation, usage, morphology, and the like, and that persists for generations or even centuries. It may represent an independent development from the same origin as the standard form (as, the Sussex dialect) or a survival (as, the dialect of the Kentucky mountaineers). The term is often, in spite of some philological opposition, applied to a corruption of the standard language (as, the Gullah dialect, a corrupted English used by descendants of African Negroes living chiefly along the coast of South Carolina and Georgia). "A Babylonish dialect Which learned pedants much affect" (Buller). Vernacular (usually the vernacular) has several applications, though it always denotes the form of language spoken by the people in contrast with that employed by learned or literary men. In the Middle Ages, when the language of the church, of the universities, and of learned writings was Latin, the vernacular was the native language of the people, whatever it might be in the locality in question; as, to translate the Bible into the vernacular. "Freeman... laments... that the first Christian missionaries from Rome did not teach their converts to pray and give praise in the vernacular" (Quiller-Couch). When a contrast with the literary language rather than with Latin is implied, the vernacular is an underogatory designation for the spoken language, that is, for the language that represents the speech of the people as a whole, that is colloquial but not necessarily vulgar, and is marked chiefly by the spontaneous choice of familiar, often native (as opposed to exotic), words and phrases. "Pope...

is absolute master of the raciest, most familiar, most cogent and telling elements of the vernacular" (Lowes). In current use, vernacular often implies a contrast with scientific nomenclature; as, the botanical and the vernacular names for flowers. Patois, a French word adopted in English, is often used as if it were the equivalent of dialect. It tends, however, to be restricted, especially in North America, to designating a form of speech used by the uneducated people in a bilingual section or country; the word often specifically refers to the hybrid language (English, and French Canadian) spoken in some parts of Canada. Lingo is a term of contempt applied to any language that is not easily or readily understood. It is applicable to a strange foreign language, a dialect, a patois, or to the peculiar speech of any class, cult, or the like. "I have often warned you not to talk the court gibberish to me. I tell you, I don't understand the lingo" (Fielding). Jargon, which originally meant the twittering or chattering of birds, and later was applied to any unintelligible or meaningless speech (as in a foreign tongue or a patois) suggestive of such chattering, is now used chiefly in reference to the technical or esoteric language of a subject, a class, a profession, or a cult, often, but not always, from the point of view of one unfamiliar with it and confused or baffled by it. "Cockets, and dockets, and drawbacks, and other jargon words of the customhouse" (Swift). "Whitman...has a somewhat vulgar inclination for technical talk and the jargon of philosophy" (Stevenson). Cant, which is etymologically related to chant, seems to have been applied first to the whining speech of beggars; in later times, it has been applied variously, as to the secret language of gypsies and thieves, to the technical language of a trade or profession, and to the peculiar phraseology of a religious sect or of its preachers. From the last of these applications, not only has a new sense been developed (see HYPOCRISY), but a new connotation has been derived for the word in the sense here considered. For cant, when referred to the peculiar language of a subject or profession usually suggests the hackneyed use of set words or phrases, often in a specialized or "off" sense; cant, therefore, does not usually imply unintelligibility; thus, the language of sports writers is a cant (not a jargon); the scientific nomenclature used by physicians in official reports may be called medical jargon (not cant) by those who do not understand it; a person who repeatedly calls an investigation a "probe," a large book a "tome," a preacher a "parson," his wife "my better half," and the like, may be said to be given to cant. Argot is applicable chiefly to the cant of the underworld, originally to that of Paris; it is now sometimes used of any form of peculiar language adopted by a clique, a set, or other closely knit group. Patter always implies rapid voluble speech, such as is characteristic of a circus barker or of a faker selling wares, or is found half-recited, half-sung as a farcical act on the stage or in a musical comedy. In extended use it usually also implies a cant; as, the patter of an auctioneer; the patter of a clown. Slang does not as often denote a form of language or a type of speech as it does a class of recently coined words or phrases or the type of word which belongs to that class; as, in the slang of college students a drudge is a "greasy grind"; the difference between American slang and British slang. Slang implies comparatively recent invention, the appeal of the words or phrases to popular fancy because of their aptness, picturesqueness, grotesqueness, or humorosity, and either an ephemeral character or, if the words or phrases persist in use, their nonacceptance by the authorities as a permanent addition to the language; thus, "to escape with the skin of one's teeth" sounds like slang, but it is not so designated because it is derived from the Authorized Version of the Bible (Job xix. 20).

dictatorial. Dictatorial, magisterial, magistral, authoritative, authoritarian, dogmatic (or dogmatical), doctrinaire, oracular come into comparison in the sense of imposing or having the manner or disposition of one who would impose his will or his opinions upon others. Etymologically, dictatorial implies the powers of a dictator (historically, a person, often a military man, in whom supreme or absolute power is vested during an emergency), but it has acquired so strong an implication of the assumption of such power that it now often stresses autocratic or highhanded methods and a domineering, overbearing temper. "A captain who has been entrusted with dictatorial power" (Macaulay). "He is...very learned, very dictatorial, very knock-me-down" (M. R. Milford). "He [Dryden] has nothing of the unpleasant dictatorial manner of Temple" (Gosse). Magisterial and the now comparatively rare magistral derive their chief implications from their etymological reference to a magistrate or, more often, to a schoolmaster. They seldom imply an assumption of power, highhandedness, or a bad temper, but they do suggest excessive use or display of the powers or prerogatives associated with the offices of a magistrate or schoolmaster, such as in controlling and disciplining or in enforcing the acceptance of one's opinions. "We are not magisterial in opinions, nor...obtrude our notions on any man" (Browne). "It will not do to say magisterially: 'Take the child away!' I suspect that even exhortation is superfluous" (Lowes). Magistral is now also applied to opinions, ideas, and the like, which are so deeply impressed on the mind, especially the popular mind, that they cannot easily be eradicated. "The 'possible,' as something less than the actual and more than the wholly unreal, is another of these magisterial notions of common sense" (W. James). Authoritative may or may not carry derogatory connotations. More often than not, it implies exercise of acknowledged power, such as that of "the authorities," or the person or persons having the power to exact obedience, to make final decisions, or to authorize something, or of "an authority," a person competent because of his official status, learning, or experience to present the facts or to give an opinion that has weight; as, the majority opinion of the supreme court has the effect of an authoritative decision; an authoritative statement from the secretary of the treasury regarding the national finances; an authoritative body of scientists; an authoritative book on economics. When authoritative implies an assumption of such power, it more often suggests a manner, an attitude, or the like, than an arbitrary exercise of power; as, he always took an authoritative tone in stating his views. "That self-possession and authoritativeness of voice and carriage which belonged to a man who thought of superiors as remote existences" (G. Eliot). Authoritarian is used chiefly in reference to states or governments (for this use see TOTALITARIAN), to churches, to bodies, persons, or their policies or attitudes. As here compared, it implies
